Unable to lick O. P. A. on valid gounds—because, despite all its faults, O. P. A. has prevented the disastrous price inflation of World War No. 1—the enemies of O. P. A. have joined with selfish interests in an effort to outflank the price-control front by chipping off the O. P. A.'s powers to hold costs to some reasonable level.

More than a hundred amendments of every variety have been submitted in the Senate and House to the pending bill to extend the life of O. P. A. Some of these proposals bear merit but most of them are bare-faced attempts to thwart effective price control.

Here, for example, is what some of the amendments—most of them, fortunately, rejected—would do:

Remove all price control from fresh fruits.

Exempt watermelons from price ceilings.

Take controls off raw furs.

Guarantee profit equal to that during the pre-war period on all products manufactured from agricultural commodities if a firm's business has suffered because of the war.

Take controls off rough rice.

Base crude-oil prices on parity.

Permit draftees to liquidate their personal property without regard to O. P. A. ceilings.

Abolish price ceilings on all used household goods and farm machinery.

Remove areas and portions of areas from rent control as soon as the districts are no longer defense rental areas.

Prohibit O. P. A. from issuing any order which will deny any merchant a fair, equitable profit.

Exempt from price control all food products except a list of 61 essential items included in the Bureau of Labor Statistics cost-of-living index.

Ease rental eviction restrictions and prevent O. P. A. interference between property owners and tenants as long as they act within State laws.

Prevent O. P. A. from bringing additional food items under price control.

And so on and on.

The men and women at the battle front well may wonder when we on the home front will bury our selfish interests for the common good.

REMARKS

OF

HON. FOREST A. HARNESS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on May 23 I addressed a letter to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, directing that committee's attention to what my preliminary investigations led me to believe are irregularities in the Procurement Division of the United States Maritime Commission. I urged the committee to undertake a thorough investigation of the situation.

Shortly thereafter, on May 29, I spoke in the House, inviting the attention of the Members to the unusual circumstances existing in the program to procure adequate, improved type life rafts for our merchant fleet.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] promptly made inquiry of the United States Maritime Commission regarding the facts and circumstances. Rear Admiral Emory S. Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, very promptly on June 1 returned special report number 80, upon the subject of the inquiry.

I have complimented Admiral Land upon the prompt and detailed response returned, and for his expressed willingness to cooperate fully in any further investigations which may be found to be warranted. I should like to take the opportunity to repeat those commendations to the members of the House.

At the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], I have studied this special report, and am submitting to him for the use of the committee an analysis. It is my belief, after careful study of this report, that it not only fails to dispose of the questions I have raised, but actually confirms the impression that serious irregularities do exist within the Maritime Procurement Division. Not only does this report show that procurement methods have been inefficient and wasteful; it clearly indicates delay and indecision over a prolonged period of almost 18 months, during which the seamen of the American merchant marine have been forced to rely upon old style rafts which have been considered entirely out-moded and inadequate since vastly improved type rafts have been available. Not only have these procurement officials apparently wasted valuable time and public funds, they apparently have displayed a wanton disregard for the safety of these brave seamen who have faced all manner of danger to keep open the life-lines to our many battle fronts.

I submit here the report I have made to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries through its chairman, the gentleman from Virginia. I earnestly hope the membership of the House will carefully study my report, which is made a part of these remarks:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1944.

Hon. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND,
Chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: On May 23 I directed your attention by letter to what I had been led to believe are questionable practices within the Procurement Office of the United States Maritime Commission. Subsequently, on Monday, May 29, I invited public attention to these apparent irregularities within the United States Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration in a speech in the House of Representatives.

Admiral Emory S. Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration, is to be commended for the report he has returned in response to our inquiries into this subject of life raft procurement, and for his expressed willingness to go further into the matter as circumstances may warrant. Had the special report No. 80 by the United States Maritime Commission satisfactorily disposed of the questions raised in my original inquiry, I would have happily dismissed the matter without regard to the special interests of the Globe American Corporation, its thousand employees and their families, its 589 subcontractors and their several thousand employees, and the community of Kokomo, Ind., the home of this organization.

This special report, however, not only fails completely to dispose of the questions I raised, but appears, actually, to document the claim that a thorough-going investigation into this phase of Maritime Commission procurement policies and methods is fully warranted. I propose to show in the following analysis that the report, together with Admiral Land's letter of transmittal, reveals: (1) errors, misinterpretation, and omissions, and (2) clear evidence upon the procurement records of disregard of human life, waste, incompetence and delay.

Admiral Land states in his letter of transmittal (p. 945, par. 1) that specification for all life-saving equipment is solely the responsibility of the United States Coast Guard. The assumption is, therefore, that the U. S. M. C. purchases only with Coast Guard approval. Despite the recognized authority of C. G., however, M. C. entered the following contracts for life rafts, which were subsequently canceled because of failure of the product to meet C. G. requirements: Edwards Manufacturing Co., Cincinnati, Ohio, purchase order PD-MC44-24770, November 9, 1943 (p. 951); Colvin-Slocum Boats, Inc., New York, N. Y., purchase orders PD-MC44-27919, January 13, 1944 (p. 953), and MC44-3367, November 16, 1943, (p. 955); Stainless & Steel Products Co., St. Paul, Minn., purchase order PD-MC44-24438, November 24, 1943 (p. 953), presumably canceled. (See item B (5), p. 952.)

Note that all these orders were placed well after the improved Globe all-metal raft had been finally approved, and was in successful volume production. Note the inaccurate explanation given that Globe had no additional production capacity. Note, also, throughout this memorandum instances in which contracts have been awarded to producers with only tentative approval of raft design, and with no known production performance records. Note particularly the group orders placed May 9, 1944 (p. 956), under which 350 untested rafts were purchased from companies with no demonstrated ability to produce according to requirements.

This memorandum throughout reveals that Maritime Commission Procurement officials must have tried by every means over a period of several months to place contracts with almost anyone who offered a bid so as to avoid placing orders with the Globe American Corporation, the company which pioneered in all-metal life rafts. You will note that frequent explanation is made that Globe production capacity was fully employed in the performance of its original contract. That any such claim is absolutely false and unwarranted I am prepared to demonstrate from the records of the company's production, and from the reliable representations made by the company to the U. S. M. C. from time to time since it entered production. These records are available from the company's and, also, from the Commission's files.

Admiral Land, in his letter of transmittal, emphasizes the importance of spreading the production as widely as possible. With this commendable policy no one will take exception. The record will indicate that I have been one of the foremost advocates for spreading Federal procurement just as widely as possible, so as to enlist the capacities of the thousands of America's smaller industries, and to insure that they will not be destroyed in this war emergency.

Admiral Land is unquestionably right in stating it as fixed policy that we must spread the work to minimize possible interruptions by strikes, break-downs, etc. But when we consider this question of distributing contracts, we ought to consider all the important factors. Will you please ask the M. C. Procurement Division if its first concern in this instance has been in spreading the work, or in getting the best possible life-saving equipment aboard our merchant vessels in the shortest possible time? Is the prime responsibility to save the greatest possible number of industries in the order of their ability to bring pressure through their Washington lobbies, or is it to save the greatest possible number of lives of imperiled American seamen? Is the Maritime Procurement Office supposed to be a glorified wartime W. P. A., or is it supposed to buy the very most it can get for the American taxpayers' money with which it has been entrusted?

Finally, is the Maritime Commission Procurement Office supposed to fly in the face of the specific orders and recommendations of the War Production Board and the War Manpower Commission and carry this spread-the-work policy to the point of placing contracts in areas of critical labor shortage which it has deliberately denied to competent producers in areas which have no critical labor problems? Does this spread-the-work policy go to the absurd extreme of shutting down a going producer, who has demonstrated his ability to deliver the goods, who has an established and experienced organization at work in a noncritical labor area, and who has a vast network of subcontractors in that same area, merely to toss new contracts into areas that have the most critical kind of a labor-shortage problem?

Let me refer you again to important facts in this program to procure improved type life rafts for our thousands of merchant vessels. Remember that Globe American Corporation designed, engineered, and developed an all-metal raft that was and is a vast contribution to safety at sea. Remember that actual models of this raft were tested and approved nearly 18 months ago. This special report says that the Maritime Commission very properly sought to establish other sources from which to procure all-steel rafts. With this effort to spread procurement, everyone, including the Globe company, fully agreed. From the very outset of this procurement program, in fact, the record will show that the Globe organization has willingly cooperated in making its design and engineering facilities and its production methods available to the Maritime Commission and to private companies desiring to enter the field of all-steel life-raft production.

Note particularly that the Maritime Commission at the outset of the all-metal raft procurement program allocated an important portion of this business to the Weber Showcase & Fixture Co., Los Angeles, Calif., and directed a large investment of public funds merely to duplicate production facilities already established through private capital and initiative by Globe.

I understand that some $300,000 of the people's money went into the Weber buildings and machinery, so that company could step into the procurement picture and throw my home-town company and my hundreds of neighbors out of business after they had pioneered the best life raft so far developed.

Note this striking contrast. Whereas this west coast concern has been aided and supported at great expense to the Government and the taxpayers, the Globe organization pioneered and developed the all-metal raft entirely at its own expense.

May I point out again, also, that this western producer copies the Globe designs and specifications exactly; and that its engineers visited the Globe plant to study and copy production methods worked out at no small private expense by the Globe organization. Globe has a real investment in all the engineering and development work necessary to make available this most advanced of all life rafts. That investment should quite properly be reflected in its prices. On the other hand, the Weber organization, thanks to Globe's pioneering work, has been able to avoid practically all engineering and development costs. Does it not stand to reason that a company operating under such a combination of fortuitous circumstances should be by far the lowest bidder on all-metal rafts in the entire field?

Note, then, the prices at which contracts have been let to this organization. See purchase order MC44-1430, August 13, 1943 (p. 950), base unit price $1,449 on 900 rafts. See MC44-19037 (p. 950), August 7, 1943, base unit price $1,549 on 133 rafts. See purchase order MC44-20553, September 2, 1943, base unit price $1,449 on 160 rafts. Now note the complete price, with full equipment, of $1,153 per unit paid to Globe on its basic contract, MC43-11758, April 15, 1943 (p. 950). Note that Globe has consistently underbid other potential raft builders, including Weber whenever it has been permitted to enter a bid. Note that on these three listed contracts alone, for a total number of rafts not quite sufficient to equip 1 vessel in 10 in our merchant fleet at its present strength, the Maritime Commission has paid or is paying to Weber well over a half million dollars more money than they could have secured the same identical Globe rafts for from the original designer and producer.

At this point I would like to call attention to two interesting items in the Commission's report. Note that the contracts for wooden rafts to be manufactured by the Peterson Manufacturing Co., Portland, Oreg., and steel rafts from the Weber Showcase and Fixture Co., San Francisco, Calif., dated August 7, 1943 (p. 950), are both at the identical price of $1,549 per unit. Incidentally, I understand that the Globe bid on this requirement was $1,175 per complete unit, $326 below the award figures. The two successful bidders are at widely separated points. They submitted bids on entirely different types of rafts, and for different quantities. Yet, the two contracts were awarded at identical figures. Is this an instance of collusion between these bidders, or did Maritime Commission reconcile differences in the proposals of these to suppliers by direct negotiations?

Note, also, purchase order MC-3380, December 14, 1943 (p. 955), in report of which the name of the successful bidder and the reasons for the award are withheld. In view of the fact that this order was for equipment for ships in production near San Francisco, may we presume that the order went to the Weber Co., which was apparently the nearest approved and recognized bidder? If so, should we not properly inquire how this company was any better prepared to accept orders (at an excess cost, of course, of more than $300 per unit) than Globe, which then had a large potential reserve capacity to produce?

We come now to a phase of this procurement program in which the Commission implies that the Smaller War Plants Corporation has exercised a determining influence, namely, the spreading of raft procurement as widely as possible. As stated at the outset, everyone without known exception agrees upon the advisability of spreading this work just as widely as practicable. Among the first to recognize the desirability of such work-spreading, and to advance a practicable plan to accomplish this end, was the Globe American Corporation, the Commission's first producer of advanced type rafts. Very early in this procurement program, Globe suggested a subcontract arrangement with companies to be mutually agreed upon, at locations to be determined by the Maritime Commission; Globe to fabricate the all-metal raft components, and the selected subcontractors to assemble and deliver the completed rafts.

If there was a sincere desire to spread work to benefit smaller industries and to insure continuous and uninterrupted supply, here certainly was a logical solution. Any number of small assembly plants right at the points of raft delivery could have been set up successfully under this plan. And under such an arrangement real savings could have been effected, for Globe offered to supply completed rafts on the east and Gulf coasts at $1,100 per unit, and on the west coast at $1,200 per unit. As evidence note the following telegram:

MAY 24, 1943.

C. E. WASH, Jr.,
Director, Procurement Division,
United States Maritime Commission,
Washington, D. C.

We quote eleven hundred dollars f. o. b. east coast or Gulf plant and twelve hundred dollars f. o. b. west coast plant for additional quantities of improved type life raft which we designed, and agree to subcontract all quantities in excess of 600 per month with responsible subcontractors to be mutually agreed upon and located wherever you wish. These prices subject to revision under our renegotiation agreement and costing Government less than duplicating the $200,000 tooling and engineering costs with several prime contractors. Total quantity of rafts required do not justify duplication of engineering and tooling expense and wasting 6 months of labor and material in more than one plant. Situation similar to Welin davits which have been procured from one contractor exclusively for equally good and sufficient reasons. Please advise.

ALDEN CHESTER,
Globe American Corporation.

I repeat that if it was the honest purpose of the Commission to divide its procurement program as widely as possible, and to aid smaller industries wherever possible, it must have arbitrarily closed its eyes to the most intelligent and practicable proposal to accomplish this program, which was actually developed and advanced not once, but repeatedly, by the company which pioneered so remarkably in other phases of this entire life-saving program.

Note purchase order MC43-17906 to the Jaeger Furniture Co., Los Angeles, for 110 Taylor wooden rafts at $1,868.81 per unit. In this instance the Maritime Commission paid almost double the Globe price, or an excess on this small order of $99,969.10 Without further reference to the comparative merits of the wooden raft and the Globe improved all-metal raft, this seems to be a grossly unwarranted unit price. Grouping all contracts with producers other than Globe prior to the War Shipping Administration replacement order of May 9, 1944, it appears that the Maritime Commission has paid, or is paying, slightly over $1,000,000 more than the same number of rafts of equal, if not far superior, quality would have cost from Globe.

The Maritime Commission memorandum definitely leaves the impression that Globe production capacity has been fully employed by its original contract. Such is not, and has not been, the case at any time since Globe went into line production in the early fall of 1943. Globe officials have assured me that any time within the past 7 or 8 months that company could have stepped up its production from 500 to 600 rafts monthly to double that figure.

Incidentally, had Globe been awarded additional production, had it been permitted to set up assembly sub-contractors, or had it been given reasonable assurances of orderly extension of its contract, it is reasonable to presume that its contract prices to the Maritime Commission might have been reduced. The company's ability to produce ahead of schedule has been demonstrated repeatedly. I am advised that actual stock piles of rafts have accumulated in shipyards. I understand, in fact, that Globe rafts have been shipped abroad for disposition in England when stocks here became excessive, and that stocks have been moved from one yard to another to relieve congestion. I know for a fact that as of June 13, one eastern yard is begging Globe and the Maritime to stop raft shipments because it now has on hand 140 spare rafts for which it has no spare storage space. I understand, also, that Globe has readily met any extra demands made upon it in cases where other producers may have failed to meet delivery schedules. The records will show too that Globe has at numerous times brought these facts to the attention of the Commission and has requested permission to increase or extend production.

Not only has the Globe organization demonstrated its ability to produce in greater volume, as previously mentioned; it has, also, proposed a subcontract arrangement through which raft components fabricated by Globe could be assembled at any designated point at finished prices well below those from any other known source. If there has ever been any question as to Globe's ability to increase production within its own facilities, this subcontract arrangement would have assured adequate production for any present or contemplated program. Such an arrangement should, also, have satisfied the policy of the Smaller War Plants Corporation in that it would have logically drawn any practicable number of smaller companies into the life raft program. Such an arrangement should have been particularly desirable for the obvious reason that it would have saved large investments in duplication of fabricating facilities.

Forgetting for the moment the strong presumption of irregularities within the United States Maritime Commission procurement, one fact stands out in startling clarity. Whether Jesse French of Smaller War Plants Corporation or the United States Coast Guard interfered with and confused the United States Maritime Commission procurement program or not, someone is guilty of almost criminal procrastination in equipping our merchant vessels with proper life rafts.

Eighteen months ago, Globe offered the raft which is today recognized by everyone, I believe, outside the lumber and wood processing industries as the finest and safest life raft in existence. In the period since February 7, 1942, we have built and assembled for operation by the War Shipping Administration a merchant fleet of more than 3,200 vessels. To provide that merchant fleet with the best available life saving equipment, the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration should have procured, as of this date, at least 14,000 rafts of Globe design or its equivalent. By the Maritime Commission's own report, however, you will note that orders for all improved type rafts to date total only some 7,500. While I do not have definite figures, it is my impression that less than half of these new type rafts have been delivered to shipyards by all producers.

You will notice, also, in this same report, at page 956, that it was not until May 9, just a month ago, that the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration finally got around to entering the first purchase orders for new type rafts to replace the entirely unsafe and inadequate old rafts now in use in the merchant fleet. Note that the original intention was to purchase 7,500 rafts in this replacement program, but that for reasons unexplained, the total number contracted for is only 1,000. Investigation would almost certainly reveal that it would take more than the 7,500 rafts contemplated to replace every old raft now in service. Providing a reasonable reserve for loss and destruction in service, the replacement needs must certainly be in excess of 10,000. Every day the procurement officials delay this replacement program, they are needlessly and wantonly endangering the lives of thousands of American merchant seamen. Incompetence and indecision here are actually costing the lives of brave men; and are no more to be condoned than we would forgive the War and Navy Departments for failure to provide the fighting forces with anything less than the very best weapons and supplies we know how to produce.

Why have the responsible procurement officials waited more than 1 full year from the time improved rafts were offered to place these replacement orders? Why are the initial orders for what appears to be only one-tenth of the actual requirements? What does Mr. C. E. Walsh, Jr., Procurement Director, mean in his letter of May 1, 1944, to Mr. Jesse French III (p. 960) when he says, "The requisition we have covers only 1,000 rafts and it is our understanding that the remaining will not be requisitioned until a new design is perfected? Are we to understand from this statement that the new type rafts contracted for over the period from April 15, 1943, to date are inadequate or unsatisfactory? May we assume from this that the procurement officials contemplate radical changes in the present improved type raft, or that they anticipate the introduction of some entirely new and different raft? Are we to assume that manufacturers now in volume production will be required to tear up their production lines and undertake extensive retooling? If so, how much longer is it actually going to be before we can expect to swing into a really adequate raft production program?

As I stated at the outset, the special report which the Maritime Commission has submitted not only fails to dispose of the questions which I raised originally, but actually strengthens my presumption that there are serious irregularities and shortcomings within the Procurement Division of the Maritime Commission. I am sure you will share my opinion that a most thoroughgoing investigation of the entire situation should be undertaken at the first practicable moment.

Sincerely yours,

FOREST A. HARNESS.

Veterans' Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN B. BENNETT
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, recently I received two letters in connection with my work as a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, which had under consideration the so-called G. I. bill of rights for returning war veterans. One of these letters is from Lisle H. Alexander, department adjutant of the American Legion, and the other from Francis M. Sullivan, executive director of the national legislative committee, and John Stelle, of the special committee on rehabilitation legislation for World War No. 2 veterans.

I include these letters herein:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
DEPARTMENT OF MICHIGAN,
Detroit, Mich., May 31, 1944.

Hon. JOHN B. BENNETT,
House of Representatives, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Time after time, when we have had occasion to write or telegraph you, it has been for the purpose of requesting your support upon legislation in which the American Legion is vitally interested.

During the recent months it has been a part of our program to make several contacts with you in connection with the American Legion G. I. bill of rights. You have been most courteous in acknowledging each contact made. This, we have appreciated. However, when the chips were down and you were asked to cast your vote on this important legislation you deemed it for the best interests of our country and citizens to favor the benefits provided in this bill.

We, as an organization, are very grateful for your action taken and feel that in this small way it is a privilege to express to you our thanks and appreciation for the part you played. We are equally confident that passage of this legislation and the resulting good will be a source of pride and satisfaction to you as well as to the American Legion.

It is my privilege to express these thoughts to you.

Yours very truly,

LISLE H. ALEXANDER, Department Adjutant.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1944.

Hon. JOHN B. BENNETT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The American Legion is most grateful to you for the earnest, intelligent consideration and effort you have given to S. 1767, which provides Government aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans.

It was gratifying to observe that the House of Representatives appreciated the work of your committee. This was reflected in the Members following the leadership of Chairman RANKIN and the committee members when the measure was up in the House for consideration.

Naturally, we of the American Legion are very proud of our part in this program. We feel when the measure becomes a law that the proper plans may be made for the day when the war will have been won and there will be "mass demobilization" of the present-day members of the armed forces.

We believe the privileges which will be afforded by the terms of S. 1767 to World War No. 2 veterans is a sound investment in the future of our Nation. The proposal represents an intelligent approach to the problem of readjustment in civilian life of the World War No. 2 veteran.

Again we express our appreciation for your splendid work in connection with S. 1767.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN STELLE,
Chairman, Special Committee on Rehabilitation Legislation World War No. 2 Veterans.

FRANCIS M. SULLIVAN,
Executive Director, National Legislative Committee.

International Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER F. GEORGE OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by H. S. Hallo, first secretary of the Netherlands Embassy, delivered before Kappa Beta Pi, Women's International League Honor Sorority.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The theme of this meeting is a very optimistic one because it presumes that international law in the past has been built on moral principles. It is true that in the modern human mind there is a strong feeling that international law can only be effective if it is based on generally accepted moral principles. The fact that this idea is more and more generally expressed in countries where a free exchange of opinion is possible holds a good promise for the future, but in the past the moral basis of international law, if present at all, has been a very weak one.

Let us have a look at the comparatively young history of international law. We may discern three periods in which the conception of international law was distinctly different. The first period extended roughly through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and was not based, as we might be inclined to think, on Grotius' De Jure Belli Ac Pacis—the law of war and peace. On the contrary, Grotius was far ahead of his time. His distinction between just and unjust wars certainly did not reflect the general conception of his contemporaries nor even of later generations.

In this first period people were much more frank about international law and openly conceded that it was purely based on power. There were no moral principles involved in the international law of those days which primarily consisted of certain rules observed by fully sovereign nations in dealing with each other. By far the greater part of these rules dealt with principles of protocol. Wars were considered to be legitimate means of obtaining what could not be acquired by diplomatic methods. War and the threat of war were the prolongation of diplomatic intercourse. However, even in that period there was a fairly general feeling that treaties and agreements had to be respected.

The second period, extending throughout the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century, aimed at the codification of international law. All congresses and treaties beginning with the Congress of Vienna and ending with the Covenant of the League of Nations and the ensuing Treaty of Locarno and the Kellogg Pact, created the impression of a general acceptance of laws and rules built on high moral principles, on the basis of which sovereign states would deal with each other. It all sounded beautiful but it proved to be a hothouse plant which could not but succumb after having been exposed to the open air. In this period, international law was respected and its rules worked well only as long as there was a balance of power. Power and not moral principles formed its basis, notwithstanding the beautifully constructed moral facade.

The International Court was established in The Hague. It was meant to be the tribunal of mankind where the conscience of humanity would be able to express itself. However, as all states were sovereign and were free to decide for themselves whether they wished to submit their differences with other states to the court, mainly the small nations availed themselves of the services of the Court. It should not be forgotten that the Court was highly successful in dealing with the cases brought before it, but the great political issues of the 1920's and thirties were not brought before the Court. Power politics prevented it.

A new conception of international law is in the process of being born in our days. This conception indeed wants international law to be based on moral principles, which should bind great and small powers alike. The ruthlessness of this present war, which is a total war involving all human beings, and the development of air power have made the world so small that there is an ever-growing desire for the creation of a general system of security, which must be based on a general acceptance of certain basic principles of morality and on a general recognition of human rights. I feel very strongly that this can only be accomplished by education. Children all over the world should be taught much more cultural history and less, what I would call, battle history. The educational system in most countries glorifies the battles fought and won by our ancestors. I don't mean to say that we should not have admiration for the courage of our ancestors, when they were prepared to sacrifice their lives for freedom, but I feel that not too much emphasis should be laid upon the battles as such. Young children learn to play with tin soldiers, tanks, planes, guns, and battleships; this is bound to glorify war in their susceptible minds.

How little, on the other hand, do we learn of the cultural life and accomplishments of other peoples. What do we know of the men whose inventions made possible the technical progress in our way of living? What do we know of the intellectual and religious currents of other peoples and of the authors, painters, composers who give expression to them? The knowledge of cultural history tends to bring peoples together, because the spirit of man wants to grow unhampered by frontiers. I, therefore, feel that the exchange of cultural and spiritual values should be as free as possible because it cannot but strengthen the moral fundamentals of international law.

I may, however, add to this a word of warning; no people should force upon another people its ideals and ideas. In a free world every people must have its own way of life just as every individual is free to live the life he chooses. If I say that no way of life should be forced upon another people, I simply express my aversion to political propaganda aimed at the imposition of a certain outlook on life upon a country which does not fit its historical evolution. There are only two basic principles, which all states should accept. First, the fundamental rights of the human being, as expressed in the "four freedoms."

Second, the willingness to respect the rights of other states and to refrain from violating the rules set for the intercourse between states. This, of course, includes that no preparation for aggression can or should be tolerated.

I may end by expressing my conviction that no international organization for the prevention of war can be successful if the human mind has not been educated to reject war as a means for the settlement of international disputes.

The Bonds Between the United States and the United Kingdom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. M. E. Bathurst, legal adviser to the British Embassy, before the Province Convention of Kappa Beta Pi, women's international legal honors sorority, on Saturday, June 17, 1944, at 8.30 p. m. at Washington Club, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It would be a great privilege at any time for a lawyer from my country to have the opportunity of addressing a legal association whose members include lawyers practicing both within and beyond the borders of the United States. I count it a special privilege to be asked to speak on the bonds between the United States and the United Kingdom, when a member of the English bar directs one of your association's provinces. I am always particularly glad to meet with lawyers of other countries, because I believe that it is only upon the foundation of an understanding between the ordinary citizens of nations that mutual respect and cooperation between governments can be founded. It is for this reason, as for many others, that we welcome in England today so many members of your gallant armed forces, who are for us both brothers in arms and ambassadors of goodwill.

When Edmund Burke said that "People will not look forward to posterity who never look backward to their ancestors," he was stating the proposition that we can never hope to understand a situation unless we know something of the history by which it was created. And so one may pause to think how it has come about that our two Nations which parted company in 1776, today stand side by side, fighting, with their other allies, against the forces of tyranny and oppression. It might appear remarkable to a Colonial subject of 1776 that today the soldiers of our two countries are advancing together across the fields of Normandy, pursuant to a plan worked out with care and skill by the leaders of our armed forces. He might think it strange that, apart from military strategy, five other crucial wartime activities of our countries are jointly regulated by combined boards of our two Governments: munitions, production, raw materials, food, and shipping. He might be surprised to know that we in England have enacted that criminal offenses committed against the local law by American service personnel shall be tried by United States courts martial to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the English courts. And that the British Government settles, as a mutual aid service, all civil claims made against members of the American armed forces in England in respect of accidents occurring in training or on maneuvers, through aircraft crashes, or otherwise in the course of duty.

This intermingling of our affairs is as natural as it is advantageous. It may be explained simply. Our two countries share common traditions and a common foundation of political faith. One who has practiced law in England and visits America cannot fail to be impressed at once by the similarity of the legal and political institutions of our two countries.

When the American people started on a century of westward expansion, they began a great story of adventure, perseverance, and daring. The Frontier, wrote Frederick Jackson Turner, was "a line, a region, a process * * * everywhere on the frontier civilization was being manufactured out of the raw material and personnel * * * each generation has in turn been able to challenge the social value of the common heritage and to modify its institutions to its shifting needs." It might have been thought that in a new country where forests had to be cleared before the bare means of existence could be wrested from a hitherto uncultivated soil, where each had to make good and make his place in the community by his own efforts, and where everything was in the future, the law of the old traditional community would be found inappropriate to the conditions and distasteful to the outlook of the new. But the English common law, with adaptations and modifications, was found adequate to this new task and became the center of your system as it remained the center of ours.

Everyone of your pioneers, however far he traveled, and in whatever regions he made his camp, held fast to certain concepts of right and justice, and so he made his camp, his village, his town, his territory, and ultimately his State, each squarely founded upon those concepts, which he had inherited and carried with him. In the early colonial history of Massachusetts there is recorded that an elected assembly broke out. It was not granted or decreed, it just appeared because it had to appear with that kind of people, with that kind of background. Wherever they went they began at once to imitate, as though in obedience to a natural law, the things they had left behind them on the western side of the Atlantic; the common law, Magna Carta, habeas corpus, the jury system, parliamentary tradition, and the spirit of representative institutions. All these things and much more belong to you by right of birth as fully as they do to us.

The law embodies the character and the outlook of the community. Law today is not thought of by the Englishman as something sent from Heaven or commanded by a sovereign, but as the result of the continued expression of the English people. Liberty consists not so much in the laws, but in the constant habits of the people. The frontier tradition of the United States was accordingly made up of that compromise between sturdy Anglo-Saxon individualism and the Norman tradition of orderliness which had found expression and fulfillment of the common law.

We see in your history and in ours repeated compromise between an excess of individualism and an excess of state control, a moderation which the common law embodied and to which the great documents of history—Magna Carta of Runnymede in 1215, our Petition of Right, the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights—gave expression. But more than all this and of equal significance, we have shared, as we share today, many international and domestic problems of a legal character. More significantly still our approach to the solution of those problems continues to be similar.

This is why each of our two countries finds interest in the progress of the law in the other. You will find striking differences, of course. The Constitution of the United States is remarkable for its brevity. Even if all its amendments are included, it contains only 7,000 words. The British Constitution is even shorter. Indeed European observers have been convinced that, being unwritten, it does not exist at all. It can be stated in six words: The King in Parliament is the supreme governing body. Any statute passed by both Houses of Parliament and ratified by the Royal Assent is absolutely binding on the courts.

You have abandoned, while we retain, the division of the legal profession into two branches—barristers and solicitors. In England no one may be a member of both branches at the same time. Barristers appear in the higher courts and receive their instructions (called briefs) from solicitors, to whom lay clients take their cases. A solicitor is largely limited to the office work involved in conveyancing and in the preparation of cases for trial, but he may appear before inferior courts. Barristers are more often specialists than are solicitors and much of their work takes the form of advice upon questions of law submitted by solicitors on behalf of clients.

But in spite of these distinctions between the legal and political institutions of our two countries, treatment of situations requiring legislative solution and the development of our case-law are very similar. If you look at our wartime statutes you will find that we both have similar problems and that the solutions in many cases are also similar. For example, we suffer from a vast amount of legislation made by the executive under powers delegated to it by the legislative powers, a phenomenon, I am told, not unknown to your legal system. This is a necessary evil of war and perhaps to a less degree of our complex peacetime economy. But the individual is protected against bureaucratic government by the power of Parliament to revoke these delegated powers and to annul regulations made by the executive, within 28 days of their promulgation. The executive has been given power to legislate as necessary or expedient for securing the public safety and the prosecution of the war, and all persons were required "to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of the king." The executive is accountable to parliament for the taking and the exercise of these powers, and answerable in the courts for acts beyond their scope. These wide powers have been used with restraint. For example, when we passed legislation penalizing the incitement of any strike among persons engaged in the performance of essential services, the regulation contained two provisos to make it clear that freedom of action and freedom of speech were curtailed only beyond the limit where their exercise constitutes an abuse, prejudicing the nation's war effort. The regulation provided that no offense is committed by any person merely because he withholds his own skill and labor from a particular job, and a labor-union official is not liable in respect of anything which he says at a properly convened meeting of a union.

These are examples of the way in which individual liberty is sought to be preserved in our solution of many pressing wartime problems, just as you have done.

And so it is natural that by virtue of our common heritage and similar approach to problems, we find ourselves again side by side, united against tyranny. Many things which our two countries share, we share also with the other United Nations. This war can be summarized in a simple proposition of peculiar significance to lawyers; it is a war against a rule of force, which has been temporarily imposed upon the world by the Axis Powers, and a war for the reestablishment, more firmly than before, of a rule of law among nations.

The United Nations by virtue of their common traditions and as a result of their common resistance to the antithesis of law, have developed a sufficient body of common ideas about what constitutes justice and legality. It remains for these ideas to be given effective expression and for machinery to be set up to make them work. Few will question the necessity of embodying these ideas about international morality in some kind of international legal system. Few will question the necessity of an international law dealing not only with the mutual obligations of governments but also with their obligations to the people of the world as a whole. That is, an international law with an authority to enforce it and throughout the world a conscience and an attitude to sanction it. Ultimately the only guaranty of law is public opinion. If the public conscience is against some practice or principle no set of laws or policies, no police organization in the world can enforce it for very long. This is one reason why the Axis war against the public conscience could never succeed in the long run. But it does not mean that victory in this war will be automatic and that the post-war world will readjust itself without anybody's help. We need more than the demonstration that revolt against the public conscience will not succeed forever; we need a positive scheme to embody the public conscience in a legal code that will work and can be enforced.

This is a challenge to all lawyers who believe that the law embodies the ideas of justice and right held by those within the community. This is not beyond us.

So far as the future of your country and mine is concerned, I cannot do better than to quote what Mr. Churchill said more than a year ago in the Guildhall which, though scarred by bombs, still stands, in the very center of London:

"Upon the fraternal association and intimate alinement of policy of the United States and the British Commonwealth and Empire depends more than on any other factor the immediate future of the world.

"If they walk, or if need be march, together in harmony and in accordance with the moral and political conceptions to which the English-speaking peoples have given birth, and which are frequently referred to in the Atlantic Charter, all will be well."

With this association between our two countries as an example, we must seek closer ties between us and with the other United Nations. We should encourage media through which the lawyers of the United Nations may meet and exchange ideas. If this is a war to reestablish the rule of law among nations, it is the duty of the lawyers of the nations, with the sword of justice at their head, to form the vanguard in the forward march of civilization "to broader lands and better days."

Communism in the C. I. O.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, inspired by international Communists, revolutionary Socialists, Syndicalists, and an assorted variety of social reform crackpots, fellow travelers, brave-new-world, starry-eyed dreamers, dangerous un-American alien radicals, and other diverse subversive elements, the C. I. O. Political Action Committee has instituted a campaign in the coming elections to take over the control of the Government of the United States. This movement is part and parcel of a world-wide scheme to install international communism in every nation on earth of which the P. A. C. is the instrument here in America. For this purpose, the Communist Party has been ostensibly liquidated and its leadership, important executives, strategists, propagandists, and political quacks, pawns, and stooges have transferred their activities to the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

The Communist technique predominates in all the activities of this group and aims to reduce all Members of Congress to the status of servile rubber stamps. No holds are barred. No rules are followed. No ethics or honor are respected. Misrepresentation, lies, slurs, smears, and shake-downs are the methods openly and notoriously pursued. Slush funds are collected from the hard earnings of poor workers who are taxed $1 apiece or more to finance the campaign of the opposition in most cases against their will and because they are subjected to various subtle forms of coersion and threats. Intellectual radicals, high-pressure men and professional agitators, experienced in Moscow front-line Communist Party organization activities are imported into our congressional districts, secretly and anonymously, to write speeches for the "Sacred Cow" candidates, prepare literature, pamphlets, posters, and letters and in general to direct the campaign of noisy, Union Square agitation and brazen misrepresentation of the records of incumbent congressmen. In fact, over 80 percent of the present membership of the House of Representatives is under attack by P. A. C.

This type of campaign has already begun in the third district. Since I believe that every voter and every true American citizen is entitled and ought to know the communistic and subversive character and background of this opposition, I am including as part of my remarks certain pertinent excerpts from the report of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. I urge everyone to read this important material and to take stern warning from it. Your Government is in danger. Americans! Awake!

The American form of government, the American economic system, the American way of life—free worship, free religious, social, and political institutions—are gravely threatened by these radical reptiles seeking to communize America. They are smart, experienced, plausible, and alert. They have unlimited financial resources which no candidate for Congress can possibly match. They will stoop to every trickery and chicanery to accomplish their diabolical aims.

Let all Americans, regardless of party, race, creed, or station in life, rise up against this alien menace and smash it once for all. Let us stand behind our gallant boys while they are away by defending and preserving the freedom and representative government for which they fight. I repeat, let us defeat and smash these un-American forces of evil and destruction. Let us keep our Congress and our country free.

In these efforts we will surely have the support and help of the honest, patriotic laboring men and women in and out of the rank and file of the C. I. O., whose loyalty and devotion to our country and its institutions can never be questioned and is second to none.

The excerpts referred to follow:

COMMUNISM IN THE C. I. O.

Two men, more than any others, were responsible for the split in the ranks of organized labor which led to the creation of the C. I. O. Those two men are John L. Lewis and Sidney Hillman.

In 1938 and 1939, the Special Committee on Un-American Activities did all that was humanly possible within the scope of its powers to warn John L. Lewis and other leaders of the C. I. O. that the Communists were moving in on their organization en masse. Their only response to the committee was silence or abusive language.

On February 29, 1944, John L. Lewis made a public statement concerning Communists in the C. I. O. (New York Times, February 29, 1944, p. 1). Belated as this statement may be, it confirms in toto what the Special Committee on Un-American Activities found 5 years ago and what it finds today. Lewis' statement, as quoted in the New York Times, reads as follows:

"When I was organizing the C. I. O., we picked up a lot of Communists in one unit after another as we grew—including Harry Bridges. But if I had not resigned the chairmanship and left the C. I. O. in 1940, I can tell you the Communists would have been weeded out of the C. I. O. long before now. Instead, as anyone might expect who has seen them throw their weight around inside labor organizations, the Communists dominate the C. I. O. today.

"Philip Murray is today the prisoner of the Communists in his own union. They control him and the C. I. O. through their seats on his executive committee. And there isn't a blessed thing he can do about it.

"Sidney Hillman is just as badly off. Both of them have got to play ball with the Communists now, or die.

"As heroic Russia battles against our German enemy in Europe, the Communists in our labor movement naturally hang on to the coattails of the Red Army and try to build an ideological bridge between our loyalty to Russia and their own pet schemes. This is a sheer abuse of our good will toward Russia. And, of course, the Communists in our labor unions are not even good Russians.

"What good citizen is not for a Russian victory over Germany in this war? Yet the Communists in the unions play hard on the trick idea that America cannot fight side by side with Russia and at the same time fight against American Communists and fellow travelers here. That is an outrageous contention."

The Special Committee on Un-American Activities finds that Communist leadership is strongly entrenched in the following unions which are at present affiliated with the C. I. O.:

American Communications Association; International Federation of Architects, Engineers, Chemists, and Technicians; International Fur and Leather Workers Union; International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union; International Union of Fishermen and Allied Workers of America; International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers; International Woodworkers of America; Marine Cooks and Stewards Association of the Pacific Coast; National Maritime Union of America; State, County, and Municipal Workers of America; Transport Workers Union of America; United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing, and Allied Workers of America; United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America; United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers of America; United Federal Workers of America; United Furniture Workers of America; United Gas, Coke, and Chemical Workers of America; United Office and Professional Workers of America; United Packinghouse Workers of America; United Shoe Workers of America; and United Stone and Allied Products Workers of America.

The foregoing unions constitute a majority of all the unions affiliated with the C. I. O. It will be noted that these unions cover fields in which the most vital interests of the American Nation are involved—shipping, munitions, and communications, for example. It is a startling fact that these fields have their hundreds of thousands of employees organized under the leadership of Communists.

COMMUNISTS IN TRADE-UNIONS

It is not our purpose in this report to enter into any lengthy discussion of the underlying theories which guide the Communists in their efforts to gain control of unions. There is a voluminous literature on that subject which the Communists themselves have published, which we cannot deal with here.

Nevertheless, a few citations from this Communist literature will throw light upon their union activities as they are now conducted through the C. I. O. Politcal Action Committee and as they were conducted during the wave of political and sabotage strikes prior to the dissolution of the Stalin-Hitler pact.

The official program of the Communist International, which William Z. Foster, head of the American Commmunist Party, testified before the committee that he accepted, has the following to say about the place of trade-unions in Communist objectives:

"It is particularly important for the purpose of winning over the majority of the proletariat, to gain control of the trade-unions, which are genuine mass working-class organizations closely bound up with the everyday struggles of the working class. To work in reactionary trade-unions and skillfully to gain control of them, to win the confidence of the broad masses of the industrially organized workers, to change and 'remove from their posts' the reformist leaders, represent important tasks in the preparatory period."

In other words, it is the declared program of the Communist Party to do its utmost to gain control of the trade-unions in the period preparatory to its planned revolution.

To this end, the official program of the Communist International—to which Earl Browder, general secretary of the Communist Party, also avowed his loyalty under oath before the committee—also states:

"It is the bounden duty of every Communist to belong to a trade-union, even a most reactionary one, provided it is a mass organization. Only by constant and persistent work in the trade-unions and in the factories for the steadfast and energetic defense of the interests of the workers, together with ruthless struggle against the reformist bureacracy, will it be possible to win the leadership in the workers' struggle and to win the industrially organized workers over the side of the party."

An early declaration of the Communist Party in the United States laid down a principle which has from the beginning guided its policy in the trade unions. That declaration said:

"The labor unions must be revolutionized; they must be won for the class struggle against capitalism."

Concerning trade-unions, Stalin wrote, in one of his many books published by the Communist Party in the United States, that "they constitute a school of communism."

DISSOLUTION OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY AND C. I. O. POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE

Early in the present year, the national committee of the Communist Party announced that it had decided to dissolve the party, as such, and to transform it into an organization with some such name as the American Communist Political Association. Earl Browder immediately delivered a speech in which he elaborated this decision. This Communist maneuver, for that was all it amounted to, was a first-class news story.

The immediate significance of the party's dissolution is that during the 1944 elections Communists will throw their entire weight into the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Their political leader will be, in effect, Sidney Hillman instead of Earl Browder. They will attempt, indeed are already attempting, to do by stealth and subterfuge through the C. I. O. Political Action Committee what they have failed to do when functioning as a political party under their own name.

Communists have long been entrenched in the leadership of most of the unions which are affiliated with the C. I. O. They now aspire to more complete political control over that fraction of organized labor (C. I. O.) which numbers several million voters.

Lenin explained these Communist tactical maneuvers fully in connection with the First World War. In his Letter to American Workmen, Lenin said that he entered into the fullest collaboration with a French imperialist, monarchist general when he felt that the cause of communism was helped thereby, although both he and the French general knew that they would try to hang each other when the collaboration had ceased.

Communists will denounce or embrace anything or anybody, depending solely on whether or not they hope for an advantage from their course of action. They have denounced and embraced America's participation in the present war. They have declared with all the passion of the crusading fanatic that "the Yanks were not coming," and then with equal passion that "the Yanks were not coming to late"—both within the space of days and hours. They have denounced John L. Lewis and embraced him and then denounced him again. To non-Communist innocents these reversals appear to be evidence of a ridiculous instability on the part of the Communists. They are, in fact, only examples of the Communists' tactical maneuvering.

That the proposed dissolution of the Communist Party is a purely tactical move and has nothing remotely to do with a renunciation of Marxism or communism or the party's inglorious past is made clear by the editors of the New Masses (Communist Party weekly). The editors of this Communist publication explode the naïveté of those writers who jumped to the conclusion that the Communist Party had renounced communism. Speaking of the speech by Earl Browder and the decision of the national committee of the Communist Party on the subject of the dissolution of the party, the editors of the New Masses declare that "they are an example of creative Marxism * * *" and further that "they are a brilliant example of Marxist thinking, rich and subtle * * *." Creative Marxism, as the Communist Party has always interpreted it from Lenin's time down to the present, means tactical maneuvering to gain temporary and partial advantages as well as fanatically keeping the ultimate goal of communism always in mind (if not in speech). This, then, is the self-proclaimed meaning of the decision of the national committee of the Communist Party to transform itself into an American Communist Political Association. Those who view it otherwise are being hoodwinked by their own (not the Communists') wishful thinking.

VOTING CHARTS OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY AND THE C. I. O. POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE

One of the methods by which the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is at present carrying out its attack upon the Congress of the United States is the use of a chart which shows how the Members of the House of Representatives have voted on 20 measures.

There is, of course, absolutely nothing amiss, subversive, or otherwise improper about giving the widest publicity to the way in which a Member of the House of Representatives casts his vote. Any citizen or any group of citizens is at liberty to pass judgment upon a Member of Congress on the basis of his voting record. Indeed, it is eminently fitting that this should be done. Members of Congress except to be judged on their voting records.

But the important fact about the voting chart which is now in use by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is that it is absolutely identical with the voting chart now being used by the Communist Party for the same purpose. Both groups have selected the same 20 measures for passing judgment upon Members of Congress. In other words, the political views and philosophy of the Communist Party and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee coincide in every detail. The Communist Party's judgment for or against a member of Congress is based upon grounds which are absolutely identical with the grounds used by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in deciding for or against a member.

It is also significant to note that the overwhelming majority of the Members of the House of Representatives are blacklisted on the basis of this chart which is now being circulated by the Communist Party and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. More than 75 percent of the Members of the House fail to pass the test which is based upon their voting records on the arbitrarily chosen 20 measures.

It is not at all surprising that the voting charts of the Communist Party and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee should coincide completely. It is not, however, a case of mere coincidence. It could hardly be otherwise when there is such an extensive overlapping of personnel in the two organizations.

While Members of Congress do not object to the publicizing of their records such is not true of the leaders of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. They have used every influence within their powers to prevent the issuance of this report. Most of them do not wish their Communist records, together with the seditious nature of those records, exposed to the light of day by a committee of the Congress.

We have already referred to the fact that the 20 measures used in the voting charts of the Communist Party and of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee were arbitrarily chosen. In the period covered by these 20 measures, the House of Representatives voted on thousands of measures. Just why the 20 were selected out of these thousands is far from clear. It is interesting to note further that these voting charts are being circulated in a pamphlet entitled "Keeping Score to Win the War." It would be difficult for any other than a devious mind, employing the most devious logic, to consider any one of the 20 measures as a "win the war" measure. Voting records on the declarations of war, on appropriations for Army and Navy, on lend-lease, and a hundred other measures which have to do with winning the war are not included in the charts of the Communist Party and of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. It is obvious, of course, just why the real "win the war" measures are omitted from these charts. If they were included, the record would show how unanimously and by what complete bipartisan unity the Congress of the United States has supported the war effort. But the Communists and the C. I. O. Political Action leaders do not wish that all-important fact to be brought to the attention of the American people. They wish, on the contrary, to disseminate the utterly false and slanderous notion that in the Congress of the United States there is an overwhelming majority, including many outright "Hitler agents," who do not want to win the war and who have, therefore, by their votes played the part of defeatists and obstructionists. The American people will not, of course, be deceived by this false and malicious propaganda of the Hillman-Communist conspiracy which is calculated to destroy the legislative branch of our Government.

In order that it may be made perfectly clear how far removed from either the question of winning the war or the question of labor most of the 20 measures of the charts actually are, we list them herewith:

1. The Hobbs antiracketeering bill.
2. The Connally-Smith antistrike bill.
3. Overriding President's veto of the Connally-Smith bill.
4. The Ramspeck Federal pay bill.
5. Lifting the $25,000 net ceiling placed on salaries by the President.
6. Federal income-tax bill.
7. No incentive payments to farmers.
8. Incentive payments for farmers.
9. No incentive payments to farmers.
10. No funds for crop insurance.
11. Support of rural-electrification program.
12. Liquidate Home Owners' Loan Corporation.
13. No funds for roll-back of prices.
14. Reduce funds for O. P. A. enforcement.
15. Putting big business in charge of O. P. A.
16. Abolish the domestic branch of O. W. I.
17. Create the Smith committee.
18. Continue the Dies committee.
19. Dismiss Watson, Dodd, and Lovett.
20. Anti-poll-tax bill.

In addition to the fact that most of the measures indicated by the foregoing list have little or nothing to do with labor or winning the war, there is also the fact that some of the headings in the list above are deliberately misleading. For example, measure No. 15 is described as "Putting Big Business in Charge of O. P. A."

The committee has documents in its possession which show that there has been an identity of wording in the attacks upon individual Members of Congress made by the Communist Party and by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. For example, the Voters Fact Book published by the Illinois State Committee of the Communist Party in the summer of 1943, says the following concerning an individual Member of the House of Representatives: "He has run up a record as an obstructionist, antiadministration, Red-baiting Congressman." One of the branches of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee uses the identical language concerning the same Member of the House in one of the circulars which it has just issued. Such identity of language could not be accidental.

NEIL BRANT

Neil Brant (also known as Brandt) is the international representative of the Washington office of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, one of the C. I. O. affiliates in which scores of well-known Communists such as William Sentner, James Matles, and Julius Emspak occupy important strategic positions.

Neil Brant writes frequently for his union's paper, the U. E. News. Few union papers are giving as much space to the C. I. O. Political Action Committee as the U. E. News, and few unions are working as energetically for the C. I. O. Political Action Committee as the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America. Neil Brant, as international representative of his union in Washington, is participating fully in this enthusiasm for the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

The Communist record of Neil Brant is an open book. It is, furthermore, indicative of the nature of the pretended patriotism of so many of the outstanding leaders of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

On February 14, 1941, Neil Brant was arrested and charged with "defiling the United States flag" in the State of New Jersey. His police description attached to the record of his arrest reads as follows:

"White, male, 37, 5 feet 6 inches, 145 pounds, gray eyes, dark brown, gray hair, slim build, sallow complexion, small mustache; occupation, labor organizer; birthplace, Russia."

This Russian-born traitor of 1941 and "patriot" of 1944 is a part of Sidney Hillman's political machine for 1944 elections. It will be noted, of course, that Brant's arrest for defiling the United States flag occurred during the period of the Stalin-Hitler pact when the American Peace Mobilization was engaged in its Nation-wide seditious activities and when the Communist Party of the United States was lending every possible aid to Hitler by obstructing the Nation's military-preparedness program. Brant's attitude toward the United States flag during that period accurately reflected the Communist Party's views as they have been expressed throughout most of the party's 25-year history in this country. For example, when William Z. Foster, national chairman of the Communist Party, was a witness before a committee of Congress, he was asked the following question:

"Do you owe allegiance to the American flag? Does the Communist Party owe allegiance to the American flag?"

After some sparring, Foster replied:

"And all capitalists flags are flags of the capitalist class, and we owe no allegiance to them."

In the Daily Worker of July 14, 1936, page 5, there appears the following question: "Should Communists salute the American flag?" And the Daily Worker answered: "Our flag is the red flag of the international working class." Also: when one of the leading members of the Communist Party returned from the Soviet Union, he engaged in a demonstration during which he clashed with the local police, and this Communist's own account of his words was published in the Daily Worker, as follows:

"I told the police to hell with the United States of America flag. I said that the flag I claimed was the one with the hammer and sickle, the red flag, which we will have someday."

On December 15, 1940, the New Jersey State Industrial Council had before it a resolution which read as follows:

"The council condemns the dictatorships and totalitarianism of nazi-ism, communism, and fascism as inimical to the welfare of labor, and destructive of our form of government."

Brant led the fight to delete "communism" from the resolution.

Neil Brant is a member of the executive board of the National Federation of Constitutional Liberties, one of the most influential of the Communist Party's fronts of recent years, and also an organization which the Attorney General named as subversive.

In 1937, the International Labor Defense set up a trade union advisory committee of which Neil Brant was a member (Labor Defender, October 1937, p. 18). The International Labor Defense, as almost everyone knows by this time, is the legal arm of the Communist Party.

In 1941, the Communists established a school in New York City which was known as the School for Democracy (now merged with the Workers School into the Jefferson School of Social Science). Neil Brant was a lecturer at the School for Democracy.

There is no doubt whatever of Neil Brant's allegiance to communism nor of his using his strategic position in his union and in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee to advance the cause of communism.

JULIUS EMSPAK

One of the top men in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is Julius Emspak, secretary-treasurer of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America (C. I. O.), and in this capacity he was present at a political action conference held at the Hotel Warwick, in Philadelphia, on July 18, 1943. He is now also the editor of the U. E. News, official organ of the union.

Emspak's record as a Communist is established by his subservience to the line of the Communist Party on numerous issues, by his position of leadership in a Communist-controlled union, and by the Communist character of the U. E. News, official organ of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, under his editorship.

It has been estimated that three-fourths of the 570,000 workers in the U. E. R. M. W. A. are employed in defense industries, manufacturing such important war materials as aircraft and marine equipment, parts for tanks and guns, torpedoes, gun sights, range finders, sound detectors, altimeters, gyroscopes, radio equipment, gages, aerial cameras, motors, and cartridges. In 1943 the union claimed 970 collective agreements with such important defense manufacturing concerns as Westinghouse Electric with 75,000 employees, General Electric with 120,000 employees, General Motors with 30,000 employees, Radio Corporation of America with 12,000 employees, Fairchild Aerial Camera Co., Liquidometer Corporation, Colt Patent Fire Arms, Phelps Dodge Copper Products, Remington Rand, Babcock & Wilcox, Electric Dynamic, National Radio Tube, Union Switch & Signal, and U. S. Cartridge Co.

Communist control af the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America has been demonstrated by its activity and by the testimony of competent authority. At its September 1941 convention in Camden, N. J., the organization repudiated a resolution permitting local unions to exclude Communists, Nazis, and Fascists from office. When this resolution was presented to the general executive board by James B. Carey only two of its members supported him. Carey was charged with "Red-baiting" and was defeated for the presidency because he refused to back down on the issue. The convention adopted, by a vote of 789 to 377, a motion to bar only those who have been found guilty of "acts against the Nation or against the union." Carey's adherents characterized this proposal as a meaningless "straddle," since defendants would thus be judged by a stacked Red jury (New York Times, September 6, 1941, p. 16).

Prior to the break between Stalin and Hitler, the Communist leaders in the U. E. R. M. W. A. took the view that the British war effort should not be supported against Hitlerism. Anti-Communist forces in the convention sought to condemn the United Electrical News as Communist, charging that the policy of the paper shifted with the Communist Party line. The policy of the paper was vigorously defended by Julius Emspak, its editor (New York Times, September 5, 1941, p. 23). Following this fight in which the lines between the Communists and the anti-Communists had been sharply drawn, Julius Emspak was elected as secretary-treasurer, and James J. Matles was chosen as national organizational director, both identified with the Communist wing of the union (New York Times, September 4, 1941, p. 1).

The United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, in which Emspak and Matles have been the real directing spirits, grew out of the Steel and Metal Workers Industrial Union, affiliate of the Trade Union Unity League, which has been characterized as under complete Communist control by Attorney General Francis Biddle in his decision on the case of Harry Bridges. Matles was secretary of the metal and machinery division of the Steel and Metal Workers Industrial Union (Labor Unity, December 1934, p. 16). He gave his open support to the Communist Party in 1933 (Daily Worker, November 6, 1933, p. 2). James Lustig, now organizer for district 4 of the U. E. R. M. W. A., was formerly an organizer for the Steel and Metal Workers Industrial Union. He also endorsed the Communist Party in 1933. Among the Communists now occupying leading positions of the U. E. R. M. W. A. are Ruth Young, Neil Brant, William Sentner, Louis Joel, James MacLeish, Fred Keller, Nellie Lederman, Victor Decavitch, Clifford Saunders, Henry Fiering, Arthur Goldstein, Joseph Kress, Dick Neibur, Joseph Garner, Frank Mance, Kermit Kirkendall, Eugene Rinehart, Ernest DeMaio, Abraham J. Isserman, Saul C. Waldbaum, Sam Cantor, Coleman Taylor, Fred Gardner, Fred Hough, Tom Malloy, Logan Burkhart, Theodore Wright, Nick Storko, Mike Petanovich, Robert Logsden, Charles Rivers, James Lerner, William Mauseth, Hilliard Smith, and Steve Adams.

Benjamin Stolberg in his Story of the C. I. O. wrote that—

"In the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers Union * * * where the Stalinists and their allies are in power, they term all opposition disruptive, undemocratic, 'Trotskyite,' silencing all criticism through frame-ups, steam-roller methods, character assassination, and plain hooliganism in meetings" (p. 149).

On the basis of evidence submitted to the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, this committee found "Communist leadership entrenched in the * * * United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America" (Report, Jan. 3, 1940, p. 13).

With the full knowledge of the international officers of the U. E. R. M. W. A. and without public criticism by them, the following officers of the organization endorsed Israel Amter, Communist candidate for Governor of New York State: Anthony Composto, James Tren, Claire Zimmerman, Harold Simon, Alvin Van Arsdale, Victor Teich, Rudolf Grimm, and John Lemarese (Daily Worker, Oct. 27, 1942, p. 5).

With similar frankness, Local 448 of Union City, N. J., endorsed the Daily Worker and the Worker, official Communist organs, on November 8, 1943, as "the best labor papers in the country." The letter with clippings showing the publicity given the U. E. R. M. W. A. was published in the Worker of November 28, 1943, page 5. During 7 days of the U. E. R. M. W. A. convention, these two papers had given the union 367 inches of space according to a union tabulation. The Worker of September 20, 1942, page 4, devoted a full page to the convention of the U. E. R. M. W. A. and particularly to its resolution condemning red baiting as the chief instrument of Nazi oppression and of the pro-Fascist fifth column of America.

Locals of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America marched openly in the Communist May Day parades of 1938, 1939, 1940, and 1941, together with the Communist Party, the International Labor Defense, and other organizations in the Communist solar system. On April 17, 1943, page 5, the U. E. News, edited by Julius Emspak, called upon all members to attend the May 2 demonstration in Yankee Stadium, New York City, which took the place of the usual Communist May Day parade and demonstration.

The following news item appearing in the Daily Worker of February 5, 1937, page 4, is typical of U. E. R. M. W. A. personnel:

"James Lewis, 22, vice president of District 12 of the United Electrical and Radio Workers and a member of the Communist Party, died late Wednesday night following a pneumonia attack.

"Lewis, who was a member of the Young Communist League for 5 years before joining the Communist Party, was an outstanding leader in the Electrical Union."

Both Julius Emspak and the organization which he leads have followed with precision the circumlocutions of the Communist Party line. Prior to the signing of the Stalin-Hitler pact, when the Communist Party was beating the drums for collective security against the Fascist aggressors, James B. Carey, president of the U. E. R. M. W. A., was a delegate to the American Congress for Peace and Democracy, a Communist front advocating collective security, and a member of the national labor committee of the American League for Peace and Democracy, formed at that Congress. We have in our files a typical leaflet of Local 1225, U. E. R. M. W. A., calling upon all workers in the industry to participate in the parade of the American League for Peace and Democracy, August 6, 1938, in New York City. Carey also supported organizations with the same aims, such as the Committee for Concerted Peace Efforts and the Committee for Peace Through World Cooperation. There is no doubt that he was expressing the will of the Communist leaders of his organization in so doing.

After Stalin signed his pact with Hitler, the Communist-led Committee to Defend America by Keeping Out of War, the Emergency Peace Mobilization, and later the American Peace Mobilization came forth to oppose the national defense program, lend-lease, conscription, and other "warmongering" efforts. Julius Emspak was a sponsor of the Committee to Defend America by Keeping Out of War (letterhead, August 10, 1940). He later became a member of the national council of the American Peace Mobilization.

The Communist steam roller in the U. E. R. M. W. A. had no trouble in getting the union to perform the same flip-flop. At its seventh convention held at the Hotel Hollenden in Cleveland in September 1940 the 700 delegates heard the war denounced as "imperialist" and as a struggle between two thieves. They were called upon to cooperate with the coming meeting of the Emergency Peace Mobilization in Chicago and with its proposed march on Washington against conscription. The officers' report, signed by Julius Emspak as secretary-treasurer, declared that the Second World War began as the result of "rivalries and national ambitions that had been ripening for more than a score of years in Europe." The convention sent word to the President that conscription "involves a very definite departure from the basic principles of the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence" (Daily Worker, September 4, 1940, p. 1; September 5, 1940, p. 1).

Emspak and his associates proceeded to put this program into concrete form in the U. E. R. M. W. A. A case in point is the April 1940 membership activities committee bulletin of Local 475 of Brooklyn which displayed on its cover the notorious "Yanks Are Not Coming" cartoon widely reprinted in the Communist press.

Simon Gerson, reporter for the Daily Worker, estimated that 100 locals of the U. E. R. M. W. A. were represented at the American Peoples Meeting on April 5–6, 1941, in New York City (Sunday Worker, April 13, 1941, p. 1, sec. 2). The American Peoples Meeting was the name chosen for its national convention by the seditious American Peace Mobilization.

While it is not the purpose or the province of our committee to enter into the question of wage demands, the question comes within the jurisdiction of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities when such demands are merely a cover for subversive designs calculated to interfere with national security and war production. It was avowedly this consideration which moved the President to send Federal troops to intervene in the strike of the Vultee Aircraft workers, a step denounced by the U. E. News of April 10, 1941, pages 23 and 24, edited by Julius Emspak. It was no accident therefore that the U. E. R. M. W. A. set in motion a general strike campaign throughout the industry in October 1940, a month after the meeting of the American Peace Mobilization.

Members of the American Peace Mobilization joined in supporting two strikes of the U. E. R. M. W. A. and aided in picketing the Pennsylvania Manufacturing Co. and the Emerson Radio Co. of Brooklyn, N. Y. (A. P. M. Volunteer, May 3, 1941, p. 4). Virgil Mason, U. E. R. M. W. A. leader at the Dohler Die Casting Co, was a member of the national council of the American Peace Mobilization. Albert Stonkus, business representative of Local 475, James Garry, organizer of Local 1227, and Edward Matthews, president of Local 1207, were members of the national labor committee of the American Peace Mobilization.

Immediately after Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union, the line of Julius Emspak and the U. E. R. M. W. A. made a remarkable turn toward all-out support of the war effort. The officers' report signed by Julius Emspak to the seventh annual convention of the U. E. R. M. W. A. held in Camden, N. J., in September 1941, demanded that the union take "every step necessary to crush Hitlerism," and announced that all disagreements in the union on foreign policy had been removed since the Nazis invaded Russia (New York Times, September 2, 1941, p. 1).

At the ninth convention of the U. E. R. M. W. A., held in September 1943, at the Hotel New Yorker in New York City, a 30-page report was submitted by the national officers, including Julius Emspak, calling for the opening of a western front and insisted that "we are fighting to establish the kind of a world in which working men and women all over the world will be able to find just and peaceful solutions for the problems common to us all" (Daily Worker, September 14, 1943, p. 1).

Julius Emspak became an enthusiastic member of the President's Labor Victory Committee and is a frequent visitor at the White House.

Demonstrating conclusively that former wage demands were incident to the Communist Party line, Emspak and his fellow national officers of the U. E. R. M. W. A. now declare that their "members are willing to abstain from their just demand for a general cost-of-living wage rise at this time" (Washington Post, Feb. 25, 1943, p. 16).

As editor of the U. E. News, Emspak gives clear expression of his Communist sympathies. Almost every issue carries some laudatory article dealing with the Soviet Union. The paper has advocated the lifting of deportation proceedings against Harry Bridges (March 6, 1943, p. 7). It has defended Stanley Nowak, of Detroit, charged by the Department of Justice with being a Communist and with falsification of his naturalization papers (Feb. 20, 1943, p. 12). The paper has defended the Oklahoma Communist cases (May 29, 1943, p. 8). A member of its staff is none other than James Lerner, formerly on the staff of Fight, official organ of the American League Against War and Fascism, and later the American League for Peace and Democracy.

It is significant to note Emspak's attitude toward the Congress of the United States, an attitude typical of the Communist Party and the Daily Worker. In his issue of the U. E. News of February 20, 1943, page 6, he denounced this body as "presently dominated by a bloc of Hooveritcs, poll-taxers, defeatists, and open defenders of treason and sedition."

Emspak is one of the outstanding leaders of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee; and the host of Communist functionaries in his union, the U. E. R. M. W. A., is energetically backing Sidney Hillman's movement to relegate the Congress of the United States to the role of a subservient tool of a minority Communist pressure group.

BEN GOLD

Ben Gold, president of the International Fur and Leather Workers Union, which was cited as under Communist leadership by unanimous vote of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, is also a member of the executive board of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. He is prominent in the leadership of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Gold is frankly and openly a prominent leader of the Communist Party who has been a frequent spokesman for the party in numerous campaigns and front organizations. His jail record is a significant one.

As far back as December 4, 1926, when Ben Gold headed the New York Furriers' Union Joint Council (A. F. of L.) a special committee headed by Matthew Woll and Edward F. McGrady, published a report in which it declared:

"It has been demonstrated beyond peradventure of a doubt that communistic and destructive leadership has gained ascendancy in the New York Furriers' Union Joint Council."

According to this investigating committee of the American Federation of Labor—"to secure communistic control of the International Fur Workers Union is not an end in itself, but merely a means to a greater end, which is the complete destruction of the American trade-union movement and the substitution of a revolutionary communistic reign of terrorism and corruption and dictatorship in its stead."

This A. F. of L. committee called upon the union itself to expel its Communist leadership, and, pending that expulsion, called upon the New York State Federation of Labor and the Central Trades and Labor Council of Greater New York to cancel the affiliation of the furriers' union with those bodies.

Despite the foregoing findings and recommendations, the Communist Party's control of the International Fur and Leather Workers Union has continued down to the present time and was never more complete than it is today. The union is today affiliated with the C. I. O.

While all of the high-ranking officials of the union are well-known Communists, the outstanding one among them is, and has been for the past 17 years, Ben Gold.

Ben Gold's record of Communist activities—wholly apart from his leadership in the furriers union—is a very long one. It is, moreover, a public record, some of the outstanding items in which are as follows:

Ben Gold has been a member of the national committee of the Communist Party of the United States. This fact was included in the sworn testimony of Earl Browder, general secretary of the Communist Party, when he was a witness before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities on September 5, 1939 (see the committee's hearings, p. 4281).

In 1931, Gold was one of the Communist Party's candidates for the New York State Assembly from the Bronx.

In 1933, he was the Communist Party's candidate for aldermanic president of New York.

In 1936, Gold was again one of the Communist Party's candidates for the New York State Assembly from the Bronx.

The foregoing items clearly establish the fact that Ben Gold is one of the high-ranking leaders of the Communist Party, but the wide range of his Communist activity is still more clearly revealed by his frequent leadership in the front organizations of the Communist Party. He has been prominent in the following party fronts: American League Against War and Fascism, American League for Peace and Democracy, American Peace Mobilization, American Friends of Spanish Democracy, American Society for Technical Aid to Spanish Democracy, League of Struggle for Negro Rights, Consumers Union, International Labor Defense, International Workers Order, Jewish People's Committee, National Negro Congress, Workers Alliance, and the National Congress for Unemployment and Social Insurance.

In 1942, he was elected as a member of the New York State Committee of the Communist Party.

In 1936 he publicly supported the candidacy of Israel Amter running for the position of president of the board of aldermen on the Communist ticket in New York City, and again in 1942 when Amter ran as Communist candidate for Governor, Gold was chairman of the labor committee supporting him.

Gold has been exceedingly active in defense of cases where his fellow Communists were involved, both nationally and internationally.

In 1938, he was a speaker in behalf of Ernst Thaelman, jailed German Communist leader. A year before he signed a cable in behalf of Luiz Carlos Prestes, Brazilian Communist leader and a former member of the executive committee of the Communist International. In 1943 he signed a declaration in honor of Georgi Dimitrov, former head of the Communist International.

Gold was a prime mover in several committees to free Earl Browder, general secretary of the Communist Party. He was a sponsor of the Provisional Committee to Free Earl Browder in 1941, and in 1942 he supported the Citizens Committee to Free Earl Browder, the New York Trade Union Committee to Free Earl Browder, and the New York Community Divisions of the Committee to Free Earl Browder.

In 1942 he was a sponsor of the committee formed for the defense of Morris U. Schappes, an avowed Communist teacher, ousted from the City College of New York and serving in Sing Sing Prison for perjury.

In the same year and thereafter he supported the defense of Harry Bridges, now subject to deportation proceedings as a Communist.

Gold was himself convicted on a charge of assault and battery in Wilmington, Del., in 1933 in connection with a Communist-engineered hunger march on Washington. He was jailed in Canada in January 1930 as a leader of the Needle Trades Industrial Union, an affiliate of the Trade Union Unity League which was in turn affiliated with the Red International of Labor Unions in Moscow. He was jailed again in Boston in February 1930 in connection with a Communist-led march of unemployed on the City Hall.

The Daily Worker of November 22, 1930, page 2, carried an account of the conviction of 11 members of the New York Furriers' Union, headed by Ben Gold, on charges of felonious assault during the 1926 furriers' strike. Gold and Shapiro were released but the following were convicted: Maurice Malkin, Franklin, Jack Schneider, Martin Rosenberg, Samuel Mencher, Oscar Miles (Mileaf), Otto Lenhardt, Joseph Katz, and George Weiss.

In 1940 Irving Potash, manager of the New York Joint Council of the Furriers' Union, was convicted on a charge of obstruction of justice, together with Joseph Winogradsky, assistant joint council manager, John Vafiades, manager of the Greek local, and Louis Hatchios, a member of the Greek local. The 5,000-page record of the trial was filled with evidence of violence in the industry charged to the defendants (Daily Worker, November 5, 1940, p. 3).

In 1938, Ben Gold received the congratulations of the Communist Party for his conduct of the International Fur Workers' strike, according to the Daily Worker of June 4, 1938, page 4.

In all of the May Day parades of the Communist Party in New York for many years past, the members of the furriers' union have constituted one of the largest contingents of the marchers. The union membership has likewise supplied large contingents for the gatherings and demonstrations of the numerous front organizations of the Communist Party, notably the American Peace Mobilization, which achieved its largest national publicity by its picketing of the White House just prior to Hitler's attack on Russia.

HELEN KAY

The State, County, and Municipal Workers of America is one of the most glaringly Communist outfits in the whole list of C. I. O. affiliates. The Communist record of Abram Flaxar, president of the union, is discussed in some detail in this report. At this point, we present the Communist record of another of the highest functionaries of the State, County, and Municipal Workers of America.

This is the record of Helen Kay. It will be admitted on all sides that the editorship of the national publication of one of the C. I. O. unions is a key position. Helen Kay occupies this position in the State, County, and Municipal Workers of America. She is the editor of the unions national publication, News of State, County, and Municipal Workers.

Helen Kay (whose real name is Kolodny) has been a member of the Communist Party for at least 12 years. In the August 6, 1932, issue of the Daily Worker (p. 4), she contributed an article entitled "The Power of the Daily Worker." This contributed article was written from the standpoint of a party member who was boosting the party's official newspaper.

In 1933 Helen Kay was editor of the New Pioneer, the Communist Party's official publication for children. In addition to editing the magazine, she contributed numerous signed articles for its columns.

Helen Kay's writings for other Communist Party publications include contributions to Soviet Russia Today (June 1936) and New Theatre magazine (August 1936). The Workers' Library Publishers, official agency of the Communist Party, have also published her work.

Helen Kay's next Communist Party assignment was as executive secretary of the League of Women Shoppers. She was, in fact, the original executive secretary of that Communist front organization (see League of Women Shoppers' letterhead of October 7, 1935).

As editor of News of State, County, and Municipal Workers, it is one of Helen Kay's major duties to publicize the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. This duty she has performed in numerous issues of the union's publication ever since the C. I. O. Political Action Committee was set up in July 1943. Miss Kay is simply one more in the long list of avowed Communists and notorious Communist sympathizers who form the backbone of Sidney Hillman's C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

FRANK R. M'GRATH

Frank R. McGrath is president of the United Shoe Workers of America, affiliate of the C. I. O. McGrath is a member of the C. I. O.'s executive board, highest governing body of the organization, which launched the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. He has, as a matter of course, represented his union in the annual conventions of the C. I. O. in recent years. At the present time, also as matter of course, he is putting the full force of his union into the work of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

The United Shoe Workers of America is under the domination of the Communists, and there is no doubt about McGrath's personal Communist affiliations.

In keeping with his Communist sympathies and affiliations, McGrath, on January 3, 1944, sent his cordial greetings to the Daily Worker, notoriously subversive Communist newspaper, on the occasion of its twentieth anniversary. In a letter of that date, addressed to Louis F. Budenz, editor of the Daily Worker, McGrath wrote as follows:

"I have been a reader of the Daily Worker for several years. I find your paper has been a consistent supporter of organized labor and has devoted itself to the worthy case of building cooperation and understanding among the people and governments of the United States, Great Britain, Soviet Union, China, and the other United Nations.

"I congratulate you on your twentieth anniversary and trust that you will continue your efforts on behalf of the laboring people. I am sure that you will continue to work with the American people who are supporting the efforts of our great President to mobilize our Nation for the early victory planned at the historic conference at Teheran."

It takes no reading between the lines to ascertain that the foregoing letter sent by McGrath to the Daily Worker is the work of a Communist. Not only its eulogy of the Communist newspaper, but its whole tenor reflects the current line of the Communist Party.

Most of McGrath's close associates in the leadership of the United Shoe Workers of America are notorious Communists. Among them are Isadore Rosenberg, Jack Zucker, Julius Crane, and Jack Spiegel.

McGrath was formerly a leader in the Shoe Workers Industrial Union Council. This labor organization was wholly Communist and was affiliated with the Trade Union Unity League, headed by William Z. Foster, national chairman of the Communist Party of the United States. The Trade Union Unity League was composed of some 20 Communist unions and was affiliated with the Red International of Labor Unions of Moscow.

McGrath and Fred Biedenkapp, the latter a long-time Communist Party leader in this country, led a Communist committee of protest to Washington in 1933. (Daily Worker, October 30, 1933, p. 1.)

The United May Day Conference, entirely engineered by the Communist Party for its 1937 May Day demonstrations, numbered Frank R. McGrath as one of its members along with such outstanding Communist Party leaders as Ben Gold and Max Perlow.

McGrath was also affiliated with the Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade. Earl Browder testified concerning the Abraham Lincoln Brigade that some 60 percent of its personnel were members of the Communist Party. The Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade was a Communist front organization and was so found unanimously by the Special Committee on Un-American Activities in its report to the House of Representatives in January 1940.

McGrath was a member of the Joint Committee on Trade Union Rights, which supported the Communist Party leaders of the International Fur and Leather Workers Union when they were serving prison terms a few years ago. (Daily Worker, November 11, 1940, pp. 1, 5.)

MORRIS MUSTER

Morris Muster, 42-year-old president of the United Furniture Workers of America (C. I. O.) claims 46,000 members in his organization. The Worker, official Communist organ, of April 18, 1943, page 5, devotes a full 2 columns to a laudatory account of his achievements.

Formerly president of the Eastern Seaboard Council of the Upholsterers Union (A. F. of L.), he led a left-wing split into the C. I. O. to form the United Furniture Workers of America in 1937. The Special Committee on Un-American Activities in its annual report of January 3, 1940, unanimously found, on the basis of evidence presented, that it was one of the unions in which Communist leadership was strongly entrenched.

At the third constitutional convention of the C. I. O., held in Atlantic City in November 1940, the delegation of the United Furniture Workers consisted of Morris Muster, Max Perlow (who endorsed the Communist candidate for the New York City Council in 1937), Alex Sirota (who endorsed the Communist candidacy of Israel Amter for Governor of New York State in 1942), Morris Pizer (who endorsed the Communist program and candidates in 1933), and Joseph D. Persily from the Indiana district of the union. Emil Costello, provisional secretary-treasurer of the union, was expelled from the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor as a Communist (hearings, vol. 1, pp. 264, 265). Joseph Magliacano, former business agent of Local 140, was a Communist candidate for Congress in the Thirteenth District in New York City in 1936.

The New York locals of the United Furniture Workers have consistently supported the May Day parades of the Communist Party from 1937 to recent date. In 1940, Max Perlow was the secretary-treasurer of the United May Day Committee.

According to William W. Hinckley, executive secretary of the American Youth Congress, another Communist-controlled organization, the United Furniture Workers supported that organization (hearings, vol. 11, p. 7040). The organization also supported the August 6, 1938, peace parade, organized by the American League for Peace and Democracy. Morris Muster not only endorsed the American League for Peace and Democracy but acted as a member of its national labor committee. The American League for Peace and Democracy, branded by the Attorney General as subversive, was the Communist Party's front which expressed the party's views on foreign policy until it was so completely discredited as a result of the Stalin-Hitler pact that it was disbanded.

During the Spanish Civil War, the Communist Party in the United States set up a number of front organizations through which it carried on a great deal of agitation. Morris Muster was affiliated with four of these Communist fronts, namely, the American Committee to Save Refugees (Daily Worker, March 23, 1942, p. 5), the United American Spanish Aid Committee, the American Relief Ship for Spain, and the Coordinating Committee to Lift the Embargo.

Muster is a member of the executive board of the C. I. O. which launched the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, and is a part of the large Communist bloc which is actively carrying on the campaign headed by Sidney Hillman for the purpose of subverting the Congress of the United States to Communist ends.

WILLIAM SENTNER

According to the U. E. News, official organ of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, one William Sentner was "the featured speaker" at a huge St. Louis banquet where he propounded the objectives of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

Who is this William Sentner, key figure in Sidney Hillman's political drive in the Midwest? We shall permit his record to speak for itself and in so doing to speak for the C. I. O. Political Action Committee also.

William Sentner, vice president of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, and president of the same union's District No. 8 in the St. Louis area, has a record as a member and official of the Communist Party since 1933. "When I joined," he declared in an interview published in Fortune magazine of November 1943, "I told everybody in town." He admitted that he still pays his party dues and solicits new party members, but devotes most of his time to union activities.

Sentner has held numerous posts in the Missouri-Arkansas District No. 21 of the Communist Party, among them being the following: Secretary of the East St. Louis section committee (1934); secretary, Communist Party of St. Louis (1935); district organizer, Communist Party of Arkansas (1935); organization secretary, St. Louis (1935); member of district committee (1938); delegate to Arkansas convention of the Communist Party (1938); and member of city committee of Communist Party of St. Louis (1939).

Records in the files of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities show that he participated in the following Communist Party meetings in St. Louis within a comparatively recent period:

December 31, 1942: Communist New Year's Eve party, 1041 N. Grand Avenue.

February 21, 1943, chairman of trade-union sponsoring committee: William Z. Foster, production-for-victory rally, St. Louis Municipal Auditorium.

This 36-year-old-executive of a Communist-controlled union, operating in important Midwest war plants, has been neither an electrical, a radio, nor a machine worker. He studied architecture in Washington University in St. Louis and never completed his studies. As an artist he joined the John Reed Club, named after the founder of the American Communist Party, and became one of the club's national officers. He also spent some time at sea. In other words he owes his present powerful union post in a key war industry solely to the operation of the Communist Party patronage machine and not to any special qualifications in this field of industry.

Although classified as I-A by his local draft board, he has secured deferment at the request of his union. Moreover, he was selected as a member of the War Labor Board for region No. 7 (Missouri) on February 17, 1943, until his record caught up with him and he was forced to resign on February 10, 1944.

Sentner's earliest activities as a Communist include his acting as organizer of the Food Workers Industrial Union, affiliated with the Trade Union Unity League, a section of the Red International of Labor Unions with headquarters in Moscow. In this capacity he led a strike of St. Louis nut workers who marched militantly on the city hall. The Daily Worker reported that "the strikers, one after another, told Mayor Dickinson of St. Louis that it was the Food Workers Industrial Union and the Communist Party who were responsible." (June 1, 1933, p. 3.)

Sentner was arrested during this period for violation of the National Recovery Act, in connection with a strike at the Lewin Metal Co., engaged in the manufacture of material designed for the War Department. The Daily Worker's account of what took place is illuminating:

"The strikers succeeded in keeping the locomotives out of the company's gates * * *. Switchmen * * * refused to switch the cars * * *. The party has boldly appeared from the beginning." (Daily Worker, Aug. 11, 1933, pp. 1 and 3.)

In accordance with the Communist Party's doctrine at the time, Sentner was concentrating on the vital parts of the American war machine. More recently, as organizer for the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, he organized the U. S. Cartridge Co. of St. Louis.

In 1938, Sentner, as district president of the U. E. R. M. W. A., was arrested on charges of criminal syndicalism in connection with the Maytag strike at Newton, Iowa, and found guilty after a jury trial. In 1939 he was sentenced to a maximum penalty of 10 years in jail and a $5,000 fine. His case was defended by the International Labor Defense, "legal arm of the Communist Party." (Equal Justice, July 1938, p. 3.) The law was later declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Iowa, and Sentner was accordingly released.

Police records of St. Louis show that he was arrested on October 14, 1933, on charges of suspicion of inciting a riot and that he was fined $25 and costs.

Sentner's record shows that he has used his post as a trade-union official to promote the current line of the Communist Party. In 1937, he was a speaker at a Communist May Day meeting in St. Louis, as national organizer of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, and rallied strikers from the Emerson Electric Co. and the Century Co. to attend. (Daily Worker, May 4, 1937, p. 3.)

In 1938, he was a sponsor of the St. Louis branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy, the largest Communist front of that period.

In 1940, Sentner joined with other officers of District 8 of the U. E. R. M. W. A. to urge participation in the movement for the repeal of Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill. (Daily Worker, September 25, 1940, p. 1.)

In line with the Communist Party's most recent position, Sentner today pretends to be a patriot. His offer of cooperation with the war effort has elicited the commendation of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, who no doubt was not aware that his correspondent was a man with a long Communist record. Sentner's union-management cooperation activities have brought forth praise from Stuart Symington, head of the Emerson Electric Manufacturing Co. of St. Louis (Fortune, November 1943). These gentlemen are certainly unaware that Sentner's patriotism is always conditioned by the line of the Communist Party.

Among the Communist organizations supported by Sentner have been the Scottsboro Defense Committee, the International Labor Defense, Citizens' Committee to Free Earl Browder, Harry Bridges defense, Commonwealth College, New Theatre League, and National Federation for Constitutional Liberties. On February 12, 1938, he was cited on the honor roll of the Midwest Daily Record, official Communist organ of Chicago.

SEYMOUR SIPORIN

Seymour Siporin is national legislative director of the United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers of America, a C. I. O. affiliate which is headed by two other Communists, namely, Grant W. Oakes as president and Gerald Fielde as secretary.

Siporin heads the C. I. O. Political Action Committee of his union in Chicago. According to an article by Louis F. Budenz in The Worker (Communist Sunday newspaper) of February 27, 1944, Grant Oakes and Seymour Siporin are engaged in a campaign within their union to collect $20,000, half of which is to be turned over to the national organization of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Offering further evidence of the close tie between the Communist Party and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, Budenz writes enthusiastically about the work of Grant Oakes and Seymour Siporin for Sidney Hillman's movement. Budenz also writes, in part, as follows:

"In the last week in January, Sidney Hillman of the national C. I. O. Political Action Committee, held a special meeting of his 14 regional directors in this city.

"The C. I. O. has been conspicuously fortunate in obtaining as regional director for this State a man who was familiar with the local Democratic Party organization and yet is also on close and comradely terms with the labor movement. That man is Raymond McKeough, former Congressman from the Chicago region, whose congressional record was particularly good in its progressivism and stand for victory. There has been a quick pick-up among the unions in this vicinity, therefore, to the measures that were urged by the Hillman Chicago conference.

"Take the United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers Union, C. I. O.. It is up on its toes in pushing this political business in 1944."

Siporin has been arrested in Chicago frequently in connection with riots and demonstrations of the Communist Party.

In 1939, Siporin was chairman of the Communist Party's United May Day Committee in Chicago.

According to The Worker of January 9, 1944, page 6, Seymour Siporin endorsed the Communist Party's Daily Worker on the occasion of its twentieth anniversary.

It appears to be no accident that, as Siporin's case so well illustrates, the local activities and leadership of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee regularly fall into the hands of well-known Communists.

LOUISE THOMPSON

Louise Thompson and her husband, William L. Patterson, have both been openly avowed members of the Communist Party for many years, and both have held high positions in the party. A published list of the arrangements committee and sponsors of the Hyde Park Joint Political Action Conference, a subsidiary of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, includes the name of Louise Thompson.

In 1940, Louise Thompson was elected as one of the vice presidents of the International Workers Order, an auxiliary of the Communist Party, whose president and general secretary are Russian-born William Weiner (real name Welwel Warzower), who was convicted for passport fraud, and German-born Max Bedacht, who was at one time secretary of the Communist Party in the United States.

Louise Thompson has been a member of the editorial board of the New Pioneer, the official Communist Party publication for children.

She has also been a member of the women's commission of the Communist Party.

The official Communist Party magazine, Party Organizer, has published articles by Louise Thompson.

Another official Communist Party magazine, Working Woman, also listed Louise Thompson as a contributor; and she was one of the editors of the Communist-front magazine, Woman Today.

She was listed as one of the national sponsors of the League of Women Shoppers, an organization which this committee found to be a Communist-controlled front by indisputable documentary evidence obtained from the files of the Communist Party in Philadelphia.

Louise Thompson's leadership in political campaigns did not begin with her present membership on the aforementioned set-up of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. She was a member of the Committee of Professional Groups for Browder and Ford, when those two candidates were running for President and Vice President respectively on the Communist Party ticket. She was also a member of the Non-Partisan Committee for the Re-election of Congressman VITO MARCANTONIO.

Louise Thompson, a Negro herself, has been a speaker at the annual gatherings of the National Negro Congress, another notoriously Communist-controlled organization.

She was a member of the arrangements committee of the United States Congress Against War, a gathering which Earl Browder reported to Moscow as being openly led by the Communist Party and out of which came the American Leaguge for Peace and Democracy.

She was active as a member and official of the National Scottsboro Committee of Action. Parenthetically, it may be noted that for many years "action committee' has been a favorite designation of the Communist Party for its fronts.

Louise Thompson was also a member of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, and its successor organization, the National Committee for People's Rights, both of which were named as subversive by the Attorney General, Mr. Francis Biddle, in his memoranda to the departmental heads of the Federal Government.

Finally, we note that she has been a member of the national committee of the International Labor Defense, of which her husband has been vice president. The International Labor Defense has been correctly described as the legal arm of the Communist Party.

Louise Thompson and William L. Patterson were married at the Chicago convention where the seditious American Peace Mobilization was launched in September 1940, and she became a member of the national council of the organization.

It is clear from the foregoing record that few Negro women have ever attained such prominence in the Communist movement in this country as Louise Thompson. She now takes her place in the councils of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, a move which represents no break in the continuity of her activities on behalf of communism over the past decade.

RUTH YOUNG

Rutn Young was one of the speakers at the C. I. O. Political Action Committee's New York conference of January 14-15, 1944. She is an official in the C. I. O.'s third largest affiliate, the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America.

This same Ruth Young, who is now so prominent and active in Hillman's political action committee, was for a long time equally prominent and active in the Young Communist League.

In February 1933 Ruth Young signed a public manifesto which read in part as follows:

"The growth of the party depends upon our own effort and will. We pledge to make the slogan 'Build the Party' the center of discussion and action among our members and among the broad masses of our sympathizers.

"Forward to build a strong and powerful Communist Party.

"Forward for a strong people's front to defeat fascism and war.

"Forward to the American October."

The reference to October in the foregoing manifesto is the bolshevik revolution of Russia. When Ruth Young was confronted at the 1941 convention of her union with the fact that she signed the foregoing Communist manifesto, she made no denial. On the contrary, her reply was that she was "not aware that it is illegal in the United States for anyone to hold any political or religious belief."

In the summer of 1938 Ruth Young was delegate to the Communist World Youth Congress (at Vassar College) from the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America.

It is now under the mask of patriotism and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee that such Communists as Ruth Young are working for what they have in the past described as "the American October." The 600,000 members of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America (employed in many of the most vital American defense industries) are submitting to an entrenched Communist leadership which includes such notorious Communists as Julius Emspak, James Lustig, James J. Matles, William Sentner, Neil Brant, and Ruth Young. This union is probably the most energetic of all the C. I. O. affiliates in supporting Sidney Hillman's C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

COMMUNIST-FRONT ORGANIZATIONS

The Communist-front organization is comparatively a new phenomenon in American life. Because of this and because of the deceptiveness and unprecedented character of the tactics employed, most Americans are slow to recognize these front organizations for what they are, instruments of the Communist Party. These Communist-front organizations are characterized by their common origin, the rigid conformity of these organizations to the Communist pattern, their interlocking personnel, and their methods generally used to deceive the American public. Being part of a conspiratorial movement, their very essence is deception.

During the first few years of the Communist International, immediately following the stimulus of the Russian Revolution, its international appeal was stridently revolutionary. As world-economic conditions improved following the First World War, the international revolutionary movement began to wane. The Hungarian and German Communist revolutions failed and the Communist International began to lose strength. Hence it was deemed necessary to moderate the earlier revolutionary appeal, to adopt middle-of-the-road slogans, and to build so-called united front organizations, as bridge and supporting organizations in the interest of the international Communist movement.

One of the leading organizers of these "innocent" organizations on an international scale was Willi Munzenberg, a prominent German Communist, whose organizing ability won him the sobriquet of the "Henry Ford of the Communist International." Munzenberg was engagingly frank in describing the real purpose of these organizations:

"1. To arouse the interest of those millions of apathetic and indifferent workeers * * * who simply have no ear for Communist propaganda. These people we wish to attract and arouse through new channels, by means of new ways.

"2. Our sympathetic organizations should constitute bridges for the nonparty workers * * * who have not yet mustered the courage to take the final step and join the Communist Party, but who are nevertheless in sympathy with the Communist movement and are prepared to follow us part of the way.

"3. By means of the mass organizations we wish to extend the Communist sphere of influence in itself.

"4. The organizational linking up of the elements in sympathy with the Soviet Union and with the Communists. * * *

"5. We must build up our own organizations in order to counteract the increasing efforts of the bourgeois and social-democratic parties in this respect, and

"6. Through these sympathetic and mass organizations we should train the cadres of militants and officials of the Communist Party possessing organizational experience." (Speech before the Sixth Congress of the Communist International in Moscow, July 20, 1923. International Press Correspondence, vol. 8, No. 42, Aug. 1, 1928, pp. 751, 752.)

In his Problems of Leninism, a standard textbook and guide for Communists throughout the world, Joseph Stalin emphasized the need of these front or mass organizations which he called "transmission belts":

"The proletariat needs these belts, these levers, and this guiding force [the Communist Party—Ed.], * * * Lastly we come to the Party of the Proletariat, the proletarian vanguard. Its strength lies in the fact that it attracts to its ranks the best elements of all the mass organizations of the proletariat, without exception, and to guide their activities toward a single end, that of the liberation of the proletariat."

Stalin quoted Lenin in support of his argument:

"The dictatorship of the proletariat cannot be effectively realized without "belts" to transmit power from the vanguard [the Communist Party—Ed.] to the mass of the advanced class, and from this to the mass of those who labor" (pp. 29, 30).

We cite the instructions of Otto Kuusinen, secretary of the Communist International, in his report at the Sixth Plenum (plenary session) of the executive committee of the Communist International:

"The first part of our task is to build up, not only Communist organizations, but other organizations as well, above all, mass organizations sympathizing with our aims, and able to aid us for special purposes. * * * We must create a whole solar system of organizations and small committees around the Communist Party, so to speak, smaller organizations working actually under the influence of our party." (Quotations taken from the Communist, May 1931, pp. 409-423.)

The rise of Adolph Hitler to power created a new threat to the Soviet Union and to the international Communist movement. Hence the Seventh Congress of the Communist International, in 1935, gave an added impetus to the creation of front organizations under Communist initiative and leadership, the chief purpose of which was to protect and serve the Communist Party and the Soviet Union. The ability of the Communists to ensnare large numbers of influential individuals, to serve as decoys in operating these fronts, reached its high point following the seventh congress in 1935.

The methods employed by the Communists in establishing and operating these front organizations, methods demonstrated by the various organizations herein cited, have been well summarized by a former high official of the Communist Party of the United States:

"A front organization is organized by the Communist Party in the following fashion: First, a number of sympathizers who are close to the party and whom the party knows can be depended upon to carry out party orders, are gotten together and formed into a nucleus which issues a call for the organization of a particular front organization which the party wants to establish. And generally after that is done a program is drawn up by the party, which this provisional committee adopts. Then, on the basis of this provisional program, all kinds of individuals are canvassed to become sponsors of the organization, which is to be launched in the very near future. A provisional secretary is appointed before the organization is launched and in every instance in our day the secretary who was appointed was a member of the Communist Party. * * * And as president of the organization we would put up some prominent public figure who was willing to accept the presidency of the organization, generally making sure that, if that public figure was one who would not go along with the Communists, he was of such a type that he would be too busy to pay attention to the affairs of the organization. * * *

"On the committee that would be drawn together, a sufficient number of Communists and Communist Party sympathizers, who would carry out party orders, was included, and out of this number a small executive committee was organized * * * which carried on the affairs of the organization, so-called, and this small executive committee, with the secretary, really ran the organization. And this small committee and the secretary are the instruments of the Communist Party, with the result that when manifestos or decisions on campaigns are made, those campaigns are ordered by the Communist Party" (hearings of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, vol. 7, pp. 4716, 4717, 4718).

In judging the individuals associated with Communist-front organizations, to determine the degree of their responsibility for its activities and their closeness to the Communist Party, one should be guided by consideration of the following categories of individuals included within them:

1. Members of the Communist Party who have openly avowed their affiliation.

2. Members of the Communist Party, not openly avowed, proven to be such on the basis of documentary or other proof.

3. Those accepting Communist Party discipline, either secret party members or outsiders who accept such discipline and instruction. This category may be recognized by the regularity with which it follows the line of the Communist Party, throughout all its variations, by the number of different front affiliations, by the posts they occupy in these front organizations, and by the fact that they retain their affiliation after the organization has been publicly exposed.

4. Those who have been attracted by the high-sounding aims of the front organization or organizations, by the prominence of its sponsors, or by a desire to be sociable. The judgment of such persons is certainly open to criticism just as much as if they aided in launching any other hoax.

For the guidance of the American people in detecting Communist-front organizations, we present the following criteria:

1. Does the organization have Communist Party members or those trusted by the Communist Party, in its posts of real power—on its executive board, as secretary, organizer, educational director, editor, office staff?

2. Are meetings of the organization addressed by Communists or their trusted agents? Does its publication include articles by such persons?

3. Does the organization follow the Communist Party line?

4. Does the organization cooperate with campaigns, activities, publications, of the Communist Party or other front organizations?

5. Is the address of the organization in the same building with other front organizations or within cooperating vicinity?

6. Does the organization cooperate with Communist-controlled unions?

7. Does the organization's official publication reflect the line of the Communist Party, publish articles by pro-Communists, advertise Communist activities, or those of other front organizations or of Communist vacation resorts?

8. Are questions injected into meetings or in official publications, which have more to do with the current policy of the Communist Party, than with the professed purposes of the organization?

9. Are funds kicked back directly or indirectly to the Communist Party or to other front organizations?

10. Is printing done at a Communist printing house?

11. Does the organization use entertainers associated with pro-Communist organizations or entertainments?

12. Does the organization receive favorable publicity in the Communist press?

13. Is the organization uniformly loyal to the Soviet Union?

The line of the Communist Party on foreign policy is cited herewith. Its advocacy by an individual or organization, throughout all its variations, is a sound test of the loyalty and subservience of such an individual or organization to the Communist Party:

Prior to August 1935: No distinction was made between Fascist and democratic governments. They were all capitalistic and had to be destroyed by a revolution and replaced by a proletarian dictatorship.

August 1935 to September 1939: Adolf Hitler became a threat to the Soviet Union. Opposition to the Fascist governments. Support of collective security or a united front of the democracies and the Soviet Union against the Fascist nations.

September 1939 to June 21, 1941: The period of the Stalin-Hitler pact. Opposition to the present war as imperialist. Support of an isolationist position. Support of the peace policy of the Soviet Union. Demand that we pay attention to our own domestic problems first.

June 22, 1941, to 1944: Hitler attacked the Soviet Union. Support of the present war against fascism. Demand for a second front to aid the struggle of the Soviet Union.

In his decision on the deportation of Harry Bridges, the Attorney General, Mr. Francis Biddle, included the following excellent description of Communist front organizations:

"Testimony on 'front organizations' showed that they were represented to the public for some legitimate reform objective, but actually used by the Communist Party to carry on its activities pending the time when the Communists believe they can seize power through revolution."

This report deals with the leadership of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, which is the authorized agency through which the Congress of Industrial Organizations itself is participating in the election compaigns of 1944. Our investigations of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee began in July 1943, when it was first constituted by action of the C. I. O. executive board. Our findings, for the most part, are based upon the public records of the men who are active in the leadership of the Political Action Committee.

Sidney Hillman, national chairman of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, announced in the press and also stated in a letter to every Member of the House of Representatives that he would not comply with any subpenas of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, and that he would refuse "to submit the books or records of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee to Mr. MARTIN DIES for investigation."

We have not, in any sense of the word, conducted an investigation of organized labor as such. A reading of this report will show that the legitimate activities of organized labor are not a subject of discussion herein. Our investigations have been concerned solely with the Communist penetration of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. It should be noted that the American Federation of Labor has instructed all of its units to refrain from any cooperation with the Political Action Committee, and also that the A. F. of L. has publicly endorsed the principle of our investigation of Hillman's committee.

The Special Committee on Un-American Activities does not challenge for one moment the right of organized labor to engage in political campaigns within the limits of the statutes which govern such activity. The irresponsible and untruthful charge that we would deny to organized labor any of its lawful rights does not deter us from exposing the subversive activities of the Communists who have, in line with their current strategy, decided to work through the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

We assert at the outset, and have tried to make clear elsewhere in this report, that we do not impeach the Americanism of the overwhelming majority of the rank and file members of the unions which are affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Whether they belong to these unions by choice or coercion, there are millions of these rank-and-file C. I. O. members who are wholly guiltless of any sympathy with communism. The same cannot be said of thousands of the leaders, high and low, of the C. I. O. who are most energetically carrying on the activities of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

Communists, like all totalitarians, have always looked with contempt upon the legislative (or parliamentary, as they are accustomed to style it) branch of our Government. For many years the official program of the Communist Party of the United States contained the following statement:

"Communism repudiates parliamentarism as the form of the future; its aim is to destroy parliamentarism."

The same official party program went on to assert the following:

"Therefore the deep hatred against all parliaments in the revolutionary proletariat is perfectly justified."

It is true that Communists engage in political campaigns for the ostensible purpose of electing their members and friends to legislative bodies, but the official view of the Communist Party on this matter was set forth in the following language:

"The Communist Party enters such institutions not for the purpose of organization work, but in order to blow up the whole bourgeois machinery and the Parliament itself from within."

In a previous report, our committee made the following observation:

"The essence of totalitarianism is the destruction of the parliamentary or legislative branch of government. The counterpart of this destruction of the parliamentary institutions of democracy is the concentration of all power, irresponsible power, in the hands of the totalitarian dictator. In some countries, as in Hitler's Reich, the old forms of parliamentary government have been retained while the reality has been utterly effaced. The Reichstag has been degraded to an assembly of puppets who are called together at irregular intervals to scream "Ja" at the Fuehrer's bidding. No greater fallacy could obsess the mind of man than to assume that such a procedure with its outward show of absolute unity represents ultimate strength. In the totalitarian-ruled lands where democracy is dead, the undying issue confronting men is the restoration of freedom. In America, the issue confronting us is not the restoration but the preservation of the political institutions of freemen. This issue compels us to take cognizance of a widespread movement to discredit the legislative branch of our Government. The issue simply stated is whether the Congress of the United States shall be the reality or the relic of American democracy."

The foregoing observation, submitted by our committee to the House on June 25, 1942, is as relevant today as it was almost 2 years ago, and more so. It is, in fact, made vastly more relevant by the appearance on our political scene of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, whose major objective is to discredit the Congress of the United States.

We cite two typical cases of Communist contempt for the Congress of the United States. In the first case we have the notorious Harry Bridges, speaking as a leader of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee during a recent Nation-wide tour. "Why," said Bridges, "there are more Hitler agents to the square inch in Congress than there are to the square mile in Detroit." That is not a criticism of individual Members of Congress. It is, on the contrary, a contemptible slur upon the Congress of the United States as an institution. It is in a class with Walter Winchell's reference to this body as "the House of Reprehensibles."

In the second case, we have one Martin L. Fried speaking officially as the "political action representative" of Local 669 of the United Automobile, Aircraft, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America. In a letter dated March 14, 1944, and addressed to a Member of the House of Representatives, Martin L. Fried wrote as follows:

"Hundreds and hundreds of men and women have come into our office here and have demanded that you be instructed to oppose the conference report and support the original Green-Lucas soldier vote bill, whether or not you favor it. We favor it—you vote for it!"

In this contemptible manner the C. I. O. Political Action Committee reveals itself in action, a manner not to be wondered at when the Communist ideology which underlies it is borne in mind. A letter written by Martin L. Fried to Soviet Russia Today establishes the fact that he is a Communist, as any reader of the letter may see at a glance. (Soviet Russia Today, July 1940, p. 34.)

We find that immediately prior to the setting up of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, the leaders of the Communist Party were agitating for the establishment of just such an agency as was created by the C. I. O. executive board in July 1943. (See sec. 2 of this report entitled "Patterned by the Communist Party.")

Sidney Hillman, chairman of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, has announced that the organization expects to raise and spend at least $2,000,000 during the election campaign of 1944. In some instances, units of the C. I. O. have made compulsory assessments against their members for the support of the Political Action Committee. Inasmuch as many members of the C. I. O. who do not share Hillman's political views are compelled by Government coercion to belong to its affiliated unions, such members are subjected to a form of tyrannical taxation without representation.

Another form of coercion is described in one of the official booklets of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee (U. E. Guide to Political Action published by the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America).

Under the heading "Voluntary 'compulsory' registration," this booklet says:

"Some unions have voted compulsory registration requirements. The membership of Local 6 of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, C. I. O., in San Francisco has adopted a rule requiring all probationary members, who are eligible, to register before they can receive their union books."

Inasmuch as union membership is, in many instances, the price of a livelihood, this type of coercion represents an intolerable invasion of the individual's political privacy and freedom. It smacks of the totalitarian state where the individual dare not exercise his prerogative to register or not to register lest he be deprived of his livelihood.

The Political Action Committee is simply the C. I. O. functioning as a political agency and using its coercive powers over its members to compel them to follow its political dictates. (See sec. 3 of this report entitled "The Set-up of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.")

The C. I. O. executive board which established the Political Action Committee is composed of 49 members, among whom there are at least 18 whose records indicate that they follow the "line" of the Communist Party with undeviating loyalty. These are the men who not so long ago supported the wave of sabotage strikes which gravely interfered with the production of defense materials. These same men now seek to discredit the Congress of the United States by malicious and slanderous charges of pro-Hitlerism when they themselves, prior to Hitler's invasion of Russia, were deliberately aiding Hitler and declaring, while they did so, that there was no difference between a Nazi victory and a British victory. (See sec. 4 of this report entitled "C. I. O. Executive Board.")

10

The Industrial Union Council is, perhaps, the most strategic unit in the work of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. This is also the unit of the C. I. O. which is most universally controlled by communists. We cite 33 instances in which industrial union councils were represented by Communists in the recent annual convention of the C. I. O. which was held in Philadelphia in November 1943. (See sec. 5 of this report entitled "The Industrial Union Council.")

11

A majority (21) of the international unions affiliated with the C. I. O. have an entrenched Communist leadership. This fully justifies the recent, even if belated, observation of John L. Lewis, in speaking of Philip Murray and Sidney Hillman, that "both of them have got to play ball with the Communists now or die." (See sec. 6 of this report entitled "Communism in the C. I. O.")

12

It is no accident that Communists have achieved such prominence in the C. I. O. It is the result of the most carefully planned program to capture unions for political purposes. The official program of the Communist Party, temporarily relegated to the background, said:

"It is particularly important for the purpose of winning over the majority of the proletariat, to gain control of the trade-unions."

(See sec. 7 of this report entitled "Communists in Trade Unions.")

The anncunced intention of the Communist Party to dissolve as a political party and to take some such name as the American Communist Political Association is not, in any sense of the word, a renunciation of communism. The Communists themselves have declared so emphatically. The immediate significance of the Party's dissolution is that during the 1944 elections Communists will throw their entire weight into the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Their political leader will be, in effect, Sidney Hillman, instead of Earl Browder. They will attempt by stealth and subterfuge to do through the Political Action Committee what they have failed to do when functioning as a political party under their own name, i. e., to gain political leadership over millions of voters. (See sec. 8 of this report entitled "Dissolution of the Communist Party and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.")

14

A part of the Political Action Committee's program involves the sending of top C. I. O. leaders over the country on speaking tours. Banquets and mass meetings are being held in all of the large cities of the United States. One of the principal speakers who is making such a tour is Communist Harry Bridges. (See sec. 9 of this report entitled "C. I. O. Political Action Committee's Campaign has begun.")

15

Typical of the Communist predominance in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee was the roster of speakers at one of its meetings held in New York City, January 14–15, 1944. Among the speakers at this gathering of the Political Action Committee were Donald Henderson (see sec. 32), Reid Robinson (see sec. 48), Julius Emspak (see sec. 28), Grant Oakes (see sec. 43), Michael J. Quill (see sec. 46), Joseph Curran (see sec. 27), Lewis Merrill (see sec. 36), Ruth Young (see sec. 55), and Ferdinand C. Smith (see sec. 53). (See sec. 10 of this report entitled "New York Conference of January 14–15, 1944.")

16

According to a voting chart which shows how the Members of the House of Representatives voted on 20 measures the overwhelming majority of the Members of this body come under the attacks of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. However, the most significant thing about this chart which the Political Action Committee is disseminating throughout the country is that it is absolutely identical with one which the Communist Party is circulating in material which bears the party's own imprint. In other words, the political views and philosophy of the Communist Party and of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee coincide in every detail. The Communist Party's judgment for or against a Member of Congress is based upon grounds which are absolutely identical with those which the Political Action Committee uses for the same purpose. (See sec. 11 of this report entitled "Voting Charts of the Communist Party and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.")

17

One of the most seditious organizations which ever operated in the United States was the American Peace Mobilization, instrument of the Communist Party line prior to Hitler's attack on Russia. We cite the names and C. I. O. positions of 79 leaders of the American Peace Mobilization, most of whom are now active in the work of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. This single fact is sufficient to put the brand of communism on the Political Action Committee. (See sec. 12 of this report entitled "American Peace Mobilization and C. I. O. Political Action Committee.")

Whenever there is a Communist Party front organization, there will usually be found a large number of C. I. O. leaders in closest collaboration with the party. Each of the prominent Communist C. I. O. leaders is so useful to the Communist Party that his name appears not in one, but in many, of the Communist front organizations.

In subsequent sections of this report, we show how extensively the personnel of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee and various Communist front organizations overlaps. The American Peace Mobilization was the most notable example of this from the standpoint of conclusive proof of the Communist sympathies of various C. I. O. leaders, for the reason that the Peace Mobilization operated at a time when a wayfaring man though a fool could not fail to detect the party line.

We cite the names and union positions of 115 C. I. O. leaders who have been affiliated with the Communist front known as the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties. (See sec. 13 of this report.)

We show how prominently C. I. O. leaders figured in the seditious American League for Peace and Democracy (originally known as the American League Against War and Fascism). We list herein the names and union positions of 45 C. I. O. leaders who were affiliated with that Communist front. Among them were 15 presidents of international unions of the C. I. O. (See section 14 of this report.)

When Earl Browder was in Atlanta Penitentiary serving a sentence involving his fraudulent passports, the Communist Party's front which agitated for his release was known as the Citizens' Committee to Free Earl Browder. We cite the names and unions of 513 C. I. O. leaders who were affiliated with that committee. (See section 15 of this report.)

We have found at least 144 prominent C. I. O. leaders who have publicly declared their support of the Daily Worker, the Communist newspaper which over a period of 20 years has published a larger volume of subversive, seditious, and treasonable utterances than any other publication ever known in this country. (See section 16 of this report.)

Illustrative of the publicly declared Communist sympathies of some 28 C. I. O. leaders, we cite their support of the candidacy of Israel Amter when he ran for Governor of New York on the Communist Party ticket. (See sec. 17 of this report.)

Indicative of the hold which Communists on the west coast have over the machinery of the C. I. O., we cite the names and union affiliations of 18 west coast C. I. O. leaders who have constituted themselves a committee to support the Communist newspaper, the People's World. (See sec. 18 of this report.)

We cite the names and union connections of 21 C. I. O. leaders who have affiliated themselves with the Communist International Labor Defense in its activities on behalf of Mrs. Earl Browder, who is under an order for deportation to her native Russia. (See sec. 19 of this report.)

The Schappes Defense Committee, set up to defend a convicted Communist perjurer, is another illustration of the readiness of many C. I. O. leaders to associate themselves with Communist-front organizations. We list the names and unions of 16 very prominent C. I. O. leaders who are members of the Schappes Defense Committee. (See sec. 20 of this report.)

The independent judgment of numerous groups and individuals has arrived at the conclusion that Sidney Hillman has entered into a coalition with Communists for the purpose of building the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. This is not the first time in his career that Hillman has been found in league with the Communists, but it is by far the most sinister of all his Communist ccalitions. Because of his prominence in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, we have gone into more detail in discussing Sidney Hillman than we have in discussing most of the other leaders. (See sec. 21 of this report.)

The latter half of this report presents in alphabetical order the Communist records of 34 leaders in the work of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. We have gone to some lengths in offering a mass of detailed evidence in order that there may be no doubt in any quarter of the fact that these individuals are properly and fairly labeled "Communist." With a larger staff and with unlimited space in this report, we could have given such detailed records on hundreds rather than 34 of the leaders of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. We believe, however, that these 34 cases by themselves establish the fact that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee represents in its main outlines a subversive Communist campaign to subvert the Congress of the United States to its totalitarian program.

PATTERNED BY THE COMMUNIST PARTY

The origin of the idea of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is of real importance. That origin was definitely with the Communist Party and some of its leaders.

In June 1943, the Workers Library Publishers—official Communist Party publishing agency—brought out a pamphlet by Frank Ryhlick entitled "Congress and You." In the July 1943 issue of the Communist—official monthly organ of the Communist Party—Earl Browder and Eugene Dennis contributed articles entitled "Hold the Home Front" and "Victory and the 1944 Elections," respectively. These writings by Ryhlick, Browder, and Dennis cut the pattern for the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. They appeared some weeks before the formation of the Hillman organization. An examination of the views of Ryhlick, Browder, and Dennis shows how they anticipated in every respect the organization and activity of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. In his article, entitled "Hold the Home Front," Browder wrote as follows:

"We must unite the C. I. O. behind the leadership of Phil Murray and his clear and correct program for the labor movement, and we must work with every honest leading element who goes along with Murray in the fullest collaboration, giving them our confidence and support without any regard to possible past or present ideological differences. * * * We must build the unit of all anti-Axis elements for the war now, and for the 1944 elections, which are already a practical issue today in the course of the conduct of the war."

In his article, entitled "Victory and the 1944 Elections," Dennis wrote as follows:

"In analyzing the political situation and alinements within the country, special consideration should be given to the approaching 1944 elections. To begin with, we must understand that next year's national elections are not a post-war problem and not a problem to be resolved solely in 1944. * * * Recent experience has proved that one of the most important channels for developing labor's united action and influencing political developments is in the formation and activity of joint labor legislative committees."

Ryhlick wrote in his pamphlet, as follows:

"Political mobilization has become an all-embracing framework, within which lie the solutions to the many related problems confronting the people of America—problems including the opening of a second front, American-Soviet relations, economic planning, aid for the farmers, rationing and price control and taxes, wages and working conditions, abolition of racial discrimination, a victory Congress. The entire Nation could well take to heart the following words of George Addes, who with Richard Frankensteen, is helping President Thomas give real leadership to the United Auto Workers: 'It is obvious that whatever gains we will make we will have to achieve them through political action'."

Other Communist Party publications such as the New Masses and the Daily Worker bore down heavily upon the need for an organization like the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in the weeks which preceded the formation of Hillman's committee.

Whether or not Philip Murray and Sidney Hillman knowingly adopted a program of action for the 1944 elections which had been set forth by prominent Communist Party leaders and individuals, the record shows beyond the possibility of any dispute that well-known Communists immediately assumed important roles in the regional, State, and local activities of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Murray and Hillman may allege that it was a mere coincidence that their organization so completely conformed to the one whose pattern had been drawn by the Communists. They cannot deny the presence of well-known Communists in the ranks of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee as it has been functioning from coast to coast during the past 7 or 8 months.

THE SET-UP OF THE C. I. O. POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE

On July 7, 1943, the C. I. O. executive board, acting in the name of the entire Congress of Industrial Organizations, set up the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. The C. I. O., as a whole, obviously bears full responsibility for this committee which was created by its executive board.

Philip Murray, national president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, appointed the following members of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee: Sidney Hillman, chairman; R. J. Thomas, secretary; Sherman H. Dalrymple; Albert J. Fitzgerald; David J. McDonald.

Shortly after the setting up of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, Sidney Hillman announced that there would be 14 regional offices, as follows:

Region I, covering the New England States; with headquarters in Boston.

Region II, New York State; New York City headquarters.

Region III, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland; Newark headquarters.

Region IV, Pennsylvania; Pittsburgh headquarters.

Region V, Ohio, West Virginia, and Kentucky.

Region VI, Michigan; Detroit headquarters.

Region VII, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Indiana; Chicago headquarters.

Region VIII, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Florida; Birmingham headquarters.

Region IX, Minnesota, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Nebraska; Minneapolis headquarters.

Region X, Missouri, Kansas, and Arkansas.

Region XI, Texas, Oklahoma, and Louisiana; Dallas headquarters.

Region XII, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana.

Region XIII, California and Nevada.

Region XIV, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Arizona, and New Mexico; Denver headquarters.

To date, the following regional directors have been appointed:

Region I, Joseph Salerno; region III, Irving Abramson; region V, Jack Kroll; region VI, August Scholle; region VII, Raymond S. McKeough; region IX, John J. Jacobson; region XII, Roy Atkinson; region XIII, George B. Roberts.

The general plan of organization for the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is that every unit of the C. I. O.—international unions, industrial union councils, union locals, etc.—shall set up its own machinery for carrying out the committee's political objectives during the 1944 election campaign. In other words, all existing units of the C. I. O. are to be utilized to the full.

In addition to the utilization of existing C. I. O. units, the C. I. O. Political Action Committee has called for the creation of community councils which reach beyond the membership and immediate families of the C. I. O. The purpose of these community councils is to draw nonunionized professionals and other civic leaders into the work of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

According to Philip Murray, the voting strength of the C. I. O. unions and the immediate families of their members is something like 14,000,000. Sidney Hillman has talked in terms of organizing some 28,000,000 voters in the 1944 elections. These figures obviously represent a great deal of wishful thinking, and they are set down here merely as reflecting the proportions of Philip Murray's and Sydney Hillman's political ambitions.

On November 5, 1943, in PM, Hillman announced that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee expected to raise and spend the sum of $2,000,000 in the election campaigns of 1944. Philip Murray stated some weeks ago that the C. I. O. unions had already donated $700,000 of this enormous slush fund.

Many units of the C. I. O. have already imposed a compulsory assessment upon their members for the support of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Inasmuch as Government coercion compels hundreds of thousands of workers to join the C. I. O., it is obvious that there are many of these workers who have no choice but to make their financial contributions to this Hillman-Communist conspiracy whether they approve of it or not. It is further clear that if this type of political coercion were applied by other than labor organizations, backed by the power of government, it would be widely held and courageously labelled an intolerable encroachment of some form of totalitarianism. As it stands, it is a piece of tyrannical taxation for those members of the C. I. O. who are compelled to contribute their assessments, at the risk of forfeiting their livelihoods, without sharing in any degree the political objectives of Sidney Hillman and his Communist associates.

C. I. O. EXECUTIVE BOARD

The C. I. O. executive board, the body which officially launched the C. I. O. Political Action Committee on July 7, 1943, is composed of the C. I. O.'s president, secretary-treasurer, 9 vice presidents, and 38 other leaders of its affiliated unions. Out of these 49 executive board members, the following who are now serving have notorious Communist records:

Lewis Alan Berne, Donald Henderson, Joseph P. Selly, Julius Emspak, Grant W. Oakes, Eleanor Nelson, Joseph F. Jurich, Ben Gold, Morris Muster, Harry R. Bridges, Ferdinand C. Smith, Lewis Merrill, Abram Flaxer, Michael J. Quill, Joseph Curran, Reid Robinson, E. F. Burke, and Frank R. McGrath.

The foregoing 18 individuals who are leaders in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee are not the only members of the C. I. O. executive board who have had affiliations with Communist-front organizations, but they are the ones whose records are such that they indicate complete subservience to the Communist Party line, regardless of the ways in which that line may change. The United States Civil Service Commission has provided one of the best definitions of a Communist as a person "who follows the Communist Party line through one or more changes." On the basis of that definition, all of the 18 listed above are Communists. Their records are discussed later in this report.

Eighteen Communists bulk extremely large in an executive board which numbers only 49 members. Admittedly they do not constitute a majority of the board, but, as long as the C. I. O. shelters so large a number of leaders who are subversive, the entire organization wears a dark blot upon its escutcheon. If any organization included or ever had included among its top leaders as large a percentage of provable Nazis and never did anything to remove them, that organization would be rightly suspect in the minds of patriotic Americans.

The Special Committee on Un-American Activities is fully aware of the fact that large numbers of the rank and file members of organized labor have been sold on the idea that a Communist can be a good labor leader regardless of his communism. This, we believe, is a fallacy of the most sinister import. It is a fallacy invented by Communists for the sole purpose of worming their way into positions of leadership where, when the opportune moment arrives, they may be able to do the maximum harm to American institutions.

The strike at the aircraft plant of North American in California which occasioned the President's sending the United States Army to open the plant in defiance of the strikers is an excellent illustration of the damage that may be done when thousands of non-Communists submit to the leadership of a handful of Communists. Admittedly, that strike was organized and led by Communists. Admittedly, the overwhelming majority of the strikers had no sympathy whatever for communism, which is obviously true of the overwhelming majority of the membership of the entire C. I. O. Nevertheless, the strike occurred and the damage was done. It will be remembered that the North American strike took place some weeks before the entrance of Russia into the war. Today, the very Communist leaders who obstructed the production of military aircraft at North American are now clamoring for the enactment of a labor draft law which would subject every employee such as those at North American to the strictest military discipline.

The Communist-led strike at the North American Aviation Co. was not by any means the only such stoppage in vital war materials production. There was, to cite another example, the prolonged stoppage of production at the Allis-Chalmers plant—a political strike led by Communist Harold Christoffel, who is now active in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. There was also the most serious loss to the Nation's military security in the political strike at International Harvester where Communist Grant Oakes was in charge of the party's strategy to aid Hitler. In both the Allis-Chalmers and the International Harvester stoppages, there was no denying the Communist leadership but there was also no ground for believing that the overwhelming majority of the striking employees were even slightly Communist-inclined. As in the case of the majority of the strikers at North American Aviation Co., so in these other cases the majorities were submitting to Communist domination under the utterly false doctrine that even a Communist can do no wrong when he garbs himself for the role of a leader of organized labor. It is our considered judgment that, if Communists ever menace America, they will do so when working through such organizations as the National Maritime Union, the American Communications Association, the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

We incorporate at this point a summary of some of the Communist-led strikes which we included in our report to the House on January 2, 1943, and again point out that the very men who were responsible for these treasonable work stoppages now propose to say what the composition of the Congress of the United States shall be. The summary follows:

(a) Allis-Chalmers: One of the most damaging of the sabotage strikes was that at the Allis-Chalmers plant in Milwaukee which lasted for many weeks. The strike was conducted by the United Automobile Workers of America, whose leader at the plant was Harold Christoffel. The committee's investigation left no doubt about Christoffel's Communist affiliations. Among other Communist connections, he was one of the leaders of the American Peace Mobilization and of the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties.

(b) Harvill: The committee made a thorough investigation of the strike leadership at the Harvill plant in Los Angeles, Calif. There the striking union was the National Association of Die Casters, and the leader of the strike was Kenneth Eggert. Although Eggert slipped into California under an alias for the purpose of tying up the Harvill plant, the committee promptly identified him and exposed him as Kenneth Eggert, former Communist Party secretary in Toledo, Ohio.

(c) Vultee: The committee exposed the Communist leadership of the disastrous work stoppage at the Vultee aircraft plant in Los Angeles, Calif. The union involved was the United Automobile Workers of America, and among the more important Communist leaders of the strike was Wyndham Mortimer.

(d) International Harvester: For weeks, the International Harvester plant at Chicago was tied up by the Farm Equipment Organizing Committee under the leadership of Grant Oakes whose Communist record included prominent activity in the American Peace Mobilization.

(e) Aluminum: In April 1941, the National Association of Die Casters tied up the plants of the Aluminum Co. of America in Cleveland, Ohio. The committee's investigations turned up the fact that Alex Balint, leader of the strike, was an alien, an ex-convict, and an old-time Communist Party member who had used the name "Al Barry."

(f) North American: The strike at the North American Aviation in Inglewood, Calif., led to an order by the President for the United States Army to take over the plant. In this instance, also, the committee established the fact that the strike leadership was Communist. The president of the local of the United Automobile Workers which conducted the strike was Elmer J. Freitag. Freitag vehemently denied all Communist connections until confronted with indisputable documentary evidence in the committee's possession.

(g) New York Transport: In March 1941 the Transport Workers' Union called a strike which seriously interrupted the facilities of the transportation system in New York City. The committee published a special report, known as appendix V, which established the far-reaching Communist control of the Transport Workers' Union under the leadership of Michael J. Quill.

(h) Lumber: The International Wood Workers of America called and continued a disastrous strike in the lumber industry in defiance of governmental agencies. The union's leader, O. M. Orton, was exposed by the committee as a Communist who occupied a place of foremost leadership in the American Peace Mobilization.

(i) Trona: The Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers' Union, headed by Reid Robinson, brought about a particularly serious work stoppage at Trona, Calif. The committee's investigation clearly established the fact of the Communist motives and leadership of the strike. Reid Robinson was vice president of the American Peace Mobilization.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee is the creature of the C. I. O. executive board and, by subsequent ratification, of the C. I. O. national convention. While Communists do not constitute a majority of the executive board, the latter must assume responsibility for launching a political movement which serves Communist ends and a political movement in which Communists from coast to coast have penetrated in order to further those Communist ends.

Military Victory Not Enough

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, the problems of the world, as many and as complex as they are, actually grow out of the one problem presented by man himself. When we are able to solve the problem of man by changing him from a selfish and greedy individual into one whose impelling motives are rooted in spiritual values, then all other problems will be solved.

Under leave granted to extend my remarks I desire to include a very thoughtful article, written by the gentleman from Arkansas, the Honorable BROOKS HAYS, and published in the Commission, official publication of the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention.

The article follows:

MILITARY VICTORY IS NOT ENOUGH

(By BROOKS HAYS)

With so much being said about a post-war world of peace and prosperity it is easy to be lulled into a feeling that all of our enemies, foreign and domestic, and with them all evil things, are to be put down and that a safe and stable world will be ours.

It should be apparent, however, that permanent peace among the nations and the establishment of unity at home involve such tremendous plans for the Christian community and such heroic qualities in their execution that the end of war will only call for new and greater exertions.

I agree that we are coming to one of the great turning points in history and that our victory, now assured over the neopaganism of Germany and Japan, will give us a grand, new opportunity to prove the soundness of the Christian way, and to teach it to the peoples of the world.

It is not my purpose in this brief statement to attempt a description of the Christian world state, although the fashioning of a world government with power to stop aggression is the supremely important work ahead for your political representatives. The churches have a tremendous stake in these plans. We who labor in the field of politics and so-called secular government must not fail those who in the name of Christian brotherhood have supplied the vision of a warless world.

To provide the mechanical arrangements for preventing wars is a challenge to the statesmen, but the final answer is in the realm of religion, not in politics.

It would help greatly, however, in the solution of the peace problem and of many domestic problems to think of religion and politics as related. It is time to abandon the idea that the separation of church and state as institutions does not permit the occasional merging of political and religious influences. There is such a thing as Christian statesmanship.

The place of foreign missions is a vital one. I have in mind its relation to the work of building for peace and stability, rather than appraising its fundamental value, which must be measured in quite different terms. I have heard my colleague, Congressman WALTER JUDD, of Minnesota, speak more than once of the value of Christian missions to the Allies' cause in China. He cites the Soong family and Chiang Kai-shek as outstanding products of our missionary enterprise, and states that, measured strictly in military terms, it would be impossible to evaluate their contribution to our defense.

There is another factor in international movements which may or may not serve the cause of peace and good will. What of commerce, which "outruns every wind, defies every tempest, invades every land"? Will this influence be favorable or otherwise? We should challenge the assumption that trade, being for profit and often aggressive, is necessarily a contrary force. I concede that it has sometimes been exploitive and to that extent it has diluted the Christian message; and further that it can hardly be dealt with except as we improve the structure of our own national life from which commercial, as well as diplomatic, and missionary activities stem.

The kind of impression we make on other people through these contacts may in the future be the best test of our Christian character. It seems that we have, not two problems, but a single problem, the same here as abroad. We cannot do better in world relations than we do at home in applying Christian principles.

There is so much to do, yet this problem is finally resolved into the simple matter of turning to God in repentance for our materialism and indifference, and determining to live according to rules which the first-century Christians had for their world. That world was much like ours. There was oppression and despair as well as slavery. Human freedom, including freedom of the spirit, as identified with Christianity, became the greatest hope of nations. Sensual pleasures and the quest for material gains had been the preoccupation of those to whom the Christian message was first carried, and there is today among great numbers even in America the same dissatisfaction that the disillusioned multitudes of Jesus' time experienced.

We, therefore, confront two requirements: (1) Establish on the political front a world government with power to enforce decisions judicially determined. It is desperately important that this much be done. (2) Follow with an expanded and dynamic foreign missions program.

This time our hearts must be in both enterprises. We must assume some responsibility for the kind of institutions under which the people are to live. As one of my minister friends says, "We may not be our brothers' keepers, but we are our brothers' brothers." If we do not make progress along this line, new forms of violence will break out in the future; new evils will give us fresh cause for war. We must have an adequate faith in the healing quality of Christianity if we put down the hatreds and bitterness engendered by this war.

As Christians we must avoid punitive measures, not opposing firmness in dealing with future threats of aggression and tyranny but voicing the hope for a peace based upon justice.

We must let our concern for stricken people find practical expression There should be a new interest in medical missions and in agricultural rehabilitation. The relief programs of the United Nations will likely carry splendid benefits in nutritional and hygienic instruction but it is not exclusively a Government program. We must make it apparent that Christianity is concerned with the whole of life.

In considering our relation to world tasks, attitudes are more important than theories. When victory comes our war weariness may cause us to lose some of our fervor for world reconstruction. The tendency will be to retreat from the foreign scene to our home affairs—to let old Europe alone now—to forget our responsibilities in the Orient.

I am properly sympathetic, I think, with the desire not to be meddlers. There are many internal problems which we must let other people settle for themselves, but we must resolve to keep our interest in the world—the new and smaller world in which our children will live.

That will not be easy for life at home will have its complications. Jobs may be scarce and there will be friction over who will have them. There will be economic rivalries and sectional jealousies; clashes between employers and employees will challenge our capacity for judicial calmness in the midst of controversy. New tensions between the races may appear. Only our Christian idealism will carry us through disturbances of this kind.

We may look to the Government for help for the solution of some economic problems, but we will find that political processes are not sufficient. We must learn to work with each other in a more effective and Christian way. Groups must think less of rights and more of duties. Reliance may be retained in "due process of law," but unless we invoke the higher law of charity and human service we will still be plagued by disunity and strife.

Some of our men will return to us with impaired health. A grateful Government will make every possible effort to restore them. Outside these activities there will be the need for active and generous assistance for those who have borne the battle. And there will be the wounds of the spirit to heal, the disharmonies which spring from the maladjustments of war.

Can mental and spiritual calm be recovered? I think so. And yet the objective is not to recover something. I am envisioning rather the attaining of something new—a better life for America than anything yet attained—the development of qualities in our national life that will bring enrichment of the soul where material things have brought frustration and misery.

America is strong. We must exert that strength in Christian leadership, not to dominate, for to seek conquest would mean renunciation of our finest and noblest traditions. Our future must not be the way of imperialism. In humility we must resolve to do our part in the world's work and to build at home through self-effacing service a Christian brotherhood worthy of those who have sacrificed so much toward that goal.

A Prosecutor's Viewpoint on Narcotic Addiction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by William T. McCarthy, assistant in charge of criminal division, office of the United States attorney, Boston, Mass.:

A PROSECUTOR'S VIEWPOINT ON NARCOTIC ADDICTION

(By William T. McCarthy, assistant in charge of criminal division, office of United States attorney, Boston, Mass.)

In the light of some articles that have appeared from time to time dealing with the treatment of the narcotic addict before the court and his relationship to the probation officer, this paper, written as the result of years of experience, is submitted in the hope that it will be helpful to those who are obliged to consider and dispose of cases involving violations of the Federal narcotic law.

A "drug addict" has been defined by the act of Congress of January 19, 1929, establishing Public Health Service hospitals, as follows: "Any person who habitually uses any habit-forming narcotic drug as defined in this act so as to endanger the public morals, health, safety, or welfare, or who is, or has been, so far addicted to the use of such habit-forming narcotic drugs as to have lost the power of self-control with reference to his addiction."

No part of this article should be considered as applying to so-called medical addicts; that is, persons suffering from real physical disability where incidental dependence is caused by continuous administration of opiates for legitimate medical purposes. Used in its particular place morphine is of inestimable value to medical progress; but sold by commercial traffickers to satisfy a narcotic appetite, it is the spawn of the devil.

The drugs which come within the purview of Federal narcotic law enforcement are opium or coca leaves or any compound, manufacture, salt derivative, or preparation thereof, and marihuana. A distinct demarcation exists between the opiate habit and the cocaine or marihuana habit in that continuous use of sufficient amounts of opiates works a physical change in the user so that he develops physiological dependence and becomes physically distressed if his supply is interrupted or severely diminished. Neither cocaine nor marihuana may substitute for opiates in relieving opiate-withdrawal symptoms; consequently, some writers endeavor to differentiate between cocaine and marihuana addicts and opiate users. As a matter of fact, when excluded from a source of supply, it is not uncommon for marihuana or cocaine users to turn to opiates; and opiate users, to marihuana and cocaine. While the abuse of cocaine by addicts has been almost completely suppressed, it is a matter of historical interest at least to note that this drug formerly was often used coincidentally with a heavy opiate habit.

In this country two factors are responsible for the very substantial progress which has been made in the reduction of narcotic addiction; first, international control of narcotics through enforcement of cooperative Federal and State enactments; and, second, the realization on the part of physicians that safeguards must be employed in the administration of opiates to minimize the risk of addiction. This has prevented new persons from acquiring this unfortunate habit and accounts primarily for the reduction in per capita rate of addiction. However, some credit is due responsible narcotic hospitals for their patience, perseverance, and cooperation in arresting this vicious habit and in some instances accomplishing cures; also, some addicts have conquered this habit the hard way and not relapsed after a voluntary or involuntary forced abstinence from drugs, while others are cured because of a sense of moral obligation to themselves, to the community, and to their God. But these cases form a very small part of the whole picture, and past accomplishments must be considered when evaluating sociological viewpoints which may tend to weaken control of illicit drug traffic.

CAUSE OF DRUG ADDICTION

Before accepting the theory that the drug addict becomes such because he is a "sick man," let us analyze the phenomenon of drug addiction and illicit drug traffic. Dr. Morris Fishbein, editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association, writes, "Dr. W. L. Treadway of the United States Public Health Service is convinced that the first factor in drug addiction is ease of access to the drug" and "the most important predisposing cause is in inherent mental or nervous instability. Evidence is at hand, however, to show that addiction may be induced by the injudicious use of drugs in persons apparently free from any nervous or mental instability and, conversely, that due care in administrations may avert this result even in the unstable." A chimpanzee can be made an addict, and only a hardy psychiatrist, I believe, would argue that this addiction is caused by any fundamental personality deficiency in the animal.

That addiction follows accessibility to drugs is startlingly demonstrated by the fact that among 1,000 electrical engineers, 1,000 lawyers, 1,000 college professors, 1,000 medical doctors, or any other of the learned professions, we immediately and inevitably find an appreciable and significant addiction incident in the profession having free access to opiates. It would scarcely be urged by any reasonable person that medical doctors have in their ranks any greater proportion of mentally unstable persons than do the other learned professions. The obvious distinction between the medical profession and the others is that narcotic drugs are immediately and freely available at all times to the medical doctors; therefore, a larger percentage become addicted. If we should compare the incident of narcotic addiction among nurses, for example, with school teachers or some comparable group, we would find a much more substantial addiction percentage among nurses. Likewise, if we should compare the addiction ratio among physicians' wives with that of the wives of other professional men, we would find the addiction ratio higher with doctors' wives.

Again we have the obvious common factor that narcotic drugs are more or less freely available to persons in these categories, and it is well to remember the physiological facts of addiction. Generally speaking, closely repeated doses of opiates will develop in any person an addiction; that is, physical tolerance, habituation, and dependence. However, physical dependence can be corrected by a few days of forced abstinence from opiates, but elimination of the desire to reenjoy the effects of the drug is quite another matter. A corollary of the foregoing is the brutally plain fact that addicts make addicts. The addict is in effect a center of contagion or a focus of infection just as surely as if he carried communicable virus of his dreadful affliction. What Alexander Pope said about vice generally seems to apply with special force to the phenomenon of addiction:

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

THE NONCRIMINAL ADDICT

In addition to the noncriminal addicted medical man or woman, or their close associates who because of the propinquity to narcotics become addicted, the number of normal persons accidentally addicted make up a very small fraction of the addict population. With present medical knowledge and alternative drugs available in some cases, few persons are accidentally addicted through medication; and if so, they offer the best prospect of a prompt cure. Few of them appear before the courts. Of course, all addicted professional people are not necessarily noncriminal. One may find criminal types here, such as the abortionist, the "thieves' doctor," and the M. D. who is primarily a drug peddler and only incidentally and secondarily an addict. Then, too, there is the alcoholic who, given opiates to straighten him out when recovering from a spree, decides the cure is worth repeating.

THE CRIMINAL ADDICT

Both logical reasoning and demonstrable facts place the great group of narcotic addicts in the category of criminals first and addicts later. Because of its dark passageways and disregard for decency and moral order, the underworld has been for many years the principal recruiting ground for new addicts in contradistinction to the law-abiding order where drugs are available only to the few. The crook and the hoodlum, the prostitute and the shoplifter are most frequently and freely exposed; therefore, their ranks logically contain a large percentage of recruits to drug addiction.

Apologists for the drug addict frequently state that "big shot" criminals are not addicts. If the proponents of this theory mean there are more addicts in the little criminal group than there are in the major offender group, they are unanswerably right because there are more "little shots" than there are "big shots" in the criminal world. For example, the Uniform Crime Reports of the Federal Bureau of Investigation show that for the 6-month period, January to June 1942, there were only 1,356 murders, 1,061 manslaughters, and 13,918 robberies; but there were 72,634 burglaries and 210,036 larcenies. Naturally, we can safely conclude more drug addicts are thieves and burglars than robbers or murderers. In his article, Lindesmith's Mythology, published in the November-December 1940 issue of the Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, Judge Twain Michelsen refutes the observation that "big shot" criminals are not addicts and recites several pages of names and records of "big shot" addicts.

The foregoing should serve to dispel the illusion that the addict undergoes a certain amount of secondary social regression and becomes a criminal because his illicit use of drugs necessitates approach to the underworld for his supply. With few exceptions the use of narcotics is not the efficient cause of the presence of the addict in the underworld; he is usually thoroughly conversant with a dubious environment long before he becomes addicted.

In attempting to dispel the conception that the opiate addict is a "dope fiend" who is stimulated to crimes of violence, too much emphasis is placed on the soothing effects of opiates. In the "Indispensable Use of Narcotics," published by the American Medical Association, Drs. E. C. Cutler and J. W. Holloway state: "It is unnecessary to emphasize the desirability of establishing such an attitude in the patient that he approaches the operative ordeal with a complete lack of apprehension. * * * Morphine lends itself to this purpose. * * * Morphine continues to be the most universally satisfactory type of preoperative medication." The drug that allows a patient to contemplate the surgeon's scalpel with equanimity also gives the irresponsible criminal a false sense of security and serves as an obvious explanation in many instances for the commission of very serious crimes.

The statement, "The long criminal records which drug addicts sometimes accumulate must be studied carefully," implies that these records arise from addiction. I agree that the records of these people should be carefully examined, but such records usually disclose a first arrest for something other than narcotics. While it is not conclusive, it gives rise to the presumption that the man was a criminal first and an addict afterward. Even where the first arrest is for narcotics, careful examination often discloses criminal or borderline activities before the narcotic agent happened to apprehend him. It is all too apparent that we have no simple medical problem with which to deal, no mere "sick" man to cure. As a matter of fact, narcotic law-enforcement officers point out that incarceration of criminal narcotic addicts frees the public from the depredations of a class of professional criminals.

I am aware there is a dangerous school of thought which regards the action of a bank robber as a tendency of protoplasm to strive to get into a more comfortable, pleasing, or suitable environment and believes that all our criminals should be dealt with by psychiatrists rather than judges, but I cannot subscribe to such a Godless doctrine. If a person joins a band of addicted confidence men and by reason of their representations, their example, or access to drugs which they supply, elects to assume the disability of drug addiction, thereby committing crimes against orderly government and establishing another link in a chain designed to pass this scourge on to others, why should he be absolved from the consequences of his acts by placing emphasis on his sickness rather than his criminality?

Dr. J. Bouquet, the French expert, in his remarks included in the papers of the twenty-fourth Meeting of Opium Advisory Committee at Geneva, Switzerland, referring to a north African situation, makes these trenchant comments:

"Nothing, I think, can be expected from methods which liken a toxicomaniac to a sick person and not to an offender. Such methods are only applicable to the class of drug sufferers who, as the result of necessary temporary medical treatment, have become accustomed to morphine or heroin. Only such toxicomaniacs are to be pitied. * * *

"But it must not be forgotten that this class constitutes a very small group of toxicomaniacs. The majority have no desire to become cured: it consists only of depraved people who are not only useless to the community but dangerous to the public welfare because they have only one desire, that is, to find a means to satisfy their vice, however, ignoble the means to be employed to that end may be.

"In my opinion, such people should be considered not as sick people worthy of pity but as delinquents who must be prevented from causing harm and who must be treated with the greatest severity."

In a report dated July 25, 1943, on the present drug addiction situation in Tunisia, Dr. J. Bouquet states, "It is argued that the majority of the drug addicts are vicious criminals and that they deserve to be imprisoned rather than placed in hospitals."

THE HANDLING OF THE PROBLEM

Statistics for the United States Public Health Service predicated on the population of the narcotic farms as a whole convince me that prognosis with reference to effecting cures for the criminal type addict is poor, as evidenced by the continued procession of ex-Lexington or ex-Fort Worth addicts who reenter our criminal courts. I believe the problem in this country is now primarily—I might say almost wholly—a law-enforcement matter, and resolves itself into one of control of narcotic addiction through control of illicit narcotic traffic. The medical aspects are merely incidental and supplementary. We must look to our police, our prosecutors, our courts, and our penitentiaries as the real line of defense against narcotic addiction because:

1. The best way to "cure" narcotic addicts is for the addiction never to have occurred.

2. The next most certain "cure" would be to make it impossible for the addict to obtain narcotics.

8. A corollary of successful medical and psychiatric treatment of the addict is that the "cured" patient, when placed on his own in society, finds drugs very difficult to obtain. Relapses are most frequent when drugs are most accessible.

THE PROSECUTOR AND THE COURT

An alert prosecutor interested in his work has at all times the opportunity to bring before a tribunal first-line criminals, such as the notorious gangsters commonly referred to as "Murder, Incorporated," as well as the street peddler, the store stick-up man, the burglar, the prescription forger, the medical man who prostitutes his profession to cater to the appetite of addicts, and the contemptible thief who would steal the pocketbook of a scrub woman in order to satisfy his appetite for drugs. Sometimes the frankness of a minor drug peddler discloses another whose operations frequently cover several continents. The purpose, aim, and object of duly constituted authority should be the control and flow of narcotic drugs so that they will be available for the deserving, sick patient under proper medical control and not for the trafficker and the ordinary addict.

That I have no time nor patience with the sociologist who preaches only the doctrine of hospitalization for the addicted drug peddler must be self-evident to anyone who reads this article. The circumstance of sending a defendant to the penitentiary for a long term instead of to the Public Health Service Hospital for a short term, does not indicate abandonment of all hope of curing his addiction.

THE FUNCTION OF UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

Hospitals are desirable and necessary experimental stations, and public-health hospitals offer the best known techniques for the treatment of the narcotic habit. While they have not developed nor accepted claims of any quick or easy cure for drug addiction, they have protected victims, indigent or otherwise, from the uninformed, the quacks, and the charlatans. We should be ever watchful, however, lest the admission of a great many underworld characters to such narcotic hospitals destroys their real purpose and character and becomes a frustration to law enforcement. These institutions then become "country clubs" where big or little criminals can sojourn for a few months in idyllic surroundings with much better food than is available to the law-abiding citizen. We are simply "shadow boxing" with the narcotic problem if the drug peddlers are to be turned back every 6 months or so to resume activity, contaminate others, and to act as mechanical rabbits for the minions of the law to pursue.

ROLE OF THE PROBATION OFFICER

If the facts of a defendant's background are not already apparent, the presentence investigation of a probation officer with adequate knowledge of narcotic traffic will, of course, be of considerable assistance to the court. As to the addict on probation, it is not necessary to tell a probation officer who has had extended experience with narcotic addicts that, unless carefully selected, they represent a most difficult and perplexing problem. If the probationer has been a peddler, he not only has an urge to return to his addiction, but—as pointed out—he has been engaged in a crime which, in the addict or nonaddict, brings about a high degree of recidivism. In addition, he is likely to have behind him many years of other professional crimes. Schooled in dissimulation, he may outwardly appear to be making a successful probation, while actually he has reverted to the peddling of drugs, to other crimes, and to his addiction.

I do not mean to be understood as discouraging the idea of probation for these people, for occasionally the probation officer may receive an addict whose period of supervision will be entirely satisfactory. What I intend to convey is that subjects for probation should be carefully chosen.

CONCLUSION

Within the space allotted I have tried to give the reader a full and fair picture of the narcotic problem as it applies to the Federal law enforcement. I have been disturbed at the attitude of some writers who have not hesitated to attack the whole structure of the Harrison Narcotic Act and who have not been unwilling to advance their dangerous philosophies in this most important field of endeavor. We cannot permit false sentimentality and the "sick man" concept to break down our law-enforcement efforts. We cannot tolerate any experimentation or trifling with the administration of our narcotic laws, Federal or State. Such an unfortunate happening would do irreparable damage to our civilization. The Harrison Narcotic Act and the Narcotic Import and Export Act are very efficacious laws. They are a part of the golden treasury of laws that help to preserve our social order and we should resist with all the power at our command any attempt to interfere with their proper administration.

I Am An American Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following address of Mr. Edward J. Shaughnessy, special assistant to the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, delivered at Boston, Mass., on Sunday, May 21, 1944, on the occasion of the celebration of I Am An American Day:

I am always happy to find a reason to come to my native State and revive the friendships of another day, but I am particularly happy to be here today—I Am An American Day—to participate in a fete honoring those among us who have achieved the full rights of citizenship by reaching their twenty-first birthday, and those who have voluntarily sought and have been granted American citizenship by process of naturalization.

I can think of no better way of beginning these brief remarks than by quoting from the President's message setting aside this day as I Am An American Day. I quote:

"Whereas our Nation has been enriched, both spiritually and materially, by the naturalization of many thousands of foreign-born men and women, and by the coming of age of great numbers of our youth, who have thereby achieved the full stature of citizenship; and

"Whereas these citizens have strengthened our country by their services at home and on the battlefield:

"Now, therefore, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, pursuant to the aforesaid public resolution, do hereby designate Sunday, May 21, 1944, as I Am An American Day, and do set that day aside as a public occasion for the honoring of American citizenship by giving special recognition to all of our citizens who have attained their majority or have been naturalized during the past year; and I call upon Federal, State, and local officials, and patriotic, civic, and educational organizations to plan and hold, on or about May 21, exercises designed to assist our citizens, both native-born and naturalized, to understand more fully the great privileges and responsibilities of citizenship in our democracy."

With these words, in part, the President of the United States proclaimed today as one to be set aside for an inventory of the rights, duties, and responsibilities which comprise citizenship of the United States. Perhaps never before in the history of this country has an evaluation of that status been of such paramount importance.

The historical background of this day is intensely interesting and shows gradual development in awareness of the value of citizenship. These ceremonies for new citizens, especially for those who are citizens through naturalization, are not new. Twenty-nine years ago, almost to the day, President Woodrow Wilson appeared at a great reception for several thousand naturalized citizens at Philadelphia. In that inspiring address he spoke of the gifts brought to this country by immigrants and of the ideals on which our Government is based. In speaking of the birth of America, he said:

"America was created to unite mankind by those passions which lift and not by the passions which separate and debase. * * * We came to America, either by ourselves or in the persons of our ancestors, to better the ideals of men, to make them see finer things than they had seen before, to get rid of the things that divide, and to make sure of the things that unite."

And in another part of that famous speech, President Wilson said:

"I was born in America. You dreamed dreams of what America was to be, and I hope you brought those dreams with you. No man that does not see visions will ever realize any high hope or undertake any high enterprise. Just because you brought dreams with you, America is more likely to realize dreams such as you brought. * * *

"A nation that is not constantly renewed out of new sources is apt to have the narrowness and prejudice of a family; whereas, America must have this consciousness, that on all sides it touches elbows and touches hearts with all the nations of mankind."

I take pride in recalling that my four grandparents came to America from Ireland about 100 years ago, bringing those dreams with them, and settled in eastern Massachusetts. They, and three succeeding generations have lived—and are living—to realize the fruits of those dreams.

No single individual and no one group can really claim credit for the origin of this occasion because it goes back to ancient days.

On May 3, 1940, the Congress of the United States passed a public resolution setting aside the third Sunday in May of each year as I Am an American Day, so that our people might join together to pay tribute to citizenship of this country.

On this occasion, the opportunity to speak for the American people in welcoming our country's new citizens into our ranks is an honor which I feel deeply. And in this event—one of the most typically American that it would be possible to imagine—I am not alone in the consciousness of honor. Pride in being able to greet the year's newcomers into our national electorate is shared by millions of other Americans. For this observance—which is unlike anything held in any other country on earth—is democratic in its very essence. On this day, among the millions who make up our Nation's citizenry, young or old, known or obscure, the honors are even.

During the past year the United States has enlarged its voting body by some 2,400,000 persons. It is for the purpose of giving formal recognition to their new status and of reminding them—and ourselves as well—of the precious rights and the solemn obligations which that status embodies, that we gather in response to a proclamation by our President designating this third Sunday in May as I Am An American Day.

The great majority of these 2,400,000 new voters are Americans by birth. The right to vote comes to them on attainment of the age of 21 years. Of these, there have been about 2,000,000 during the past year. They are Americans by birth, though I think I am quite safe in saying that among these young men and women there is not one who, if the choice were offered, would not choose to be an American, or who, indeed, would not defend that preference with life itself. At this moment, across the seas, many thousands of these young people are doing exactly that. On this I Am An American Day, we give them greeting, with a prayer that God will help us speed the day when they will be with us again to enjoy, in victory, those precious rights which they have preserved.

Along with these native-born Americans, we have also accepted into our citizenship during the past calendar year, 397,684 persons who were not born in this country and who had previously owed no formal allegiance to our Government. Having lived among us, having witnessed the working of our democracy, and having come to the decision that they would rather be a part of that democracy than of any other national entity on earth, these foreign-born residents in America have, of their own accord and with the consent of the United States Government, taken the action necessary to become citizens. They have met the prerequisites for naturalization; they have taken the oath of allegiance; and they now share equally the privileges and the obligations of all American citizens.

Thus these 397,684 new Americans are Americans solely by choice. Of their own volition they have sworn to renounce "absolutely and entirely" any allegiance to a foreign state and to "support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States of America against all enemies, foreign and domestic."

Long before they took that oath, these residents of America knew that our country was a community of free citizens. If the world were to be swept into conflict over the issue of man's freedom, they knew which side this Nation would take. Had they so wished, there was opportunity then to change their decision. Until the oath is taken, an application for American citizenship can be abandoned at any time. But war did come, a war over the issue of man's freedom—or man's domination. And as the design of the aggressors took in the entire world as its field, it was inevitable that this Nation should be attacked and that it should join the fight for the preservation of freedom.

The decision of those who had expressed their wish to become American citizens remained unchanged. All those whom we welcome on this I Am an American Day took their oath of allegiance to America after this country had declared war against the Axis. And today they are carrying out in full the obligations which they assumed upon taking that oath. Both the production figures of our war industries where many of them are employed and the casualty lists now coming to us from the battlefields attest to the spirit in which they are meeting their obligation as citizens.

To these Americans by choice, therefore, we also extend greetings on this I Am an American Day. We believe they decided well because they have committed themselves to that cause which is the high hope of a decent world for themselves and the generations to come. In the contest on this issue, one does not wait until the battle is won. The decision is made, not on the basis of relative fighting strengths and logistics, but in the heart; it is dictated not by considerations of personal ambition, but by ideals and an innate sense of decency. Our new Americans, thus guided, could not have decided differently.

Included in the second group I have mentioned, we have accepted as new citizens within the past year, 56,396 men and women members of the armed forces who were noncitizens, more than 4,000 of these service people having been naturalized overseas. They have attained full status by virtue of their service, in accordance with provisions of the Second War Powers Act. None of us harbor doubt of the eligibility of these fighting men. They are now fulfilling the highest obligation of American citizenship. They are meeting that obligation as it needs to be met—with all they have. Some of them, before we shall have finished with this war, will have given their lives in the cause of the country which they had long wished to make their own. Along with their American-born comrades, they have carried on with valor through the hour of tragedy and darkness, at Pearl Harbor, Bataan, and Corregidor, and they are carrying on now with the same gallant spirit in the sure and steady march toward victory, in which we count among the milestones the Battle of Midway, of the Coral Sea, the daring capture and successful holding of Guadalcanal, our victories at Palau, Yap, Woleai, and the Ulithi Islands within 550 land miles of the Philippines, and the crushing defeat of our enemies in north Africa. Prominent among those to whom we dedicate this day, therefore, and deep in our own affections as fellow-citizens, are these newcomers in uniform. Wherever they may be, our message to them on the I Am An American Day includes the hope and prayer that they too will one day return to join us in the peaceful exercise of the freedom which they have preserved.

The three classifications of new American citizens—the native-born, the naturalized, and the foreign-born now serving in the armed forces—make up the huge total which is this year added to our national electorate. Over the past few years the numerical gains in the body of our citizenry have been greater than those of any similar period in our Nation's history. The number of native-born Americans reaching the age of 21 has shown a natural increase. But along with this trend, which was to be expected, were the less predictable but very significant increases through the naturalization courts. Ever since war clouds first overcast the European scene a few years ago, there has been an ever-increasing rate, with almost 400,000 persons coming into citizenship last year by way of the naturalization process. Thus despite the fact that new immigration has been practically closed off, and for more than 20 years has been held down to modest quotas, we are now witnessing a greater growth in our electorate than any previously known, even in times when the gates to America were open more widely.

In this way has our noncitizen population—people from many other lands—registered its preference. For these people the world crisis has sharpened the issue. Contemplating naturalization, some may have anticipated some personal advantage or greater security. But in the minds of nearly all, I think, there has been something far more. During the past few critical years, something bolder and finer has brought them to the ranks of the citizen. In taking the oath to defend the Constitution "against all enemies," the applicant for citizenship is not faced with a mere abstraction. He knows who the enemies of the moment are. He knows their evil design. For him, a part of the commitment to defend the Constitution is, at this time, the duty of doing all in his power to bring about the defeat of the forces of darkness loose in the world.

Preferences, long dormant, are sometimes brought to the point of decision in just such an hour of crisis. Naturalization is a long process. For many members of our alien population it has involved difficult hurdles, such as the educational qualifications. In time of peace there were reasons for the inertia which kept these people from making their applications. But men do not put off for tomorrow that which stirs their souls today. And to all persons who have in them a love of freedom and a respect for the dignity of human beings, these are soul-stirring times indeed. All that they hold most precious, even the freedom to worship their God, is at stake. Is it any wonder, then, that they should choose this time to make the decision which did not weigh so heavily upon them a few years ago?

To the leaders of the Axis nations this upward trend of naturalization in America is not good news. It is the manifestation of a new and greater national unity. Contrary to the hopes of Axis leaders and to the purpose of their active propaganda machines, the alien population of America was not influenced, cajoled, or misled into taking a stand that would have been harmful to our morale and disruptive to our war program. Appeals to race hatred and the spread of Nazi and Fascist myths, together with veiled or open threats of retribution—all the familiar Axis devices of terrorism and psychological warfare—were attempted at long distance through the propaganda networks, and all failed equally of their purpose. In America, it was discovered, these tactics did not work. Of the 5,000,000 persons who were aliens in this country in 1940, only an inconsequential fraction proved responsive to such propaganda. The others joined wholeheartedly in the American war effort, and hundreds of thousands of them applied for American citizenship. This was their answer to poisonous pens and voices.

To those in our country who still seek citizenship among us, the country does not offer personal safety as an inducement in this time of crisis. On the contrary, the inducement that is now offered in being an American is the opportunity to face and destroy the forces threatening the world, the opportunity to make sacrifices and undergo hardships, to live courageously, and to endure courageously in support of the determination of our people to remain forever free. That is what our new citizens of 1943 have learned. That is why they are proud to join us in saying, today, "I am an American." All the glory of America, that has been, that is today, and that will be, is theirs to share, in uprightness, in devotion, and in affection.

New Deal and Presidential Electors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I am inserting an interesting and scholarly treatise of our former colleague, John J. O'Connor, on the question, "Is the New Deal laying the groundwork to intimidate the Presidential electors, by using the Army, even?"

IS THE NEW DEAL LAYING THE GROUNDWORK TO INTIMIDATE THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS, BY USING THE ARMY, EVEN?

Some columnists and editors have recently adopted a line of comment on the outcome of the splits in the Southern States that is entirely misleading to the voters. For instance, Mr. Arthur Krock, brilliant columnist for the New York Times, in his article of June 12, following the line of some other writers, states, most astoundingly, in effect, that Mr. Roosevelt and his cohorts will find a way, willy nilly, to thwart any attempt of any electors to vote for a candidate other than Mr. Roosevelt, who will be nominated at the Democratic National Convention at Chicago.

In reviewing the recent revolts against the New Deal in the Democratic Party, in certain Southern States, such as Texas, Louisiana, South Carolina, Mississippi, and so forth, Mr. Krock follows the line of some other newspapermen, in throwing doubt upon the legality of electors voting "free" when they meet in the electoral college. He feels the courts can dispel and public opinion destroy any such bolt, or free voting.

Other writers substantially state the correct position: "It has been routine for electors to vote for candidates getting popular majority in their States, but constitution does not bind them to do so." (Scripps-Howard dispatch from Washington, May 27.)

The reasons for Mr. Krock's conclusion, even if they do not reflect his own wish, are most alarming, namely, he writes:

"The Federal judiciary was largely appointed by the President, and it can be relied on to find law which, as in this instance, would be based on tradition, almost unbroken custom, and public morality. (3) The President, leader of the people and of the armed forces in wartime, could easily enforce public opinion to the point of restraining electors from disregarding the will of the voters in their States."

That sure is something. One wonders if an anti-new dealer advocated such an abuse of our judicial process, and the suggested use of our armed forces, whether he might not be charged with treason or violation of one of the many laws, the courts might be relief on to find, such as against bearing arms or supporting insurrection against our Government.

To what pass have we come—when those presently in power in our Government, have the audacity to hold out such a threat against the free vote of our electors—on whose free exercise of their right to give their votes for a President and Vice President, as provided in the Constitution (art. II, sec. 1), there is no limitation on their free choice whatsoever. They are bound by absolutely nothing that can happen prior to the meeting of the electoral college on the first Monday after the second Wednesday in December (U. S. C. A., title 3, sec. 5a). They are State officers and not Federal officers, and each State has exclusive jurisdiction over their election and violations connected therewith (Fitzgerald v. Green, 134 U. S. 378, Va. 1890).

Any honest convictions that the elector is in any way bound, and has no free vote can only be attributed to the misconception that the voter casts his vote directly for the President. That was the fallacy, deliberately injected into the question arising over the soldier vote, and purposely, to confuse the issue. No voter has yet had, nor will he have, in 1944—short of the use of the armed forces—any opportunity to vote directly for Mr. Roosevelt, for President. Under our Constitution, he is still relegated to the representative Government, indirect method of voting for certain citizens of his State, who will, in their due turn, cast their votes for a President and a Vice President. True, new dealism and communism would have it otherwise, without even waiting on the orderly process of constitutional amendment.

For the first time in our political history has it been suggested that the electors should be constrained, or even influenced, by public opinion, or tradition, or unbroken custom the unbroken is, at least, historically incorrect), or "public morality"—whatever that is. Is it the New Deal prescription?

Any elector who would, for one moment, be influenced by such fabricated controls, or influence, and not give his vote as prescribed in our Constitution would prove himself unworthy to have been duly elected by the people to the high office of elector. He should have run as a "rubber-stamp Congressman."

The exact fact is, and the written law of the land is, that any objection to any vote cast by any elector is decided in each House of Congress, acting concurrently, without any aid or interference, suggested or permissible, by the Executive or the courts, or the armed forces. (U. S. Code Annotated, title 3, sec. 17.) Put that in the old pipe and light it.

What the purveyors of these threats, subtle or brazen, have in mind is the success which the new dealers have had in making guayule-stamp Congressmen out of Senators and Representatives, who were duly elected by their constituents to represent them—not to serve, completely, the Executive—but to cast their free votes.

There are some of us who do not treat as idle the suggestion that Mr. Roosevelt might send the armed forces to Capitol Hill, where the electoral votes are cast. A distinguished Representative in Congress, from California, some few years back, told the story of the experience an Army colonel, from that locality, had in connection with his desire for promotion. As the story went, when the colonel finally got an audience with the President, Mr. Roosevelt put to him this last question—"Colonel, if I should order you to take your regiment and march on Capitol Hill and order Congress to adjourn, would you do it?" The response of the startled colonel was "Well—No, Mr. President, I don't think I could carry out that order."

Whether our President was joking or not, the colonel did not get his promotion.

As corroboration, add the President's frequent annoyed expressions, then current, like "Congress should go home." "All they do here is put speeches in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," etc.

The date of the incident was given as at about the time the President was having trouble with Congress over his Supreme Court packing bill and his dictatorial reorganization bill. Newspapers files will show it was also at just about that time, the spring of 1938, when the President delivered, at Warm Springs, at midnight his pronouncement to the whole world—a shirt-tail disclaimer—the press called it—that he had no desire to be a dictator. The psychiatrists have an explanation for such protests. Shakespeare also commented on them. (Hamlet, act 3, scene 2.)

Every member of the bar in the United States, sworn to uphold our Constitution and our laws, should publicly volunteer, and now, to represent any elector, if and whenever his right to cast a free vote in the electoral college shall be challenged, otherwise than in the manner provided by the law of the land.

If that other day, now threatened, shall ever come, call it E-day—the End.

Operations of the War Manpower Commission in Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission:

OFFICE FOR EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT,
WAR MANPOWER COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., June 8, 1944.

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK,
Majority Leader, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 22, and I appreciate your thoughtfulness in enclosing the clipping from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 16, and directing my attention to the remarks therein of Representative HOFFMAN, of Michigan, concerning the operations of the War Manpower Commission in his district.

The Congressman's comments are not very clear, but seem to bear upon two phases of the Commission's operations. He is in error in his understanding that Plainwell has been put in the same area with Battle Creek and Grand Rapids. On the contrary, Plainwell is included in the Kalamazoo labor-market area. This area classification around a central city encompasses such nearby towns or communities as would represent a locality wherein reside workers who might be considered part of the general working community, and from which principal employers secure the majority of their employees. Thus, each area is bounded by a radius of normal worker commutation.

Therefore, in classifying the labor-market area conditions around a central city, such as Kalamazoo, the Commission's certification as to existing conditions would naturally include the suburban or nearby communities, of which Plainwell and seven other small towns are a part.

The other reference presumably is to the Commission's employment stabilization program, which has for its principal purpose the prevention of unnecessary movement of workers in essential industry, with resultant loss of production. These local stabilization plans in no sense cause older men to be denied work. On the contrary, the plan merely stabilizes the labor market, while other procedures of the Commission are designed specifically to see that workers of all ages and classes, who are able and willing to participate in the war effort, shall find jobs where they may be used to best advantage.

The inclusion of Plainwell, or any other town, in a given labor-market area would have no adverse effect upon local people seeking employment, but the local office of the employment service naturally would exert its best efforts to see that all local workers are first placed in war useful jobs.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL V. MCNUTT, Chairman.

Senate Joint Resolution 93

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, Senate Joint Resolution 93 is a resolution which among other things authorizes the President "to advance the date of the independence of the Philippine Islands by proclaiming their independence as a separate and self-governing nation prior to July 4, 1946." When it was before the Committee on Insular Affairs I proposed to insert in section 3, after the word "authorized", the following language: "After constitutional processes and normal functions of government have been restored in the Philippine Islands." I desire to make clear the significance of this amendment and the reasons for it.

On November 10, 1943, the House passed House Joint Resolution 189, providing that "notwithstanding the provisions of section 5 of article 7 of the amended Constitution of the Philippines, the present President and Vice President of the Commonwealth of the Philippines shall continue in their respective offices until the President of the United States shall proclaim that constitutional processes and normal functions of government shall have been restored in the Philippine Islands. Thereupon the tenure of office of the present President of the Commonwealth shall cease and the Vice President shall become President to serve until such time as his successor shall have been elected and qualified according to the constitution and the laws of the Philppines."

A good many of us opposed the passage of this resolution, largely because we feared that arbitrary setting aside by the United States of the Constitution of the Philippines might do a great deal more harm in the Philippines and all through Asia than continuing in their respective offices the present officials of the government in exile of the Commonwealth of the Philippines could do good.

To millions in Asia and in the United States, the Constitution of the Philippines is almost a sacred document, far more important than any individuals who hold office under it, just as we believe maintaining inviolate the Constitution of the United States, unless changed by orderly processes, is more important than any particular officials. It means perhaps even more in Asia than in the West, because this is the first time in history that a major power has voluntarily granted such a constitution to a colonial possession.

Therefore, I felt strongly that the very first step to take with regard to the Philippines is to restore the "constitutional processes and normal functions of government" which we suspended in House Joint Resolution 189, and only thereafter to advance the date of their independence as a separate and self-governing nation.

Without such a definite stipulation in Senate Joint Resolution 93, there is no assurance in law to the Filipinos that we might not proclaim their independence under a government which had been established, or at least continued in office, by the Congress of the United States rather than under the constitutional government chosen by the Filipinos themselves.

If, as I assume is the case, we do not expect the President of the United States to proclaim the independence of the Philippine Islands except under its constitutional government, then there could be no valid objection to making our intentions perfectly clear in the resolution itself—clear to the Filipinos, to other peoples in Asia, including the Japanese and their puppets, and clear to the American people.

This resolution was proposed primarily to express our recognition of the courageous demonstration the Filipinos have given of their capacity to govern themselves in a progressive and democratic manner and to give additional incentive to them as they resist Japan's invaders so valiantly, assuring them that their loyalty will be rewarded by granting them full independence just as soon as our joint efforts succeed in driving out the Japanese and restoring the constitutional processes we ourselves set aside. I am glad the Committee on Insular Affairs accepted the amendment and that the House has unanimously adopted the resolution as amended.

Columnist Calls Turn on Big Business Scheme To Control Sale of Surplus War Goods

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, June 16, Mr. Drew Pearson in his column, Washington Merry-Go-Round, called the turn on scheme which has evidently been hatched in the minds of a few big businessmen for the purpose of seeing to it that big business has first call on the $25,000,000,000 in Government-owned war plants and the billions of dollars worth of other usable consumers goods surpluses which could mean life or death to the Nation's small businesses if not distributed in an orderly manner.

The House Small Business Committee of which I am privileged to be a member, has studied this surplus disposal problem for nearly a year now. The committee, after many hearings and much careful thought, sponsored a bill designed to protect legitimate and established wholesale and retail firms as well as manufacturers. Particular emphasis was placed on provisions which would protect small business firms and would then afford these small firms a fair and equal opportunity to participate in these surplus sales.

For reasons, not clear to me before reading Mr. Pearson's column, slow progress was made on the bill sponsored unanimously by the House Small Business Committee. If Mr. Pearson is correct and an attempt is being made to slide through the Congress in secret meetings a bill on this subject which is designed solely to be beneficial to big business only, I hope that any Members who might be unwittingly lending their aid to such a program will pause and take sober thought of the effect that their actions might have upon the small business firms of the Nation which are, as Mr. Baruch so correctly and, I hope, sincerely describes as "the backbone of this Nation."

A copy of Mr. Pearson's column, which usually appears in the Washington Post, but which did not appear in that paper last Saturday, when this subject was discussed is as follows:

WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND — BATTLE RAGES ON DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS WAR GOODS

(By Drew Pearson)

WASHINGTON, June 16.—While American doughboys are fighting the toughest battle in history, another decisive battle is going on in Washington without benefit of headlines. It is the battle for control of the tremendous surplus war property owned by the Government.

One group, headed by the Barney Baruch-Lehman Bros.-General Electric faction, has the skids all greased to pass, as quickly as possible, legislation putting surplus property mainly in the hands of the big firms which have profited most from the war.

The other group, headed by a coalition of Democratic and Republican Congressmen, is determined that the disposal of war goods shall not head the country into another economic tailspin.

At the end of World War No. 1 the United States Government sold about $7,000,000,000 worth of surplus goods with no orderly plan. Some of the goods were dumped on the market, with speculators making fortunes overnight. Some were sold in France without any stipulation that the French people were to benefit, so that French speculators bought them up and reaped juicy profits by shipping them back to the United States of America.

SEVENTY-FIVE BILLION DOLLARS INVOLVED

Part of the blame went to Bernard M. Baruch, criticized for turning the key on his War Industries Board immediately after the war and going home.

Now, instead of $7,000,000,000 there are about $75,000,000,000 worth of surplus war goods—including 1,500 new war plants built with $25,000,000,000 of Government funds. Months ago, Republican CHARLES HALLECK, of Indiana, and Democrat WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, started work on a bill to provide the equitable sale of post-war Government property. Hearings began in March.

Then, suddenly, John Hancock, of Lehman Bros., whom Baruch brought down from Wall Street to write his post-war reconversion report, swung into action. With him swung Will Clayton, largest cotton broker in the world, whom Baruch already has placed in the key job of disposing of United States war property. They asked Congressmen PATMAN and HALLECK to hold up their bill. The latter two obliged.

Meanwhile, the Baruch-Hancock group prepared a new bill, called the Clayton bill, which has the effect of giving one man—in this case Cotton Broker Clayton—blanket authority to dispose of war property in any way he sees fit.

FAVORED BY BIG BUSINESS

Members of the House Small Business Committee are up in arms. So is the Senate Post-war Mobilization Committee. They claim that the Clayton bill is tailor-made for big business and speculators, and that, if it passes, the country can expect a new heyday of monopoly and another chaotic economic tailspin.

Meanwhile, greased-lightning hearings on the Clayton bill are being held before Senator GEORGE's Post-War Committee, with his friend, Scott Russell, head of Bibb Manufacturing Co., of Macon, Ga., one of the biggest textile operators in the South, serving gratis as committee adviser.

Here is how war goods are now being sold. The Army dumped 5 tons of screws on the market at Memphis, Tenn. No firm in that area was equipped to buy so many screws at once. * * * 25,000 small portable phonographs, originally purchased to trade to African natives, were offered for sale to a big New York department store. Phonographs are extremely hard to buy today, but one store was offered the whole lot. * * * Seven million pairs of jute socks, brand-new, have been declared surplus by the Army. * * * A Washington department store recently advertised all-wool tropical worsted suits for men, price $24.50. They had been bought from the Government for $17. Standard wholesale price is $27, the retail price about $35. Cheap sales of this kind naturally hurt other merchants.

Creation of Office of Senator-at-Large for Ex-Presidents of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a bill to create the office of Senator-at-Large in the Senate of the United States for ex-Presidents of the United States which was referred to the House Committee on the Judiciary. Since that time more than a score of my colleagues have expressed enthusiastic approval of the proposal and not one has expressed dissent.

Among those endorsing the idea is the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], an avowed candidate for the Presidency. He said that careful study had convinced him it was "a most wholesome, timely, and constructive proposal, one that should have been advanced and approved years ago."

When I first broached the subject in my district last February, the Paterson Evening News, of Paterson, N. J., issue of February 16, said editorially:

CONGRESSMAN CANFIELD HAS A PRACTICAL IDEA TO UTILIZE THE ABILITIES OF OUR EX-PRESIDENTS

Congressman CANFIELD has advanced an idea that should be carried further than the mere discussion stage. Commenting on the overlapping authorities which control food administration in the country, Congressman CANFIELD told Passaic County farmers the other day that he deplored the fact that an able director of food distribution like Herbert Hoover has not been pressed into service.

Carrying the thought still further, the Congressman proposed consideration of legislation which would provide for membership-at-large in the United States Senate of former Presidents of the United States. They would be without vote, would not affect State representations, but would be available for discussion and for counsel.

And why not? Herbert Hoover is admittedly one of the country's great men. He was a great President. Because he stepped out of the Chief Executive's office, must he be relegated to oblivion, or at the most to the sidelines as an elder statesman? Why should not the country have the benefit of his wisdom, his experience, his advice?

Posing these questions, Congressman CANFIELD raises still another fine point. It is his feeling that President Roosevelt will not be a candidate for reelection. Must it be then that a man who has been three times President of his country must go on the shelf, lost to government? The Congressman's point is full of possibilities—Hoover and Roosevelt senators-at-large in the upper House! The idea is terrific!

Congressman CANFIELD should move to translate his idea into some kind of action. He will find a responsive reaction the country over, and whether or not the plan meets opposition, it will be at least generate a healthy discussion.

The Passaic (N. J.) Herald-News, dated February 18, editorially approved with the following:

A USE FOR EX-PRESIDENTS

It is not a new thought that Representative GORDON CANFIELD has suggested that a way be found to continue the services of any President of the United States after he retires from that high office, but it is well that he has brought it up again.

The suggestion is that legislation be enacted to make all retired Presidents Members at Large of the United States Senate. They would not have a vote and would not affect the right of each State to two voting Senators, but as honorary Senators would be available for discussion and counsel.

It would seem that this would be a dignified and proper way for the country to avail itself of the experience of such men as Herbert Hoover and of Franklin Delano Roosevelt after his retirement from the White House. Such men when they step out of office should not become mere private citizens. At no time would there be more than two, in all probability, and they should occupy such a position as elder statesmen.

It is too bad that Mr. Hoover's vast experience in public affairs, as an engineer, and as a distributor of food to distressed peoples is not today available to the people in some formal way. And if Mr. Roosevelt should be retired next January, what a pity it would be if as a private citizen he were given no formal part at all in public consideration and settlement of national and world problems.

The thought that seems to appeal to most of my colleagues is that the purpose I have in mind can be accomplished through the passage of a simple bill instead of resorting to the long, drawn-out processes of constitutional amendment which many have thought necessary. Furthermore, the bill would also apply to any ex-President retired before enactment.

C. Breck Parkman, of the Office of Legislative Counsel of the House, who assisted me in the draft of this proposal, drew attention to the fact the position of Senator at Large could be created by act of Congress in the same manner as legislation provided for the offices of Delegate from Alaska and Delegate from Hawaii in the House. Mr. Breckman formerly lived in Passaic, N. J., in my congressional district.

Tax Exemption of Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Ralph L. Van Name, secretary of the New York City Employees' Retirement System at the thirty-ninth annual conference of the Municipal Finance Officers Association of the United States and Canada on the subject of exempting pensions from taxation:

Your speaker does hot offer his discussion today as that of an authority either on general taxation or on taxation and exemption of pensions in particular. He is administrator of a large staff pension fund, has become keenly aware of the hardships to present and potential pensioners of his own and of other staff pension funds, from existing war taxes, and presents this inquiry into the subject with certain recommendations as a contribution toward early remedying of evils that have developed principally since the present war began.

There was probably never a system of taxation in any country at any time which was conceded, by all who were taxed, to be equitable and just.

It is inevitable that when a scale of taxation has been raised as rapidly as in this country since we entered the war in 1941, inequalities, inconsistencies, injustices, and hardships appear.

It is not our purpose now primarily to criticise and to complain of the inequalities and hardships but to classify certain of them, to inquire whether there is a trend toward equitable taxation and exemption and to determine particularly if and how any existing provisions unjustly affecting income of pensioners (who are persons with deferred, reduced, and fixed incomes), should be modified.

Until recent years the absence of taxation on incomes below $3,500 and $2,500, the absence of taxation below the subsistence level within which seven-eighths of all pensions are paid, made exemption from taxation of pensions of very limited significance and appeal. With the coming of war taxation of incomes far below the subsistence level, taxation down to the tcp $100 on an annual income as low as $667 under the tax simplification law, the problem has become of acute importance to staff pensioners and prospective staff pensioners—persons with deferred, reduced, and fixed incomes.

Income taxation which formerly reached two to seven million of our people now reaches the pockets of 50,000,000 individual taxpayers and threatens millions of potential staff pensioners. This expended income taxation is in addition to greatly increased and expanded spending and corporate taxation.

Income-tax rates which formerly began at 4 to 6 percent of amounts well above the subsistence level, now begin at 23 percent in the sixth $100 of gross annual income.

Special exemptions are granted—

For dependents, including wife: $500 each.

In lieu of other deductions for contributions, taxes, interest, and medical expenses: 10 percent of income but not more than $500.

(Greater percentages and amounts than 10 percent and $500 may be exempted on these items if they are listed in detail, for example, up to 15 percent on contributions and unlimited credit for personal interest payments which reduce available income.)

For soldier income: $1,500 exemption.

For veteran pension and bonus: Unlimited exemption.

For occupational disability pensions: Unlimited exemption.

For railroad pensions: Up to $1,440 per annum.

For social-security pension (by construction): Up to $1,020.

(Since no higher social-security pension is paid.)

For employee-purchased annuities: Exemption of the returning purchase price.

For employer-paid pensions: No exemption to the pensioner. The Treasury and a special subcommittee of the Senate are trying to determine rules as to the amount of exemption of an employer's contribution for pension purposes on the way in, that is, whether there shall be more or less tax exemption to the contributor. There is no exemption to the recipient as a pensioner and his cost of living problem is unlikely to be lessened by any action resulting from this Treasury and special Senate consideration.

For pensions derived by long-lived from short-lived annuitants: No exemption.

Let us add one other exemption to this incomplete but illustrative list.

On estates up to $60,000: Full exemption from taxation under the inheritance-tax law.

However you may regard the amount, the $500 exemption for each dependent is the result of prodigious study, discussion, trial and error, bargaining and compromise, by competent committees of Congress itself.

Notice, now, the others. Fifteen hundred dollars' soldier pay exemption and total war veteran pension exemption without doubt reflect the desire of the average citizen that his war substitute shall be treated as generously as so great a factor of the population may be treated by the rest of us.

The top exemption on railroad pensions is incident to the size of the pension itself. Since the top pension is $1,440—$1,440 is the top exemption. The exemption was determined by Congress in the pension enactment—not in tax enactment where exact equities might be measured. The exemption was determined by Congress as exemptions of pension from State income tax have been determined in New York and other States. When the pension bill was enacted the pension law-making body decreed that the pension provided should be exempt from tax by the area within its legal control. The State could not legally and therefore did not enact Federal exemption.

The top exemption on social security pension is likewise incident to the size of the pension itself. Since the top pension is $1,020—$1,020 is the top exemption. The exemption was determined by legal construction—not in a tax enactment where exact equities might be measured.

The exemption by the Treasury of the repayment of the individual's annuity purchase money is perhaps on the principle that taxation on the way in and on the way out would be double taxation.

The absence of exemption of employer contributions paid to an annuitant when the employer is not a railroad nor an employer under social security is discrimination which continues to exist because other employer-paid pension, with the notable exception of Federal Government itself, has not been the subject of detailed national pension legislation, and so the occasion or opportunity did not arise to grant incidental exemption as was granted in the cases just cited.

The reason for the absence of Federal employer exemption is to be found doubtless in the fact that until recent years the top Federal employee pension was $1,200, not far from the bottom income-tax exemption. The need for Federal pension exemption arose only with increased Federal maxima and decreased income-tax exemptions, and is met by a bill now before both Houses of Congress to grant total income-tax pension exemptions to retired Federal employees. I do not predict or desire, but it would not surprise me if the bill is amended before passage to provide top exemption of $1,440 or $1,500.

The taxation of pension, then, has not resulted from deliberate planning by Congress in a tax bill seeking out pensions as a source of tax revenue. Rather married couple exemption of income, undeferred or deferred, changing or fixed, unreduced or reduced—domestic married couple exemption—has been reduced from $3,500 and $2,500 to $1,000; single exemption to $500 or $500 plus 10 percent and in the process has come from an income field which was entered by few pensioners to the field of average garden variety of pension, deferred, reduced, and fixed.

Exemption from income tax of pension and annuity has not been based on a standard of measurement but on the chance incident that when Congress was passing a pension measure it might just as well as not, and did, insert a pension income-tax exemption. There is no uniform standard for pension exemption. There has been none.

If we now reexamine our list of exemptions, we will discover that employee or staff pensions and annuities which are not exempt from income tax may be classified under two headings as:

(a) Pension paid directly or indirectly by employers who are not military or railroad employers or participants under social security, and pensions paid by employers who supplement the maximum $1,440 or $1,020 or other limits of such acts as the Social Security Act and the United States Railroad Employees' Retirement Act.

(b) Pensions and annuities which are non-employer gifts, however they appear. Included under B are the pensions and annuities derived by long-lived annuitants from the forfeitures of the annuities or pensions or equities of short-lived pensioners and annuitants, whether in employer or employee supported or jointly contributory cooperative systems.

Since there has been and is no uniform standard of pension exemption and since remaining taxed pensions are pension paid by a minority of employers to a potential minority of pensioners or are outright gifts usually by short-lived to long-lived annuitants, let us consider some of the favors which might determine a standard of exemption for pension and annuity.

Tax exemption of soldier income stops at $1,500. Soldier pension is naturally expected to be less than soldier income. Almost certainly, if the social-security pension maximum were brought up to the railroad $1,440 top, as is talked of, the social security pension tax exemption level would likewise rise to $1,440. The principle or practice seems to be developing that pension income up to $1,440 or $1,500, if Government sponsored, that is, reduced, deferred fixed income up to this amount, as distinguished from earned and current income of this amount, is income properly exempt from income tax. There is not one reason why $1,440 pension income, not Government sponsored and regardless of the employer, should not be equally exempt to $1,440. And it is interesting to record that while I was preparing this observation, H. R. 4883, introduced in the House of Representatives on May 25 by Congressman EUGENE J. KEOGH, of New York, came to hand proposing to amend the exclusions from gross income section of the Internal Revenue Code to add the following:

"Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, there shall be excluded from gross income the first $1,440, in the aggregate for each year, of all retirement pension and annuity payments, including, but not limited to, payments under the old-age and survivors insurance law—Social Security Act—received during the taxable year by any retired employee."

Our association, I hope, will go further. But I trust our association, meanwhile, will earnestly and powerfully support the Keogh bill which is now in the House Committee on Ways and Means.

Notice, now, another principle of tax exemption which is well established in Federal Government practice, which, until thoughtfully examined, might be assumed to have no bearing on pension taxation.

Until the present war, passing estates were exempt from inheritance tax up to $40,000 with an additional $40,000 for life-insurance payments. Due to the pressure of war demands, the Federal Government has combined and reduced these exemptions on a passing estate to a single $60,000. Above the $60,000 exemption, the inheritance tax, paid once for all, begin at 3 percent and, unless the estate exceeds $100,000, it does not reach the 23 percent paid annually on part of the sixth $100 of annual income.

Consider now, the nature of an annuity agreement. One who has 10 years to live and requires $1,440 a year, who has a total of $14,400 might put that amount in a bank or in a hole in the chimney or under a board in the floor, draw $1,440 each year for 10 years, exhaust his principal and die having paid no income tax on his withdrawals since the amounts withdrawn presumably were taxed as they were previously accumulated. Or if he die and leave all or part of the $14,400, it would be free of Government tax.

But let two such people each with $14,400, who together will live 20 years, associate themselves in an annuity, pension, or retirement fund because one may live 3 years and the other 17. The one who lives 17 years will pay an income tax on $1,440 or thereabouts for 7 years or thereabouts from the time he has received back the last of his own money. What would each risk and one lose by entering the annuity or retirement group? Seven times $1,440, which one would not receive who dies after 3 years. What money would the long-lived survivor receive after the tenth year or thereabouts? Not his own. Whose then? He would receive the 7 times $1,440 or thereabouts derived from forfeitures of the short-lived annuitant. The long-lived survivor benefited from an estate. It would not be taxed in the hands of the first party. It would not be taxed as a legacy from the first party. But a socially bent government steps out of character to tax, at 23 percent, 7 annual installments of $1,440 because there was received through a pension fund an amount which would have been exempt up to $60,000 had it been paid directly from an individual estate.

That, as I have been saying around New York City for some time now, is not a social attitude; it is antisocial. That is not legislation favoring the little fellow; that is legislation which singles out the little fellow for special hardship, perhaps not intentionally but effectively. Such antisocial discriminatory 23 percent annual income taxation of the deferred, reduced, fixed-pension income in contrast to individual estate exemption from tax up to $60,000 and tax at 3 percent to 22 percent once-for-all until $100,000 is passed, neutralizes and sabotages the annuity—civilization's most time-tested, amiable, and thrifty device to adequately provide against incalculable, more than average, individual old age.

At the risk of repetition, I ask you to note how much better exemption than $1,440 is exemption up to a $60,000 equity as granted to individual estates.

In a pension system, when the pensioner or annuitant outlives his average span of life and has drawn the moneys contributed by him and on his account, subsequent income for the individually surviving pensioner or annuitant in principle is drawn neither from employer nor from himself but is bequeathed, forfeited by, and received through the fund from the short-lived pensioner or annuitant and is financially possible only by reason of such a short life.

Consider the plight of the would-be pensioner who must meet present income-tax rates. He contemplated age 65 retirement at $1,440, based, let us say, on $230 for each 5 years of service and amounting to less than half pay. Statisticians tell him that he cannot subsist on that sum but he was willing to try. He now finds that before he may have $1,440 for his own purpose he must contribute $230 to the Federal Government in income tax since he is not a railroad pensioner or a social-security beneficiary. He finds he must continue in service to age 70 in order to increase his gross pension $230 and pay a 23 percent tax of $230 on a taxable income of approximately $1,000 after taking an exemption of $500 plus $167, that is, 10 percent of his $1,670. If he is in a flat half-pay system, as many employees are, he must face remaining in service to the compulsory retirement age and accumulating two tax amounts each year out of his current salary—one for immediate payment on his current salary, another for deferred payment on the pension, enjoyment of which must be deferred until he has his future pension tax money in hand, or as much of it as he may be able to scrape up before his compulsory retirement age.

Contrast now the Federal Government's contradictory methods in treatment of pensioners, for both cannot be correct. Retirement of railroad pensioners at age 65 at $1,440 is encouraged by tax exemption. Retirement of governmental nonrailroad, non-social-security pensioners, who are ready to retire at 65 on $1,440, is discouraged from age 65 to age 70 until they may build up enough increase over $1,440 to pay a tax not required of railroad or social security pensioners in their economic class.

The harm is not alone to the aged employee. New York City contributes annually $47,000,000 to take care of its employee superannuation and disability problem. Other cities and States contribute proportionate amounts; so does the Federal Government for its employees. It would be a lame excuse to say that Federal income tax by deferring retirement decreased local pension costs. When social security, railroads, the United States civil employees and many other retirement systems provide pension benefits for age 65, it is done in the knowledge that the average employee is becoming less efficient at that age and for the good of the service should be replaced by the young. The ability to so replace employees at age 65 is retained and promoted by the Federal Government for railroaders and social security pensioners; financial provision by the States and cities to so replace 65-year-olds of the State and city employees is defeated by the Federal Government income tax which applies to pensioned State and city employees. The Federal Government, taxing some 65 year old pensioners and exempting others receiving like pensions, must be wrong on one count. When the Federal Government siphons into the Federal Treasury 23 percent more or less of the State and city taxpayers' money contributed to meet adequately superannuation and disability problems, the Federal Government is executing an antisocial, antigovernmental policy which is contradictory to its more correct railroad and social security pension tax stand.

Public officials are beginning to realize that this is not a problem that has been with them always; rather, it is one that has developed

(1) Because of the beginning of income taxation away below subsistence levels instead of above them.

(2) Because in this reduction of income tax exemption limits, no distinction has been made between income that has increased and may increase, on the one hand, and, on the other, deferred, reduced, fixed income, such as pensions and income of millions of white-collar workers as well, as pointed out by Senator THOMAS of Utah in the May American Magazine in his article on 20,000,000 Forgotten Americans.

Mayor LaGuardia of New York City, seeking such exemption as Congressman KEOGH's bill proposes, and writing to every Senator, to all of the mayors in the United States Conference of Mayors, of which he is head, and to many other governmental officials, says:

"Congress should bear in mind that the purpose of paying an employee income is to keep him in service while the purpose of offering him a pension is to enable him to leave and discontinue service. Taxing an employee is proper business for the Federal Government, since it increases the necessity for his earning an income. The prospect of 23 percent taxation, on the contrary, compels a potential aged pensioner on half pay or thereabouts to remain in service for want of the necessary sustenance if he were to retire. As a result the opportunities for civil-service employment of our returning veterans are seriously diminished and the governmental pension contributions are diverted from the purpose for which they are made."

I've discussed the subject with other public officials who have too wide a field of interest to study this subject to a conclusion on their own account but who are willing, if a plan is laid before them by such an association as ours, to consider the proposals on their merits. They may pay little heed to requests for special-favor exemptions, but if they may be shown broad principles under which present and future exemptions may be justly unified, they will, I believe, be interested.

We have exemption of return of one's own contributions. We have a haphazard exemption of some other pension amounts. I have brought to your attention today a seeming analogy between the ultimate pensions of the surviving aged which are unjustly taxed and individual inheritances which are tax exempt to $60,000. There is still another approach. Corporate excess-profits tax rates are laid most heavily on corporations whose incomes have risen most and most lightly on those whose incomes have risen little. Applying this principle to individuals, Senator THOMAS of Utah suggests additional exemption for those individuals whose incomes have not risen perceptibly since Pearl Harbor. Canada and Great Britain have something like this in their provision for partial post-war refund of excess taxes. In Canada, since the aged individual may not live to personally realize this post-war refund, he is permitted to apply for a lower, current rate in lieu of the later, too late reduction.

Following the principles established by our country in other tax fields than that of individual income taxation and individual pension exemption, particularly in the inheritance and excess-profits field, and the example of Canada as well, we must differentiate between the productive and often rising income of the strong and the deferred, reduced, fixed, unproductive income of the aged and disabled.

I submit these specific proposals for corrective legislation:

(a) Exclusion from gross income up to $1,440 of all retirement pension and annuity payments as proposed in the Keogh bill, H. R. 4883, now in the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

This proposal was originally offered as an amendment to tax simplification bill. It received the support of the mayors of many of your cities at the request of Mayor LaGuardia, as head of the United States Conference of Mayors. The proposal was kept out of the bill for no lack of merit but because of the previous iron-clad agreement of the Senate and House to strictly limit its provisions to those simplifying the tax clarification form.

Congressman KEOGH has resubmitted the proposal as a separate bill, where you may and should support it on its merits, because it will immediately provide for other pensioners relief identical with that now justly provided by Congress for the millions of present and potential social-security and railroad pensioners.

(b) Exclusion from gross income of additional annuity income, if any, until one's own money (taxed before annuity purchase) has been returned.

(c) Reduction of the income-tax rate payable by pensioners whose income before exemption has been reduced.

(d) Valuation of the entire pension and annuity remaining in the year in which a living pensioner, beginning from his retirement age, has arrived at his expectation of life or average span or, if you please, valuation, when there has been returned to him the initial reserve whether contributed by or for him. The deduction from that value of $60,000 precisely as before taxation of an individual estate, remembering that the pensioner may not so receive more than he was committed at the outset, to bequeath to another through the fund had he been the short-lived annuitant.

Taxation once for all of the remaining value, if any, at current inheritance-tax rates. These once-for-all rates are on a rising scale from 3 to 22 percent, still below the income-tax 23-percent rate when the estate is as much as $100,000. As an alternative to individual payment, the law might authorize payment of this final tax by the retirement fund with authority to the fund to slightly reduce for the remainder of life the resulting tax-free pension.

We must contend for equality of treatment of individual and collective inheritance. Unless inheritance through the retirement fund can be brought up to the $60,000 individual standard of exemption, the standard for retirement fund and individual inheritance must be equalized between the present $60,000 individual estate exemption and the low or zero exemption of a like equity.

Under the above plan, a pensioner would pay an income tax at a lower rate because of a reduction from his former active income and would begin to pay only when he has received his own money back over and above $1,440 per annum. If regarded as preferable, the tax could be equalized from the outset by reducing the pensioner's taxable income at the beginning of his retirement in the proportion which the member's contribution, with or without interest, bears to the total value of his retirement contract. In either case, when the value of his pension, by whoever contributed, has been repaid, such tax would cease and would be succeeded, if at all, by a not too burdensome single payment to be taken up by his fund, if desired, and, in that case, resulting in a wholly tax-free pension for the remainder of his life.

I submit these suggestions to you for study, for such modification as may seem advisable to you and, as so modified, for recommendation to Congress. We will, in my opinion, have missed an opportunity if we do not seek and obtain congressional action in 1944.

Above all, I trust this association will not demand total pension exemption. There is too much of pension income which, on sound principle, is entitled to payment of materially less tax than now, to weaken our case and the prestige of this association by a demand for something to which we are not soundly entitled.

How Many More Steps?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following address entitled "How Many More Steps?" delivered by me before the Executives Club of Chicago on Friday, June 2, 1944:

When first I was invited to address this organization I felt highly honored. The second time you had me here to speak to you, I really felt flattered, but now that I have been invited for the third time to appear before the same group, I am really beginning to wonder whether I am great or you are just dumb. [Laughter.] Anyway, I am overwhelmed—by your capacity for punishment. [Laughter.]

There will not be much that I shall say here today that will be new to you. You have heard me, for the past dozen years, preach a certain philosophy of government and a certain kind of economic life that we have been accustomed to. I am sure, however, that you will hear me retract not one single word that I have ever uttered since the middle of 1933.

It is really a relief, gentlemen, to escape the torturing torment of turbulent Washington for even a little while, to come out to this great center of the United States, to address the members of the Executives' Club. I want you to think with me for a little while this afternoon about national socialism. And that term, national socialism, I think, will cover the different kinds of government which were established throughout the leading nations of the world, in the wake of the last war.

It is not at all accidental, gentlemen, that communism rose its head in Russia; that fascism was established in Italy; that Nazi-ism became entrenched in Germany, or that New Dealism has gained a vast foothold in the United States. National socialism covers all these different forms of new government, both abroad and at home. And I want us to think of certain definite, specific steps which these different nations have taken, following in the wake of the last war.

THE FIRST STEP

The first step, of course, in order to establish national socialism is to make the masses of the people in any country feel their complete hopelessness and their utter inability to meet and solve their own problems. This psychological state of mind is naturally easy to develop in a time of economic stress or of national disaster. In times of depression or of war, and in the aftermath of war, which often is as dangerous and disastrous as war itself, we find a fertile soil in which to sow the seeds of national socialism.

I am not talking abstractly or theoretically this afternoon, but as a fellow American, more particularly as a Missourian, who has to be shown, and I have been shown, because it has been my privilege, even if I am an Ozark hillbilly, to have traveled and lived in these different countries and to have seen, first hand, democracy die, freedom fly out the window, dictatorship and totalitarian forms of government established. I say the first step that must be taken is to make the masses feel their helplessness in times of depression or in times of war, when the people are weary and war-worn and tired, and when they prefer to have some strong, benign, all-wise leader to rule them than to take the trouble to rule themselves. That is the first step that any nation or people take in setting up national socialism.

The second step that is taken is to get the government as far removed from the control of the people as is possible. Individual responsibility, State rights, and local self-government must be done away with. No longer will the Government of the United States be at Peoria or Kenosha or Kalamazoo. Governmental powers will be centralized in bureaucrats in far-off Washington.

The New Dealers have told us that concentration of wealth in the hands of the few is destructive of the economic liberties of the people, and to that thesis I subscribe with all my heart. The concentration of wealth in the hands of the few is a bad and dangerous thing. But, my friends, concentration of political power in the hands of a few is a fatal thing to liberalism and democracy. [Applause.]

I have no fear, no more than your great fellow Illinoisan, Abraham Lincoln, had any fears, as long as Government remains in the hands of the people. But when the people fall into the hands of the Government, under its control and domination from a distant place, when we have government by remote control, then you no longer have a government of, by, and for the people. You have a government by a single, mighty leader or a small group of men, who use their power and influence to control and exploit the masses of the citizens of any State.

THE THIRD STEP

There is a third step that is taken. It was taken in Russia, in Germany, and in Italy, and there is a deadly parallel here in the United States. What is that third step? When you have the people convinced that they are helpless and incapable of solving their own problems, when you remove the control of the government from localities to a centralized point, the next thing to do is to abolish constitutional guaranties. How is that to be done? By ridicule, by abuse, by saying that these constitutional guaranties are old fashioned, they are outmoded, that they belong to the horse-and-buggy age.

Not only constitutional guaranties, but where the Government goes in and seizes private property without due process of law and where they can even send the United States Army into a plant in Chicago, throw the president and the chairman of the board of a great organization out forcibly. It happened in a factory yesterday, and it may happen in your home tomorrow if it is allowed to go on unchecked. But, thank God, the one barrier that stands between the American people and tyranny today, namely, the Congress, was quick to grasp the significance of that move. Both the House and Senate appointed investigating committees without delay. And the administration was so frightened that they didn't even want to wait for a court decision, though most of the courts today are under the domination of the Executive.

The citizens of the United States deplore the Gestapo methods used by Attorney General Biddle in the Montgomery Ward case. They feel that his action was illegal and destroys the very thing for which Americans are fighting and dying. My people do not approve the action of Mr. Roosevelt and I only hope that we have as many good soldiers to defend our home front as we have fighting for our cause abroad. We have been grossly outraged and our only hope for relief is a change in administration. We need not only a new President, but also a Congress—strong, independent, and fearless—who will do their best to save this Republic.

The President's seizure of the Montgomery Ward plant by force without authority granted by Congress and in clear violation of the Constitution which he is sworn to uphold and defend has justly aroused the indignation of a free people and struck a vital blow at representative government.

Abolish constitutional guaranties? The Constitution is old-fashioned. So is the Magna Charta. So are the Ten Commandments. But the Decalog of Moses are as true and needed as much today as they were the moment he uttered them on Mount Sinai. There are some eternal verities, some truths that are unchangeable with time. Two plus two equals four today, just as much as they did in the time of Archimides. You do not have to burn down your house to get rid of the mice in the pantry. You do not have to kill your dog to get rid of his fleas. I think fleas are good for any dog. They keep his mind off being a dog all the time. [Laughter.]

You have got to have progress. The Constitution can be changed. The fathers who wrote that immortal document, the greatest ever struck off by the mind of man, realized it would have to be changed to meet changing conditions. But they provided a constitutional way whereby it can be changed. Not by usurpation. Only one power can change the Constitution, and that is, the power that made it, namely, the people themselves.

Did any one of us, a few years ago, ever dream he would live to see the day when the Executive of our land would urge Congress to enact laws regardless of any doubts as to their constitutionality? Yet that is what F. D. R. asked the Ways and Means Committee of the House to do when the Guffey bill was enacted. Not only do away with constitutional guaranties, but scrap the Constitution itself.

Two weeks ago I spoke to the Women's Council of the Navy League of the United States in Cleveland; a great gathering of patriotic women. But some of the steel unions were having a convention at the same time. And I was shocked and even alarmed as I rode down the elevator when I overheard certain caustic and nasty remarks about the Constitution of the United States; we were going to do this, and we were going to do that, in spite of the Constitution. You cannot eat the Constitution, they say. And these political philosophers are guided in all their thinking by their stomachs. Their thoughts never rise above their belt lines. They never exercise even their cerebellums or cerebrums; grounded in Marxian materialism.

Yes; make the people feel hopeless and helpless. Raise up a benign and all-wise leader who will solve their problems. Make them dependent upon Washington. Destroy State rights and individual responsibility. Let Uncle Sam do it. We have a Santa Claus in the White House. Do away with constitutional guaranties. If you want to take over a business, take it. Take it under the cry of emergency. Oh, emergency! How many crimes have been committed in thy name during the past dozen years? The New Deal feeds and fattens on emergency. It grows rich and powerful on the pressure of war. Under the cry of that emergency, and under pressure of that war, we are having foisted upon this country national socialism, under the guise of liberalism and democracy. I have no quarrel with the American people. If they want national socialism, let them vote for it. But I do object to a small group of smearers and wasters in Washington, who were never elected by anybody, who, by surreptition and indirection, who boring from within, with their alien creeds and their false philosophies, are shackling upon you and me and our fellow countrymen a type of government totally foreign and different from any which we have ever known.

A VICIOUS STEP

These leaders of the New Dealers, of fascism and communism and nazi-ism, they do not stop there. They have to take another step. What is that? It is to undermine the faith and confidence of the American people in the lawyers and in the courts of this land, because often the lawyers are the defenders of the peoples' rights. We must make the masses feel that lawyers are crooked and that courts are dishonest. We will assail the highest tribunal of the land by calling them the nine old men. The only objection to them was their age of 70 years. And how many men, in high Government position, since that attempt—that ignoble, ruthless attempt to pack the Supreme Court—past 70 years of age have been appointed?

Undermine the courts. And they have pretty well done it.

Thomas Jefferson realized that unless we had a frequent rotation of the Presidency it would soon degenerate into an inheritance. Thomas Jefferson, realizing the enormous appointive powers of the President, knew that if any one individual stayed in the Presidency too long, with his appointive power, he would control not only the executive arms and branches of the Government, but that he would dominate and control the judiciary. And it is significant that of the nine members of our highest Court, seven of them have been appointed by the present incumbent of the White House, who in addition, has appointed almost 70 percent of the total judiciary of our country; filled with men who see eye to eye with him; who will uphold the constitutionality of any bill which his stooges can enact, under the whip lash of patronage or of public funds. Yes; the court, due to the long tenure of one individual, is pretty largely today under the thumb of the Executive. I have said in Congress and out of Congress, look at the Supreme Court of the United States today and you will know why Jesus wept. [Laughter.]

Why, they not only have disdain for precedent; they not only have a disregard for tradition; they not only scorn the lessons of experience; they not only overrule decisions made by the greatest legal minds and the ablest students of jurisprudence in the history of our Republic—but they often contradict themselves; reversing their decisions of yesterday in their decisions of today, with lines so sharply divided, that one of the ablest members of that Court, Mr. Justice Roberts, in stinging language, recently pointed out to them that unless they can get some unity, some consistency, some logic in the writing of their decisions, soon the American people would lose confidence and respect for that highest tribunal.

Yes, they do not have courts in Soviet Russia. Oh, they have; they have many trials over there. They shot a lot of their best people. Hitler has no courts in Germany. A Nazi court is stacked and packed. There is a joker in every deck and the cards are played according to the way the Fuehrer wants them played. And we have some members of our highest tribunal, who are supposed to be apart, separate, and independent, sneaking in the side door and the back door of the White House, instead of belonging to a great body of judicial minds, who sit and exercise an independence that guarantees the American people full justice in any controversy or crime.

ANOTHER DANGEROUS STEP

They do not stop there. There is another step the Communists take, and that is to undermine the legislative branch or Congress. It is to smear Congress. Didn't I see Mussolini, with a handful of Black Shirts, march on Rome, dissolve the Italian Parliament and call them every dirty name in the catalog? Didn't I see, as a student in Germany, following the last war, Mr. Hitler fooling many intelligent Germans; and, knowing the German people as I do, I marvel that so many intelligent Germans were dragged into such a net, until this National Socialism was so fastened upon them that they could never extricate themselves. And not only did Mussolini dissolve Parliament, Stalin also did away with the Chamber of Deputies. Hitler had a Reichstag, a shell of a parliament, but he robbed it of all its power, and whenever a vote was called for, there was only one answer: "Ja, Ja, Ja." He didn't stop there. Hitler even burned down the Reichstag. And what a beautiful building it was, there at Brandenburg Tor! He burned it down. And I know of vermin and rats in this country, digging and boring within, a group of character assassins, scandalmongers lower than the reptile that hisses in the grass, who would like not only to destroy the influence of the legislative arm of our Government, but who would like to burn down the Senate and the House of Representatives; render Congress completely impotent.

The executive branch of our Government, not content with dominating our courts, demands to control Congress. And when members of his own party kept him from packing the Court, the President set out, with public funds and with this great club of patronage that he holds over the heads of recalcitrant members of his own party, to dominate and control the Congress of the United States.

NATIONAL SOCIALISM

And books have been written by men under aliases. Imported foreigners, the refugees and royalists from over there, trying to damn and blighten the American Congress. Why? Because when the legislative arm of a government is destroyed, then we have one-man rule. It happened in Russia. It happened in Italy. It happened in Germany. It has been happening here for 12 years. Step by step, not accidental, but carefully planned, adroitly maneuvered and skillfully carried out. Take all the things that have happened. They are like the pieces of a jig-saw puzzle. Put them together and it makes a perfect picture. What is it? National socialism. They want only Members of Congress who can and will carry out the will of the Executive. If Mr. Roosevelt would take a pill, they would move first. [Laughter.]

Can anyone doubt it? I say to you that when a small coterie of labor racketeers, when men like Bridges and Browder and Dubinsky and Pressman and Hillman can collect, they say, $700,000—other sources of authority tell us $2,000,000—not only for the Presidential campaign, but to get the scalps of the Members of Congress who believe in constitutional republican government, when those men can go out and shake down the poor laboring people of this country, forcing them to pay tribute in order to exercise their constitutional right to work, and then go out and defeat men like JOE STARNES and JOHN COSTELLO, and force MARTIN DIES out of the ranks, it is high time that the American businessmen get their eyes open, take their shirts off, and fight like hell to save this Republic. [Applause.]

We have been asleep at the switch and we are getting run over. I am not so optimistic as a lot of my fellow Republicans. They told you my politics. What I am trying to talk of are American principles. I am trying to talk facts. I am not so optimistic about the outcome of this present election. Businessmen say, "What can we do about it?" Well, Sidney Hillman is doing something about it. And I am afraid that with all the funds they have, they will purge certain others who are marked for slaughter—and I rank about No. 1, I think. God, how I welcome their opposition. I will meet them on any battleground at any time. I am not going to stand in the back row, silent, and let the thing be set up here which our men and women are fighting all over this world to destroy. And if you do, you won't have anything to live for or fight with when this deluge is over.

ECONOMIC STEP

All right. They are going to undermine Congress as well as the courts. Let us see what the other steps are. Economically, the people must be ground down by high and excessive taxes, in order to reduce us all to a common level. But, ye gods, what a low level. The Government then has control of capital and the credit of the country, due to these high taxes that are collected in one form or another, under one pretext or another. And, by the way, the other day, I took the returns of my own personal income tax, small as they are, for this and last year and the year before and I compared those returns with those of 1929, 1930, and 1931. My taxes are more than 20 times as much today, and yet I make no more money. For 10 years following the last war, every year we reduced taxes and cut down the national debt, in 10 years, from $26,000,000,000 to $16,000,000,000, and in the following 10 years after that, beginning in 1932, up to the time of Pearl Harbor, mind you, not counting any appropriation for war expenditures, we enormously increased taxes every year, and the public debt was raised from $20,000,000,000 to $66,000,000,000.

That brings us to another step that the New Deal takes, or any other government takes that wants to establish national socialism. Grind down the people by high taxes. Lift the one-third up by pulling the other two-thirds down. Then you think you are getting somewhere. But we must create a gigantic public debt from which no individual citizen will ever be able to escape its burden. Brother, we have created one. The national debt, at the end of this month, will be nearly $200,000,000,000. By the end of June next year, approximately $250,000,000,000. And by the end of the war it will be, perhaps, $300,000,000,000. A debt that is in excess of the national wealth of this country, all the bank deposits, insurance policies, farms, homes, factories, and businesses. Will we ever be able to pay the interest on such a debt? The interest alone will run from six to nine billion dollars annually.

Before the war, even the New Dealers never spent more than $9,000,000,000 a year, and they ran from three to five billion dollars a year, each year, in the red. Continuous deficit spending, and in spite of those huge expenditures before the war, not for preparedness but in boondoggling, building monkey houses and dog pounds and counting rats, we still had eight and one-half million unemployed men in this country on December 7, 1941. And yet they say they are indispensable. Ye gods, they cannot run this country in time of peace, let alone war.

UNDERMINING FAITH IN PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Yes; we will have high taxes and we will have enormous deficits. A back-breaking national debt will make the Government receiver of the Nation. The state will own all. Another step we must take is to undermine and destroy the faith of the people in private business and individual enterprise. It started out under the old N. R. A. You had to spend half of your time in filling out forms, answering questionnaires, carrying out orders of the distant tax-eating bureaucrats in Washington. You did it in peacetime, and you are doing it in wartime. And if they are continued in power, you ain't seen nothin' yet. [Laughter.]

No, you haven't. Wait until the war is over. It will be continued. This thing is a leech. It is being fastened upon us, and so firmly that I seriously question, unless we have an immediate change and unless we get rid of this poisonous propaganda that has been instilled into the minds of the American people, we will never be able to throw it off. The life of the Republic is at stake. I am not going to sit idly by. You are soldiers as much as any man on the front line. They are fighting to destroy this thing abroad while it is being cleverly and insidiously established here at home.

Private business and industry in this country have saved our face because, with all of our mistakes and waste and extravagance, the output of industry, the production of America have won this war. Victory is now in sight. And yet it is American business and industry which these long-haired men and short-haired women, wild-eyed theorists, in Washington would have destroyed during this past decade.

THE BUREAUCRACY STEP

Well, of course, there is another step that is taken, and that is to set up a giant centralized Federal bureaucracy composed of men who were never elected by anybody to any office and whom you cannot get rid of. They are responsible only to the Executive who employs them. And they issue daily decrees that run into hundreds and thousands. You cannot keep up with them. Before you can read one of their orders you perhaps receive a new one telling you that the first was canceled. Tax-eating bureaucrats. You can get rid of Members of Congress. You can cut our throats every other year. We are representatives of the people and can be hired and fired. You cannot get rid of bureaucrats whether you like them or don't like them. The only way you can get rid of them is to get rid of the man who appoints them. [Applause.] That is what we have in this country.

CONTROL OF EDUCATION

I do not want to trespass upon your time. You are busy men. There are two other steps that they take after all these. One is to control the education of the youth of the country. Oh, it was the youth of Italy that followed Mussolini with idolizing enthusiasm. It was the youth of Germany, the young boys and girls, who hiked and marched and who almost worshipped with adoration, the fuehrer. And don't think Adolph Hitler rode to power by being a tyrant. No; he was the savior of the people. He was idolized. He was indispensable. He was bringing in a new order. Just like some other men I know, in high places, were worshipped and idolized. He was going to be the savior. And they followed him with fanatical zeal and religious devotion. That is the reason Germany has not collapsed before now. He was their savior. The intention perhaps good? Well, we won't argue about that. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

There are bills pending before the American Congress today whereby the Federal Government would make grants. And, oh, the grants and doles and pensions and gratuities and all the rest that is poured out of the National Treasury to perpetuate those who are now entrenched in power. That is why it is done. It is to control the votes. And we have the most astute politician in the world. I will put him up against Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin, and all of them combined. He is smooth. You squeeze him here and he is over there. He is as slippery as an eel. He can blow hot and cold and say yes and no in the same breath, and make them all like it. But I think the people are fed up on charm. They want less charm and more character today; less showmanship and more statesmanship. They want less chicanery and more candor. They want less panegyric and more prayer, but prayer that is natural, real, honest, humble, and sincere.

Bills are pending in Congress whereby the Federal Government will make grants to cities and localities. Beware of Greeks bearing gifts. Uncle Sam or any Federal Government never gave to its people anything that it did not take from them. And always Government exacts in return control over the lives and destinies of its citizens. It was so with the farmers. They were paid not to grow stuff, but the farmer had to take orders from Washington. They told the farmer what to sow, when and how much.[1] Social Security? Protection? Why, even the mendicants are offered the abundant life and security from the cradle to the grave. But before security is given them, they have to submit to rules and regulations made in Washington.[2]

The Federal Government goes out into the States—comes into Illinois and Missouri and reaches out and digs down deep into your pockets and takes so many millions of dollars back to Washington. Then they say in Washington, to you people in Illinois and Missouri, "Now, we will let you have a few millions of your own money back providing you will follow the rules and regulations that we lay down. We are going to control you."

And the education of youth? Teach them humble submission and to bow in that spirit of idolatry and of zealous worship for the great leader.

THE PROPAGANDA STEP

And then the last step that they take, which backs and fortifies, promulgates and promotes and strengthens all these foregoing steps, is a ceaseless, incessant propaganda, over radio, on the screen, in the press, to exalt and glorify all those faithful who will bow the knee to the leader, and who will besmirch and smear, damn and condemn anyone who dares raise his voice in protest.

So there we are. Thomas Paine once said, "These are times to try men's souls." Isn't that so? We have heard a lot about the "four freedoms"; freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from fear, and freedom from want. When, in the name of God, did any American never enjoy those freedoms? We perhaps had hard times. We have had many depressions in the history of our country. But we always pulled out without scrapping the Constitution or without piling up a back-breaking debt which will lead to bankruptcy, and bankruptcy will lead to revolution. And we have reached the point where in this country we have to have reformation or revolution. And if that be treason, make the most of it. [Applause.]

THE REAL MEANING OF FREEDOM

We are at the crossroads now; not tomorrow. We are there now. Time is short. And it is later than most of us think. Why, a man in jail can enjoy the "four freedoms." He is free to speak, he is free to worship, he is free from want. He has shelter and clothing and food. They have him locked up. He is free from fear; more so than these rascals who are out of jail. [Laughter.] Oh, the "four freedoms," if that is all we are fighting for, God help us.

No; they have overlooked the greatest freedom of all, namely, the freedom to be free; free from the fear of government. That is what we want. Freedom from Executive decrees and Presidential fiats and bureaucratic rules and regulations that threaten us with severe penalties, amounting to huge fines and long imprisonment.

The American people want to be free to exercise their own God-given talents, to earn, labor, and save, own property and enjoy its fruits; the results of their own labor.

Ah, freedom? We are fighting for the freedom where the free men and women in this country can walk the earth, each his own king, the equal lord of every other man; to go his own way; work out his own will; weave into the warp and woof of the magic days, the dreams that haunt, the duties that inspire and urge him on. That is the freedom we have known in America. That is the freedom that has produced the automobile and the telephone and the skyscraper and the airplane and the radio and the thousand and one comforts that we enjoy and that has produced a higher standard of living for our people than for any other on the face of God's earth.

Oh, it is great to be an American; to live under our constitutional form of government; a republican government; where government is the servant and not the master of men.

It is great to live in a country where a poor backwoodsman, born in a log cabin, with the ground for a floor, who never saw the inside of a college but who, because of the talents with which the Almighty had blessed him, because of his rugged honesty, because of his great love for humanity, because of his unimpeachable integrity and his sterling patriotism, because of his hatred of evil and love of the true, the beautiful, and the good, could rise from abject poverty to the highest office in the gift of a great and a free people. And only in the United States could Abraham Lincoln ever have lived. [Applause.]

Isn't it great to live in a country where a poor newsboy, selling papers on the trains out of Detroit, who worked hard and saved his pennies, nickels, and dimes, who lived in a country that did not believe in rewarding idleness and punishing industry—isn't it wonderful to live in a country where an humble newsboy, who toiled and slaved and who was not held down by bureaucratic control, who had no ceiling over his head but who could rise to any height which his God-given talents, his industry, and his personal worth as a man could lead him? So that he could reproduce the human voice and light up the world? And only America could ever produce a Thomas Edison. [Applause.]

Isn't it great to live in a country—not a national socialistic state, because individual freedom and national socialism cannot exist side by side—isn't it wonderful to live in a country where a poor mechanic, who got dirt under his fingernails and grease in his hair, who worked in a woodshed and saved the results of his toil while others spent their substance in wild and riotous living, in the hope that the Government would take care of them, whether they took care of themselves or not; isn't it wonderful to live in a country where that individual could work during the day and toil during half the night and save his money, and go to a friend who had the confidence and respect in him to venture a little private capital—without a dollar subsidy from the Government—but who was left free to breathe the air and exercise his mind and to put forth his energies to lift us out of the mud and muck and mire and place us upon wheels and, through the method of rapid transportation, obliterate the barriers that once segregated us into different communities? Only America could ever have produced a Henry Ford. [Applause.]

Ah, gentlemen, it is always good to talk to the members of this club. You are always attentive and appreciative, whether you agree or not. I do hope and pray, and I certainly would not have taken the time to run away from busy Washington, because I am on the Military Affairs Committee, and Mr. RAYBURN has placed me on the Committee on Post-

[1] Thomas Jefferson said, "If we were told from Washington when to sow and when to reap the people would go hungry."

[2] Benjamin Franklin once said, "He who surrenders his liberty for temporary security deserves neither and will soon lose both."

War Military Policy—I would not have come out here unless I thought that some of the things I say here are the stark naked truth, that they are timely, that they are vital, and in the hope that you will heed some of the thoughts thrown out—and that you will do something about it. It is not going to do a bit of good to be moved here and then go out and forget everything.

We are in the midst of a war. We are on every continent and sea, and we are here at home. I am under an oath, a sacred oath, as you have been, Carl Chindblom, time and again, to preserve, protect and defend the Constitution against all its enemies both foreign and domestic. And my brother, who has been with the 8th Air Force in England over a year, and my four nephews, who are in the armed services, and your sons, brothers, and nephews are taking care of the foreign foe. I have no fear about them, any more than when I volunteered with two of my brothers, in the last war. But I am thinking of domestic enemies. Who in the name of God is going to fight the battle here on the home front, preserve our Constitution and save our Republic and our American way of life, when so many youthful Americans are on distant lands and on remote seas, fighting and dying and giving their very last ounce of full devotion to their country?

In the name of God, gentlemen, let us remember the immortal words of Lincoln when he said, "This fair republic is the last best hope of earth and America is God's last chance to make a world." [Applause.]

A Moral Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Evening Star of June 20, 1944:

A MORAL RESPONSIBILITY

President Roosevelt's announcement that 1,000 European refugees will be granted temporary shelter in this country will be welcomed by all who have given any thought to the plight of those great numbers of people who have been uprooted by the war and put to flight by the Nazis. Life has dealt harshly with these men, women, and children, and they need the support of every nation that can serve as a haven for them. Heretofore the United States has limited its assistance to diplomatic efforts to establish homes for them in other lands; now, on the strength of the President's decision, we shall share directly in the task of caring for them. An unused military camp in upstate New York will be opened for the purpose. There, subject to essential security restrictions, the thousand will live for the duration, our regular immigration procedure being suspended to permit their entry, with the understanding that they will be returned to their native countries when peace is restored. In view of the dimensions of the problem, the number seems surprisingly small and perhaps we shall find it desirable, later on, to open our doors to many more—a gesture contemplated by a congressional proposal to set up several "free ports" to accommodate additional thousands. In any event, no one with the least humanitarian impulse will question the fitness of Mr. Roosevelt's action; it is simply a step in recognition of the moral responsibility which every nation in a position to help bears toward the oppressed and stricken of the world.

South Dakota Man Leads B–29 Raid on Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, while the news of the great B–29 bombing raid on the Japanese mainland thrilled all America, South Dakotans received a special lift from this epochal military venture due to the fact that a South Dakota man, Gen. LaVern G. (Blondey) Saunders, was the commanding flight officer of the raid. South Dakotans have long appreciated the fighting qualities of General Saunders and it is gratifying now to find his name linked with that of Jimmy Doolittle as the two Americans to lead the two air raids which have produced the most headlines of this war.

Under leave granted me by the House, Mr. Speaker, I am including with these remarks at this point a news story by Capt. Lowell M. Limpus, appearing in the Washington Times-Herald for June 18, 1944. I believe people in the Congress and the country will be interested in learning more about the man from South Dakota who commanded the B–29 raid on Japan and thereby attained a turning point in the history of this war since Secretary of War Stimson assures us that this is the beginning of a series of raids which we all hope will sufficiently soften up Japan to pave the way for early victory:

BLONDEY SAUNDERS, COMMANDER OF B–29 RAID, FIRST TOOK TO AIR AGAINST JAPS AT PEARL HARBOR—FLYER OFTEN CITED FOR WAR HEROISM—CHAFED AT DESK JOB IN WASHINGTON

(By Capt. Lowell M. Limpus)

"Mister, I've only got one request to make of this man's Army. I wanna go back with Colonel Saunders—and go wherever he goes. He'll probably take me to Japan."

The speaker was a tough little sergeant from Brooklyn who had been wounded while serving with Saunders off Guadalcanal; the place, the Air Force rest area at Miami Beach; the time, a few months ago.

SERGEANT GETS WISH

And the sergeant got his wish. Two days ago General Saunders took him to Japan aboard one of the new B–29 Superfortresses. The incident is typical of the whole thrilling expedition, because that's the way the battle-tested commander of the raid always seems to affect the men under him.

They know "Blondey" Saunders is a hero—a hero in the real sense of that oft-used word—although he'd scalp any man who called him that. They know it by virtue of the ribbons on his breast, because they know how he won the rare decorations for which they stand. And, more than that, they know he's a square-shooting leader who has repeatedly risked his own life for the men he leads.

Hap Arnold knew what he was doing when he picked the stocky, slow-speaking Saunders, with the thinning raven locks, to lead the first big, all-revealing blow at Japan, and to utilize the new weapons for the first time on a large scale. He, too, knew "Blondey's" record and the kind of job he would do.

WORLD GETS ANSWER

And today the world knows the kind of job he did do.

But it doesn't begin to realize the effort that went into getting ready for it, as "Blondey" helped his chief, the equally soft-spoken "K. B." Wolfe to polish off the expedition. They made a great combination; "Blondey," the battle-tried tactician, and "K. B.," the master technician, straight from the Wright Field laboratories.

Neither of those men was apt to strike until he was ready—and "Blondey" knew they were ready before they left the United States. He told a veteran comrade so, during his last trip to Washington.

"Our team is all uniformed and they've learned their signals," he said, quietly. "They'll hit the line hard, when the whistle blows."

WAS ALL-AMERICAN TACKLE

There spoke the old football coach, and "Blondey" was that, too. He helped coach West Point teams that were almost as great as the one on which he played, back in the late twenties, when he won his rating as an All-American tackle.

And that was the beginning of "Blondey's" career. He was given that nickname by his roommate, "Light Horse Harry" Wilson, the great running back, who operated behind the line that "Blondey" helped hold and won All-American honors, too. Now "Light Horse Harry" is a flying colonel and "Blondey" is a brigadier general. But Harry first called him "Blondey" because his hair was so black. There was more of it then.

The pair graduated in 1928, and Blondey transferred from the Infantry to the Air Corps 17 months later. He soon became a bomber expert and December 7, 1941, found him a major at Hickam Field, near Pearl Harbor. That day he first tasted combat—and for many hours, Major Saunders was 50 percent of the air power that Uncle Sam had in the air. He went looking for the Jap fleet alone that afternoon but he didn't find it, which was probably fortunate for him, as well as his country.

MEDAL 6 MONTHS LATER

He started winning medals 6 months later—and he won some good ones. Today he wears the D. S. M., the D. F. C., and the Silver Star, as well as the hard-to-get Navy Cross (which is rather rare for an Army flier), not to mention the Purple Heart "for wounds received in the Solomons area."

There's a separate story behind each of them—and a thrilling one, too, but it would take a book to tell them all. And they have to be dug out of dry official records, because Blondey won't talk about them—even to old friends.

Most of them concern the tense days in the Southwest Pacific, when we were fighting for our lives, and Colonel Saunders (as the sergeant still calls him) led a considerable portion of the bombers upon which so much depended. The D. S. M. citation tells how he carried a double load as base commander, while he planned and led the raids that inflicted such "great damage," knocked out 60 Jap planes, damaged 33 others, sent an aircraft carrier limping off in a sinking condition (they think she went down), and plastered 20 different other vessels.

STRENGTH SAVED COMRADES

There was the time the bomber he was riding was knocked out by fighters and the colonel snatched the controls from the dying pilot—the co-pilot was already hit—and nursed the big cripple down, amid a hail of lead, to land off a Jap-held beach. He used his great strength then, to drag the wounded members of his crew ashore, passed out weapons and dug in to fight to the end.

And he was still leading them when the unexpected rescue came. "Brilliant leadership * * * courageous devotion to duty * * * grave danger"; that's the way they summarized that performance when they gave him the Navy Cross.

Space is lacking to describe the others, but the citations read like adventure stories—"landing on Guadalcanal * * * in the face of enemy attack * * * bombing from the air and heavy shelling from warships at sea." Inspecting the ruined runway amid flying lead—clearing away the debris (that's how he won the D. F. C.), "courageously pressed his attack * * * in spite of anti-aircraft and fighter fire (that's Lunga Point in the Solomons and the Silver Star)—and so it goes.

THEN SENT TO DESK JOB

No wonder the wounded sergeant wanted to go back instead of taking the rest to which he was entitled. (How he got back is another story, not yet to be told.)

After all that, they sent him back to a desk job in Washington, to be a deputy chief of the air staff, and pass on his knowledge.

Mr. Speaker, I also include with these remarks a news story from the Aberdeen American News of Aberdeen, S. Dak., which tells something of the early record of "Blondey" Saunders. Born on a South Dakota farm, near Stratford, S. Dak., this man has the background of a typical American boy and his success story in his chosen field of specialization follows the pattern which America has made the envy of the civilized world and which can function only in a free republic such as we have in the United States.

MRS. SAUNDERS KNEW BLONDEY'D BE THERE

Informed that her husband, Brig. Gen. LaVerne G. (Blondey) Saunders was the ranking officer on the B-29 bombing of the Japanese homeland, Mrs. Saunders said here today:

"He would be * * * I knew when I read about the raid that if Blondey was anywhere around he'd be in on it."

The epoch-making assault was wholly in character for the black-haired, beetle-browed general who is known as a "flyer's flyer."

In the early stages of the aerial campaign for the Solomon Islands, Saunders, then a colonel, flew on several missions with his "boys." One time, his B-17 was set upon by Japanese Zeros, the pilot killed and the copilot mortally wounded. Saunders took over the controls, landed the flaming craft on the water and helped other crew members to safety on a nearby island, from where they were rescued. Saunders suffered a gash on the forehead and still carries a scar.

The broad-shouldered general, former football star at the University of South Dakota and at West Point, where he had later served as line coach, spent a year in the Solomons building up the aerial might which later was to help roll the Japanese back toward their homeland. Out of dense jungle on an undisclosed island, Saunders and his men hacked an airbase to accommodate the B-17's which helped smother the Japs on Guadalcanal and others of the Solomons.

Saunders must have felt a deep sense of satisfaction as he flew on the mission to attack Japan. He was at Pearl Harbor when the Japanese struck December 7, 1941, destroying much of the Pacific fleet. One of the few American flyers to get into the air at Pearl Harbor, Saunders succeeded in taking off in a B-17.

The general, a former Stratford, S. Dak., farm boy, holds a long list of decorations. One of them is the Navy Cross, seldom awarded men outside the naval service.

Saunders' wife and two sons reside in Aberdeen.

Washington, Iowa, in the Nation's War Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following three newspaper articles with regard to Washington, Iowa:

NEW YORK WRITER SEES WASHINGTON AS TYPICAL MIDWEST TOWN DOING ITS FULL PART IN ALL WAR EFFORTS

(EDITOR'S NOTE—Recently Jack Steele, a writer for the New York Herald Tribune, visited Washington and wrote two articles for his paper, stating his view that this town really knows there is a war going on and is fighting to preserve the home front. The first of the stories is reprinted herewith, and the other will be published tomorrow.)

WASHINGTON, IOWA, May 27.—This is the side of the war you don't read much about—the home front that the men are fighting to come home to.

This is Washington, Iowa, population 5,227 in 1940, seat of Washington County, shopping center for 15,000 corn and hog farmers in southeastern Iowa, prototype of thousands of towns, some a little larger, some a little smaller, which millions of American youths in camp and overseas are thinking and dreaming about.

Washington, Iowa—a grassy square in the center of town shaded by maple trees and scattered with iron benches for loafing and talking. Around the square a quadrangle of two-story red and yellow brick store buildings, McDaniel drug store, Chocolate Shop, North Side Cafe, the Washington State Bank, Klein's (men's wear), J. C. Penney's (dry goods). Beyond a crisscross of wide, tree-lined streets flanked by neat, white frame houses.

NO BIG WAR PLANTS

No humming war plants, no signs of the hustle and bustle of war now so familiar in New York, Chicago, and Washington, no men in uniform on the streets (except for an occasional soldier or sailor home for a brief furlough), no crowded bars or cocktail lounges, no trouble getting a room at the Washington Hotel, a steak dinner advertised for 65 cents.

You stand beside the fountain in the square and survey Washington on a bright May morning with the air tingling with cleanness after an all-night rain, and you wonder.

Is there really a war going on? Has Washington, Iowa, heard about it?

FEW DRAFT-AGE MEN

Then you begin to notice the people walking by. All the men are middle-aged or older, or high-school boys or younger. You stay two days in Washington without seeing more than a dozen men you would be willing to bet are of draft age.

McDaniel's Drug Store window gives the answer you already know. It is jammed with pictures of young men in uniform, so many that they overlap and hide many of the faces.

Here is a corner of America stripped of its young manpower. All that are left are a handful of IV-F's (Iowans are a healthy breed) and a few deferred to work essential farms (they don't come to town very much, at least during spring planting).

KNOW WAR'S ON

Still pondering, you start out to see more of the town. The first stop is James Shoe Shop to have some Iowa mud removed from your shoes. A young women comes out as you enter. The cobbler tells you (you didn't ask) that her husband died a few weeks ago in a bomber.

Does Washington, Iowa, know there is a war going on?

Your next call is on Ralph E. Shannon, editor of the Washington Journal and president of the Iowa Daily Press Association. A picture of a handsome boy, wearing wings and captain's bars, hangs on the wall behind his desk.

You don't mention it at first, but gossip about the Iowa floods, politics, and the newspaper business. Then Mr. Shannon sees your eyes drift toward the picture.

"We lost one of our boys you know." A soft voice with just a tinge of pride mellowing the infinite sorrow.

AFTER 25 MISSIONS

Capt. Robert H. Shannon was one of the first American flyers to complete 25 missions over Europe. He was on his way home, piloting a plane taking Lt. Gen. Frank M. Andrews, American commander in the European area, to Iceland for an inspection tour. A crash against a hillside in the fog. Then a telegram: "The Secretary of War desires that I assure you of his deep sympathy." * * *

Does Washington, Iowa, know there is a war going on? You might not think so at first glance, but I stayed 2 days, and I think it does.

Literally everyone in Washington, Iowa, knew Shanny Shannon. His death brought the war closer to them than full-page lists of casualties, the sight of thousands of men in uniform every day on the streets and scores of minor war irritations bring the war home to most city dwellers. One casualty in Washington is a loss to the whole town.

FARMERS DO PART

Yes, Washington, Iowa, knows about the war and is doing the only things it knows how to support it. Farmers are working from dawn to dark and later. Women and youngsters of ten are driving tractors. War bond drives are going over the top. There is the blood bank and the Red Cross.

But most of all, Washington, Iowa, is trying to stay just as it was before the fighting men went away, to keep intact the kind of life that it knows from the letters they write home is the big thing they are fighting for. No one in Washington quite says that or is doing it wholly consciously, but you sense it everywhere.

Washington is "sweating out the war," praying that the men in uniform will finish it off soon and come back to find the same homes they left. Shanny Shannon was a flyer, and he would understand that.

INTERVIEWS EICHER

Another of Washington's men, Capt. Roger Eicher, came home from the Anzio beachhead the other day on a furlough after, as he expressed it, "2 years and 5 days on the other side."

He lounged in the living room of his family's home today, with a pair of his father's old overalls pulled over his uniform, and told what it is like to come back.

"I found just about everything in Washington just as when I left," he said, "except that none of the fellows I grew up with are around. Some of the people have a few more gray hairs, but they seem just the same as I remembered them.

"It's not quite what I expected, though. We heard a lot about the home front, about rationing and things like that; and I guess I thought things would be changed more than they are.

SAYS PEOPLE "GRAND"

"Everybody kids a lot on the other side about the 'IV-F boys.' They mean all those under 45 who are not in it. When I first hit the States again, I found myself wondering every time I saw somebody in civilian clothes why he was not in uniform.

"I think I've seen most everyone in Washington since I got back, and they've been pretty grand. I only met one of the fellows I knew in school. That was down in one of the stores Saturday night. I found out he's fighting a little war of his own on a big farm, working day and night.

"Some of the ideas I had over in Africa and Italy have changed since I came home, and I imagine the others will have about the same experience when they get back."

FINDS FARMERS IN COUNTY IRKED BY MANIPULATIONS OF HOG PRICES; SAYS THEY'LL VOTE AGAINST NEW DEAL

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Here is the second of two articles on Washington, Iowa, which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune, written by Jack Steele, who spent a few days here to find out for eastern readers how a typical Midwest community is carrying on its share of the war—as described in the first article reprinted in the Journal yesterday—and the attitude of the farmers to political and economic problems.)

WASHINGTON, IOWA.—Here is what might be called the case history of a "bungle."

Republican politicians in Iowa and other Corn Belt States are supremely confident that farmers will vote overwhelmingly against the present national administration in November, regardless of the Republicans' nominee or what he says.

A few days passed in talking things over with the farmers of the corn-and-hog country surrounding this Iowa town indicate that such confidence is well founded. Good words for Washington, D. C., and the New Deal are as scarce as proverbial hen's teeth around Washington, Iowa.

Washington County farmers are more prosperous today than ever before, but they are also hopping mad about the administration's varied and detailed activities in attempting to regulate and manage the Nation's wartime agriculture. Politicians refer to a good share of these farm regulations as "bungling." Some of the things farmers call them can't be published in a family newspaper.

DRIVE TO PRODUCE MORE

Washington County is among the 10 leading hog-producing counties of Iowa, so this case history of what its farmers consider a typical "bungle" naturally concerns hogs.

For more than 2 years the Federal Government has been using every means at its command, financial as well as patriotic, to urge farmers to raise more pigs. As a result, Washington County, like most of the Corn Belt, became knee deep in fat porkers.

The administration also imposed certain wartime regulations on the livestock and meat industry, regulations through which it sought to replace the so-called natural laws that normally govern priced production. It set ceiling prices on hogs to protect consumers and floor or support prices, since it had promised farmers a high return to encourage more production.

Last fall the huge hog crop the administration had asked for began to come to market. The support price ($13.75 a hundred pounds at Chicago) soon became the top price for hogs, and the higher ceiling price lost all meaning.

PRICE REMAINS SAME

This support price remains the same throughout the year. Normally hog prices fluctuate over a range of about $2.50, dropping during the peak winter marketing and rising at other seasons. This encouraged farmers to spread their marketing over a longer period.

As a result of elimination of this normal price spread and the huge hog crop, stockyards have been glutted with hogs since fall. In the first 4 months of this year, packing houses slaughtered near 29,000,000 head, twice the average of the previous 5 years and 10,000,000 more than last year, and still could not handle all that farmers were ready to sell.

Steps were taken to keep farmers from sending more hogs to market than could be handled. Embargoes were placed upon shipments. Stockyards refused to accept them. Packers set up quotas on how many hogs they would accept.

MUST REGISTER HOGS

A small stockyard in Washington forces farmers to register when they want to sell hogs and then wait until notified to deliver them. It now has more than 25,000 hogs on its books, hogs which are ready for market but can't be sold. A farmer with hogs ready for market today can't get rid of them for 4 to 6 weeks.

And here comes the rub, or, as the farmer says, the "bungle."

The War Food Administration made the support price applicable only to hogs weighing between 180 and 270 pounds. The top limit was set to discourage feeding of scarce corn to hogs after they become too heavy to convert the grain into meat most efficiently.

But the glut of the hog market and the restrictions on sales now are forcing farmers to hold many of their hogs on the farm and continue feeding them corn until they weigh more than 270 pounds. The price packers pay for these overweight hogs now averages nearly $2 a hundred pounds less than the support price, so the farmer loses about $5 a hog.

HEAVIER PIGS SOLD FIRST

He may succeed in shipping his hogs to Chicago or some other central market before they reach the 270-pound limit. But the packers, who know a good thing when they see it, buy the heavier and cheaper hogs first.

The support-weight hogs are held over for several days before they are bought. They shrink several pounds a day in the stockyards. The farmer must pay for their feed and care. He still loses several dollars an animal.

The Washington county farmer is not going to strike. He will still have a good income. But the indications are he will do two things—vote against the administration in November and raise less hogs next year.

Washington, D. C., may have ready explanations for the muddled hog situation, but to Washington, Iowa, it is still a "bungle"—one of the scores that farmers have piled up against the administration in 2½ years of wartime regulation of agriculture.

LITTLE WASHINGTONS

(An editorial from the Washington (D. C.) Star)

In Washington, D. C., everybody knows there is a tremendous global conflict going on. But what about the little Washingtons, distributed all over the 48 States? Do their people understand? Jack Steele, of the New York Herald Tribune, "sampled" Washington in Iowa to get the answer to that question.

And the answer is better than some persons would expect. The Iowa Washington represents what the men at the front are fighting to come home to. Mr. Steele tells how it looks: "A grassy square, shaded by maple trees and scattered with iron benches for loafing and talking. Around the square a quadrangle of two-story red- and yellow-brick store buildings. Beyond, a crisscross of wide, tree-lined streets flanked by neat, white frame houses. No humming war plants, no sign of the hustle and bustle of war."

Instead of excitement, there is the purposeful quiet of waiting—and working. All the men in Washington, Iowa, are "middle-aged or older or high-school boys or younger." McDaniel's drug-store window is "jammed" with photographs of soldiers, sailors, and marines, so many that they overlap. Mr. Steele declares: "Here is a corner of America stripped of its young manpower." The folk who remain are laboring from dawn to dusk. "Youngsters of 10 are driving tractors."

Meanwhile, the prayer in the hearts of the residents of Iowa's Washington is that "the men in uniform will finish it off soon and come back to find the same homes they left." Mr. Steele discovered no anxiety for change among the citizens with whom he talked. "Most of all," he reports, "Washington, Iowa, is trying to stay just as it was before the fighting men went away, to keep intact the kind of life that it knows from letters they write home is the big thing they are fighting for. No one quite says that or is doing it wholly consciously, but you sense it everywhere.

Capt. Robert H. Shannon, who crashed with Lt. Gen. Frank M. Andrews and Bishop Adna Wright Leonard in Iceland, May 3, 1943, was the son of Ralph E. Shannon, editor of the Washington (Iowa) Journal. He is remembered as one of the first American flyers to complete 25 missions over Europe. When he died the entire community mourned—and was proud.

The Postal Guide indicates that there are 41 little Washingtons from Maine to California and from Michigan to Louisiana. Iowa's Washington is central to them all, and probably symptomatic of them, likewise.

America on the Move

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 21 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very thoughtful address delivered by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] before the American Trucking Association, in convention at San Francisco, Calif., on June 7, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We Americans are perhaps the most transportation-conscious people in the world. There are many reasons, of course, both environmental and historic, to explain this. The expansion, development, and growth of this Nation is, without a doubt, the great miracle of the nineteenth century. Behind this miracle is another miracle—the miracle of American transportation.

Our struggle to settle and develop this continent has been in many ways a struggle with time. The theory that space and time are relative is a conception which we Americans appreciated, and translated into action, a long time ago. Our history shows that we have had intuitive understanding of this theory, an understanding we did not express in words but in swift achievement—visionary, urgent, and creative.

The stagecoach, the pony express, the covered wagon, the first woodburners, the horsecars, the express trains, the automobile and bus, the air transports—in our history these are more than simple evolutionary steps in the development of transportation. They pass too swiftly, overlap in a process too urgent and meaningful. They are the telescoped symbols of a dynamic urge that allowed us in the course of a short century and a half to achieve the growth, the vision, and the power to shift the center of the world.

Historically, the part that we of the new world are playing in this war and the part we are clearly destined to play in the future of the nations of the world, when peace comes, overshadows, I feel, almost everything else. Behind this momentous evolution in world affairs we find once against the miracle of American transportation. We have outmatched our enemies and startled the world with our industrial capacity and our technological genius. But we were able to make both felt, able to make both decisive, because, in keeping with our tradition, we revealed our native vision, energy, and will to bridge the ocean with our ships and conquer space with our planes.

If getting there is the problem, it can be said truthfully that that problem we Americans can always lick.

The first big step in the history of American transportation was the cutting of roads through the early wilderness; roads over which commerce moved by on horseback, by wagon, and by coach to fuse a series of backwoods outposts into an economic whole. Then came the canals, the canals that outflanked the Alleghenies and brought the irresistible westward tide into the fertile plains of the Mississippi. The Pennsylvania, the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Ohio and Erie, the Wabash and Erie Canals, connected the Atlantic coast with the waters of the Ohio, the Wabash, the Illinois, and the Mississippi Rivers, as well as with the Great Lakes, which became in their turn the probing fingers of our national destiny.

Railroads were the next big step, finally spanning the continent. When the last spike was driven on the first transcontinental railroad, a tie was forged between the rocky coast of the Atlantic and the sunny shores of the Pacific, which was the first firm assurance of the permanent continental breadth of this Nation. There still remained many important gaps in our national unity, from a transportation standpoint; gaps which expansion of rail transportation did not fill, and which continued to exist until the advent of the automobile, and the growth of truck and bus transportation, provided the incentive for a new and greater expansion of our highway network. Finally came the most revolutionary vehicle of all—the airplane—using the great sea of the air as man has used the seas of the earth, and carving air highways where the construction of surface roads would be difficult, if not impossible.

All of these—the waterways, the railroads, the truck and bus, the transport plane—form our present transportation system. Each has played a vital part, each has a still more vital part to play. Our waterways already are taking on new importance as a means of cheap and strategic long-distance transportation. Our railroads face a new era of expanded usefulness in the post-war world. New horizons for highway transportation—the truck and the bus—already are in sight, to be reached and passed in the years immediately after the war. And the possibilities of air transportation have scarcely been touched.

Transportation, binding different areas together, making the resources of the one available to the industries of another, bringing the products of industry to every city, town, and hamlet, and to every farmhouse, has made commerce a dynamic force for integration of our national consciousness. Transportation weaves the close ties that are the foundation of cultural and national unification. Transportation has given us—one of the most diversified and scattered peoples on the face of the earth—both a continental economy and a continental unity.

Let us look at the question from another angle. It is estimated that we spend about $20,000,000,000 annually on transportation. Transportation accounts, it is said, for about one-fifth of our national investments. In peacetime the Federal Government expends about a billion dollars a year for transportation. Clearly, there is every reason why we should be the world's most transportation-conscious people.

There is another, and an even more important fact, about our transportation system. As a whole it is what in many ways can justly be called a people's system. I do not mean to say that those who have managed our transportation systems have always been responsive to all the needs and wishes of the people, or to the fullest needs of commerce and industry in general. What I do mean is this, that where such responsiveness was lacking, deserved economic punishment, inevitable under free competition, sooner or later followed. I mean also that the people, for the greater part, had choices; had choices and had recourse to remedies.

If the waterways failed us, we had the railroads. If one railroad failed us, we often had another. Should the railroads have failed us altogether in any instance, we had busses and trucks. I cannot say that we have been pampered. But so far we have almost always had the means to make our wishes felt. Business on the whole has enjoyed relative freedom to get the services it needed and desired, if not from one source, then from another. We have been relatively free to move the centers of our economic activity, and there was always a medium of transportation to serve us.

Let us bear this fact in mind. It is the most important fact of all as we face our future. The future holds great promise for us. I know that I have many sound reasons for saying that in particular it holds great promise for the Western States. It holds the promise for us here in the West, and for this great Nation as a whole, of further development, further expansion, and perhaps startling new growth.

Now, growth means movement. Not merely movement of goods. Not merely movement of people from city to city. It means movement to new sites, to new opportunities, to new lands, to new future cities. Today, and let us not forget this, we are still free to move. We can move and we can be certain that our purchasing power—so long as we have free competition—will bring to our door the necessary services. That's real democracy. We know that if one form of transportation is not available to us, another will be. If the old established companies in any line of transportation should fail or refuse to provide us with adequate service, we can easily organize new companies. The field is free. Our movements will not be impeded.

Of course we want coordination of transportation, if the coordination we desire is feasible and economically realizable. We want the greatest possible coordination and economy. We are a business people. Coordination and economy are essential to our existence, our prosperity. But I think that we—the American people—want this coordination simply as coordination, not as arbitrary unity of control. We want it in a way which will allow us to deal with each transportation unit individually. We want it in a way which will keep our whole transportation framework flexible. When we say we want coordination, we mean coordination, and not monopoly.

It is against this background that I want to discuss the proposition being urged upon the people and the Government of this Nation today. It is the proposition that we should "integrate" our different transportation facilities into a single and centralized national transportation system. This proposition places before us a grave danger. The danger is all the more grave because it is part and parcel of the trends to centralization that threaten us from all sides. "Integrate" is but another word for "centralize."

The formula offered for the centralization of our transportation system calls for "integration with competition." Competitive integration is a phrase that could have been taken right out of the book of an internationalist cartelist. It is a phrase full of a contemporary flavor. Don't expect me to explain how a system can be integrated and competitive at the same time, how the four branches of transportation—water, highway, rail, and air—can be resolved into a single integrated service and yet have each compete with the others as to service, schedules, and rates.

Let us not be misled by the nonsensical terminology, however, into understanding the danger we face from this plan, the new panacea. In recent years we have seen the spectacle of more than one Nation being shackled with empty phrases. Words like "integration" have a special appeal to certain minds; particularly those minds that would father things so big that they become dangerous, and which, being dangerous, carry within themselves the seeds of a plausible justification for their being taken over by the Government.

State socialism is both an ideal and a fool's reward. There are two roads to it, as our contemporary history proves. There is the road of the moon-eyed idealist and his fellow travelers, and there is the road of the short-sighted fool.

Let us examine the pattern of this proposed integration.

Obviously the integration which is advocated is not and cannot be an arrangement between equal partners. Throw all branches of transportation into a single unit, and one of those branches is bound to take control. Investment, entrenchment, power and magnitude, would automatically become dominating factors. Competition would be almost wholly eliminated, and all of the transportation services but one would be made subservient to the interests of the one.

Let us ask ourselves this question: Can we believe that one branch of transportation service, relieved of competition in its own sphere, and placed in a position of such dominance, would use its tremendous influence impartially to allow the other branches of transportation their fullest development.

I want to pay tribute here to the service the railroads of this country have rendered to the Nation during the great war emergency. I also want to recognize the pledge made by the railroads, in their wartime advertising and publicity, that they mean to offer the people of this country a greatly improved and more progressive service after the war. I am not lacking in genuine appreciation of either the magnitude and merit of the job the railroads have done or of their good faith in making pledges for post-war improvement. I have for the railroads of this country the utmost good will. However, the bearing of good will does not require that we shut our eyes to the clear prewar record of the American railroads. I am glad that the railroads themselves recognize the need for improving on that record. When we raise the question whether any one of our transportation services, given practically unlimited power, can be trusted with the responsibility of an integrated transportation system, the record of what has happened in the past must be considered.

During my service in the Senate I have learned a few practical things in regard to management both in Government and business. For one thing, I know it is best to avoid a Government set-up or a business set-up, so arranged, that the agencies in charge, if they are to perform their expected duties, must act contrary to human nature.

It would be contrary to human nature for the executives of the dominant transportation agency, under the proposed integration, not to make the other transportation agencies subservient to their own. We cannot risk this experiment. I say we cannot risk it, for once we will have achieved this integration, and built up the physical and managerial structure of our transportation system around this integration, then to combat the inevitable evils that would result we would have only one final recourse—nationalization. We certainly don't want that.

I want to make it clear that I do not object to the plan merely because it is inspired by one agency or another. I have attempted to examine the plan first of all on its merits. It is a bad plan because it would place our whole transportation system at the mercy of some one dominant transportation agency, without offering us any evidence that such agency would use its power at all times in a manner satisfactory to our interests.

I wish to make this point without prejudice to any transportation agency. I cannot commend them for their lack of foresight in pressing a scheme, which, if it succeeded, would bring our transportation system to the final step before nationalization. However, impulse is human, perhaps all to human. They have their interests to serve. Other interests also must be served, the national interest foremost of all. To balance all interests, achieve a matching of powers on a fair and equitable basis, is the secret of democracy, the key to freedom. The effort to do so is a struggle, eternal and relentless.

Admittedly, our transportation system today is in may ways disjointed, inefficient, and even wasteful. It has many shortcomings. But the remedy is not to be found in the proposed plan for integration. We are not dealing here with a problem requiring mathematical perfection, to be solved in a social and economic vacuum. We are dealing here with a complex service, which must be treated in two distinct lights—service and always better service on the one hand, and on the other, responsiveness, the greatest possible responsiveness to the needs and desires of the people, business and industry. We cannot propose to solve one at the cost of the other.

I readily agree with a statement made by my colleague in the Senate, Senator TRUMAN, who said:

"I have little patience with those who concoct fancy and plausible schemes out of thin air, ignoring the lessons and experiences of the past, and who, because they are convinced that existing methods and systems are imperfect, conclude that any change, not matter how ill-founded or ill-conceived, would be an improvement."

This plan to integrate our transportation system belongs in the category of those schemes properly condemned by Senator TRUMAN. It offers the strong attraction, to some, of being foreign to our system and to our traditions. The word "integration" is a glamour word. But the glamour is superficial and misleading.

What do we want of our transportation agencies? Above all, we want responsiveness. We want maximum, intelligent, and progressive responsiveness to democratic economic demand. Ours is not a planned economy. Our economy is unmatched, unrivalled, because it is responsive to the talent, the genius, the will, the dreams, the hopes, the ambition—yes; even the avarice—of every free citizen. Our transportation system must be equally responsive and resilient. We want the transportation system to take us and our goods where we want to go and where we want our goods to be taken. We don't want our transportation system to become a series of petrified and vested ruts, denying our will and our hopes and stunting our national growth. We don't want a centralized and planned system. We want a free system, responsive to economic demand. Such a system can be maintained only under conditions of free competition. Such a system—the system demanded by our vital interests—is the antithesis of the integrated system proposed.

We are facing new horizons. A new industrial revolution is taking place before our eyes. Already the magnitude of this revolution has dwarfed the old industrial revolution of the steam engine and the simple mass-production machines. Industrial chemistry is changing the whole base of our raw materials sources or our processes and technique.

Areas that are wildernesses today, waterways that are merely bare expanses may tomorrow become the seats of mighty new industries, the sites of new cities, and the lanes of fabulous new traffic.

The sunshine of our Nation's tomorrow will find our every town, our every city, a sea coast community—its land the fruitful earth, its sea the regions of the air.

By our country's genius, Tennyson's vision has been visualized:

"For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the vision of the world and all the wonder that would be,
Saw the heavens filled with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;
Heard the heavens filled with shouting, and there rain'd a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue:
Far along the world-wide whisper of the scuthwind rushing warm,
With the standards of the peoples plunging through the thunderstorm:
Till the war drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle flags were furl'd
In the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

In that federation, visualized by the poet, the United States of America may make itself strong and free to dominantly lead, so that slaughter and hate and the foolish enterprise of war shall not be recurring; so that the markets of the world may have opportunity to purchase and produce. Freedom of movement is the vital of our democracy. Constrict that by making it ever possible for one agency of transportation to dominate all others, and we will have put home a solar plexus to the American way of life.

No; we are not going through a period of industrial integration. To the contrary, we are facing a period of tremendous evolutionary change. Only by understanding this evolution, by anticipating its trends, by keeping abreast of the developments it foreshadows, can we hope to maintain our great place, politically and industrially, among the nations of the world.

In the great changes we face, the West, with its tremendous and barely touched resources, facing the Pacific, is going to play a great role. The West is the key to this Nation's prosperity and its future development. The needs of the West demand that our transportation system be kept resilient and competitive. We don't want integration. There is nothing to integrate. Why, we've just started to move.

Snake River Dams

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, Uncle Sam, as we affectionately call our Federal Government, has vast undeveloped resources, largely in Government ownership, locked up in the mountain fastnesses of western Montana, central Idaho, eastern Oregon, and Washington. Reaching into this immense undeveloped area from the Pacific Ocean we have the mighty Columbia and its main tributary, the Snake River, navigable in high water to the city of Lewiston, Idaho, located at the confluence of the Clearwater and the Snake Rivers. It is now proposed to open these vast resources by the construction of the necessary dams to provide year-round navigation.

There is inserted herewith for the consideration of my colleagues the presentation recently made in support of this plan to the Senate committee having this legislation under consideration:

UNITED STATES SENATE, SUBCOMMITTEE OF
COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., May 10, 1944.

RIVERS AND HARBORS OMNIBUS BILL

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., pursuant to adjournment on Wednesday, May 17, 1944, in room 224, Senate Office Building, Senator JOHN H. OVERTON, chairman of the subcommittee, presiding.

Present: Senators OVERTON (chairman of the subcommittee), ROBERTSON, and CORDON.

Present also: Senators MILLIKIN and O'MAHONEY.

Senator OVERTON (chairman of the subcommittee). The subcommittee will be in order. We have with us this morning Representative COMPTON I. WHITE of Idaho.

SNAKE RIVER, OREG., WASH., AND IDAHO—resumed

STATEMENT OF HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE FIRST DISTRICT OF IDAHO

Representative WHITE. My name is COMPTON I. WHITE. I represent the First District of Idaho.

The proposed dams on the Snake River will be in the State of Washington, but their construction will bring navigation to Idaho.

Senator OVERTON. Do you wish to address the committee on the Snake River project?

Representative WHITE. On the Snake River project, and particularly on the navigation dams between the confluence of the Snake River with the Columbia River and the confluence of the Snake River with the Clearwater River, at the Idaho boundary line, at Lewiston.

I might preface my remarks by stating that some of the places out there bear the names of the explorers Lewis and Clark. Away back in 1805 when Lewis and Clark were sent west by the National Government to explore the Northwest, particularly the Columbia River, they crossed the State of Idaho on what is now known as the Lolo Trail. There is a great deal of history attached to this route. They reached the Snake River at Lewiston, Idaho, and from there by navigation and by portage they went to the mouth of the Columbia. I think the record discloses that in making their exploration trip back they named the main branches of the Great Columbia River for themselves—Clark Fork, from its confluence with the Columbia River up to its headwaters, and the south branch they named the Lewis River, which is now known as the Snake. Due to the fact of the governmental policy of accepting the names given by the local settlers, the river is now called the Snake.

If you will recall, Lewis and Clark were there in 1805, and gold was found in 1849, and it was in the early sixties that gold was found in Idaho. The south branch of the Snake River was so crooked that the people called it the Snake River, so that the name given to it by the explorers lost its identity. The only place that carries the name of Lewis at this time is the town of Lewiston; and just across the River in the State of Washington there is the beautiful town of Clarkston. So we have the twin cities at the confluence of the Columbia and the Clearwater Rivers; and that section is destined to be one of the great industrial centers of the West.

That is borne out by the investigation of the Army engineers who have made extensive investigations of the resources tributary to this area; and we have in central Idaho the greatest undeveloped resources in the United States, I might say. I say that advisedly.

In the files of the Department of the Interior, in the records of the United States Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, the Forest Service, and the Department of Agriculture are records of vast resources that are now inaccessible, that are locked up, due to the lack of transportation to markets.

What I have been doing in my 10 years here in representing that district of Idaho has been to try to induce the Government to adopt a constructive policy in an effort to open up these resources. Now we are in this war, and the Nation is in debt, and we will have to continue the expansion of our industry. So it seems to me that the utilization of these resources will be one of the best means that we can find to expand our industries and help solve our Government financial problems.

We can visualize the future and see that our Nation is going to be more dominant in the Orient, more influential in trade with the South Sea Islands and in opening Alaska, and here we have a great industrial section of the United States in the making, along the Snake and Columbia Rivers.

Coming to the matter immediately before the committee, the Columbia River, we find the Missouri combined with the Mississippi our greatest rivers—the Columbia being the second greatest river in the United States—drains and will give access to the greatest undeveloped section of the United States.

Senator O'MAHONEY. May I interrupt you?

Representative WHITE. I shall be happy to have you do so. I would like to make this a conference rather than a speech.

Senator O'MAHONEY. I want to do a little boasting for Wyoming. I do not believe that the attention of the committee has been called to the fact that the three greatest river systems in the United States all receive waters which originate in the State of Wyoming. Within an area of a comparatively few square miles south of Yellowstone National Park there are found the source waters of the Columbia, the Colorado, and the Missouri.

Representative WHITE. In the light of the issues that have been raised here I would like to remind the Senator from Wyoming that in disposing of the waters of his State that flow south into the Colorado River a very fine and comprehensive plan has been worked out in entering into a compact with what is known as the upper-basin States and the lower-basin States for the disposition of that water. I knew this in handling the matter of legislation and rewriting the Boulder Dam bill and going into some detail dealing with the disposition and allocation of the waters of the Colorado River it developed that a very fine plan had been worked out, with the sanction or approval of Congress. In other words, these States got the authorization from Congress to enter into a compact, and a compact was entered into, and was brought back to the Congress for approval. There was no use to spend $140,000,000 to build Boulder Dam and provide for storage in Lake Mead if the people of the upper States could have diverted all the water of the Colorado River. So in this compact it was arranged that half the water of the Colorado River would be permitted to flow down and fill this reservoir. And there was a compensation for that, if you please. The bill carried a provision that $500,000 a year of the income from the sale of power and water would be put into a separate fund in the Treasury to finance the development of reclamation districts in the upper-basin States.

The lower-basin States, for the loss of taxes they would otherwise have received from the large development of Boulder Dam by private interest—I think the transmission lines alone cost $17,000,000, that carry the energy generated at Boulder Dam over the hills to the market place in southern California—get $150,000 a year in lieu of taxes.

I just point that out as a precedent in settling the allocation of the waters between the several States.

I would like to read into the record an amendment to this river and harbor bill that I supported in the House and which I want to suggest to the members of this subcommittee [reading]:

"In connection with dams and works herein or hereafter authorized, any use for the maintenance of a navigable channel of the waters of any stream or tributary thereof shall be subordinate to and shall not interfere with any use of such waters for domestic, irrigation, mining, or industrial purposes heretofore or hereafter established under State law."

I think that is a constructive amendment. I think it would protect the whole situation. It is exactly in line with the provisions of the Idaho State Constitution which gives first preference to water for domestic use, then for irrigation, mining, and things of that kind, and lastly for power. I think that that provision of our State constitution can well be adhered to in the policies that are set up in dealing with the distribution of the waters of these rivers.

To my mind, some of the arguments that have been made seem to be rather childish with reverence to navigation. It seems to me that a little boy going out after a rain to play in the yard, and with a hoe draining little pools and puddles, would know that when you retard the flow of water and raise its outlet you can deepen the channel without drawing on more water. It seems to me that a single navigation dam that would retard the flow of water would automatically deepen the channel without making any drafts on irrigation up the stream. That is the position we take here.

Now, I want to call attention to the essence of the issues in this particular case with reference to these navigation dams proposed to be developed on the Snake River.

In the first place, referring to a relief map prepared by the Geological Commission of the State of Idaho, I will state to the committee that I tried to obtain a similar map of Oregon so that I might show you both sides of the Snake River, but, unfortunately, there is no relief map of that kind yet made by that State.

The Snake River rises in Wyoming, away over at the Yellowstone Park, and flows across the State of Idaho through a fertile plain. I believe they call the soil volcanic ash. There we have one of the most productive sections of the United States.

North of this lava plain or volcanic-ash country the State of Idaho is exceedingly rough; it is one of the roughest sections of the whole United States. It lies just west of the Continental Divide. I have been in that part of the State. Due to the ruggedness of the country it has been inaccessible to the construction of railroads.

The fact is, in traveling from north to south in Idaho we have to go by rail over 300 miles east to Butte, Mont., and go south to Idaho Falls or Pocatello to get access to southern Idaho, or go around by Pendleton, away over in Oregon. The country is so rugged in that area of Idaho that there is no chance of building a railroad through that section of the country.

We have at this very time, 330 miles from where the United States Highway 10 crosses northern Idaho down to where U S 30 crosses southern Idaho, a section where there is absolutely no highway across there except forest trails.

I just cite that so that you may know something of the ruggedness of that country.

There is a heavy snowfall in this area every year. I do not have the records here, but I know that the snowfall and the rainfall are very heavy. That supplies two great rivers, the Clearwater on the north and the Salmon on the south. There is no way in the world that any of that water in the State of Idaho, or anywhere else before its confluence with the Snake River, can be used in any way for irrigation. It can be used for power, but not for irrigation. The Army engineers tell us that there is enough water in the Clearwater River alone to supply the water to make the necessary depth for navigation in the Snake River at the confluence with the Columbia River.

I want to offer for the record a telegram dated March 17, 1944, from Col. Ralph Tudor, district engineer. [Reading:]

MARCH 17, 1944.

Representative COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives,
Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, Washington, D. C.:

Reference is made to your request for further data on stream flow on lower Snake River. Records at Weiser for the period 1930–40, inclusive, show low flow to be approximately 6,600 cubic feet per second; 90 percent of time flow exceeds 8,500 cubic feet per second; and 75 percent of time it exceeds 10,000 cubic feet per second. At Riparia low flow is 11,000 cubic feet per second; 90 percent of time flow exceeds 15,200 cubic feet per second, and 75 percent of time it exceeds 18,300 cubic feet per second. Flow required to provide slack-water navigation when all dams are built will be less than 1,000 cubic feet per second. Either the Clearwater or Salmon Rivers provide at all times flow in excess of this minimum amount.

TUDOR,
District Engineer.

If we took every drop of the Snake River water where it leaves Idaho and enters into the Snake River Canyon between Idaho and the State of Oregon, if we did not make any allowance for a return flow from these irrigation districts, we would still have all the water we need for navigation below Lewiston to say nothing of the rivers that come in from an equally rugged section over in the State of Oregon.

The four rivers emptying into the Snake on the regon side and two big rivers, Salmon and Clearwater on the Idaho side will more than supply enough water to deepen the channel by the construction of the necessary dams on the Snake River.

Between Lewiston and the confluence of the Snake River with the Columbia River you now have navigation as far as Lewiston; and this navigation, gentlemen, is not just an experiment. I have here actual photographs of the river transportation now in effect during the high-water period on the Snake River as far up as Lewiston. I have a picture here showing the loading of wheat. They have built elevators and have facilities for loading their wheat into boats right at Lewiston, Idaho.

I have brought with me some copies of the hearings before the House committee for you members of the committee.

Senator ROBERTSON. You might hand me a copy for Senator O'MAHONEY, if you please. He wishes me to express to you his regret that he had to leave to attend an important meeting of another committee of which he is a member.

Representative WHITE. If you will turn to the frontispiece opposite page 1 of the hearings you will find a picture of a steam barge of the Union Pacific Railroad that plies the Snake River up to Lewiston, passing, in this picture, under the Interstate Bridge between the towns of Lewiston and Clarkston at the confluence of the Snake and Clearwater Rivers.

There is a great amount of wheat that is moved downstream, and there has been regular service during the high-water period. In the low-water period they cannot navigate.

If you will turn to page 5 you will find a picture of the confluence of Clearwater and Snake Rivers at the town of Lewiston, and that picture shows the Interstate Bridge between the towns of Lewison and Clarkston.

When the Lewis and Clark Road is completed it will be one of the main arterial highways between Portland, Oreg, and Chicago, Ill.

Now turn to page 7, if you please. There you will find a picture of an elevator constructed with a loading chute to deliver grain to the barges. In the high-water period they haul petroleum up from tidewater at Portland, particularly to Umatilla. In high water they haul it as far as Lewiston and take a cargo of grain back.

On page 11 you will find a picture of a barge on the river at Lewiston, being shoved by a tug upstream. It is in the grain and petroleum traffic.

On page 17 you will find a picture of the famous Lewiston hill highway, one of the famous roads and one of the heaviest-traveled roads in the West. It is the main highway between US 95, between the North and South. It taps Spokane, Boise, Salt Lake, and Lewiston, and, when it reaches the top of the high plateau it traverses the famous Palouse country where they raise so much wheat, where the seat of our university is located, and the seat of the Washington State College. They are only 8 miles apart and about 30 miles from Lewiston. The road passes over the brow of the hill and descends 2,000 feet. The town of Lewiston is only 700 feet above sea level. It has a very mild climate and enjoys a very fine location downgrade from all the upper country where there are so many undeveloped resources to which I have referred.

The next illustration is at page 22. That is another view of a barge hauling freight into and out of the Lewiston country.

The next is at page 31, which is a magnificent picture of the city of Portland. It is too bad that we had to reduce the size of the picture. Portland is on the Columbia River at the confluence of the Columbia and the Willamette Rivers, one of our large industrial centers of the Northwest and destined to be a great commercial and industrial city. It is the port which we are trying to reach by the improvement of the Snake River for all-year-round navigation.

The back maps are maps showing the location of the power projects along the river, Grand Coulee and Bonneville. The projects at John Day and Umatilla are also indicated. That is an older map.

I think I have demonstrated to the committee that there is sufficient water tributary to the Snake River above Lewiston to supply any navigation needs without in any way interfering with the reclamation on the river upstream; and I might say to you that the canyon on the Snake River is one of the deepest canyons on the continent. It is deeper than the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. That is an established fact.

I would like to say a word now to the members of the committee about the resources that will be tapped by the development of the Snake River for year-round navigation.

As I stated previously, the records over in the Department of the Interior prepared by the United States Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines, have disclosed that we have in central Idaho, eastern Oregon, and western Montana, tributary to this country, one of the greatest undeveloped mineral sections of the United States, if it is not the greatest.

Just to illustrate: This little town of Stibnite [indicating on map] is in a mining district where they are hauling ore out from the mines 80 miles over three mountain ranges to reach the railhead at Cascade. Before the war started there was a little operation there, only one small mill. After the Bureau of Mines went in there and made explorations, other mineral deposits were opened up. Stibnite is the name of an ore that contains antimony and zinc; with this they have opened large deposits of tungsten. They are now taking out $1,000,000,000 a month, out of that section, hauling it by truck 80 miles. That is exclusive of the lead and silver mines, the cobalt mines, and gold mines in other sections of central Idaho. That country is one of the greatest undeveloped mining sections of the United States.

There is another thing that I would like to point out to you gentlemen. We are now preparing to open up the Columbia Basin, involving 1,200,000 acres of proven rich agricultural land. We have built the Grand Coulee Dam and the water is now available to irrigate all this section [indicating on map]. That country has got to be built up. There will be cities and towns and farms and all the things that go to build up that country. We have a cement plant now in production, and one of the greatest white pine mills in the world at Lewiston. This operation is utilizing the vast timber stands in central Idaho. When these dams are in, the navigation division of the river will be complete.

Senator OVERTON. When you say "these dams" what do you mean?

Representative WHITE. I am talking about the five proposed Snake River dams on the Snake River. Some objection has been raised to their being included in this bill, on the proposition that they will make a demand on water upstream that is needed for irrigation. The point that I want to bring out is the fact that that objection is unfounded.

Senator OVERTON. I just wanted to make it clear for the record.

Representative WHITE. Just think what a simple matter it would be to build up this great Columbia Basin area with materials available, and mostly in Government ownership, in central Idaho by floating them down the Snake River to Pasco and different landings along the Columbia River, moving them to the points where they are to be used. We now have navigation below there. This is not an experiment.

I would like to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that this is the second greatest river in the United States. It drains one of the greatest sections of Government-owned resources in the United States. Great stands of white-pine timber owned by the Federal Government are located in this area. Every foot of white-pine timber and the bulk of the timber owned in the Northwest is tributory and dependent, if you please, in large measure on the improvement of this river for navigation. This, gentlemen, will complement and carry out the original plan of building the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal was constructed to give access to the western part of this country; and the minute that the Panama Canal was constructed, big lumber companies from the Eastern States came into the West and put up big mills; I might say, immediately after the Panama Canal construction was started. They are now moving timber that is accessible from these Pacific ports around through the canal to the eastern markets.

This improvement of the Columbia and Snake Rivers will simply complement and carry forward the plan that was started when we built the Panama Canal. It will give navigation access to the bulk of the timber owned by the Federal Government. I would like to get that fact before the committee.

I recall at one time, in making a trip over my district, that a prospector came to me and said he was from Sweden, that he had been working in the iron mines of Sweden and had also been with the survey parties of United States Steel Corporation in Minnesota and in Michigan, and that he found better iron in Idaho than they had in Minnesota and Michigan. There is iron in central Idaho. Geologists were sent out to investigate. I have on my desk an application from a cement plant. They say they have found better iron there than they are obtaining in Utah and that as soon as it is opened up they will contract to the extent of 1,500 tons a year. This is to be used in the manufacturing of cement. In addition, there will be great demands for this iron ore from various sources for use in the manufacturing of iron and steel products of all kinds.

We cannot open this country up if we do not make a start; and this improvement of the Columbia River and the Snake River to Lewiston is the main start.

I hope that this bill will be reported out by the Senate with the amendment I have submitted as it was by the House and that these dams will be authorized. It is not an appropriation. It is a fine start to build the empire of the Northwest, to give access to a great industrial section in the northwest part of our country which is tributary to the Columbia River and by navigation to every section of the United States.

I thank you for your kind attention.

Senator ROBERTSON. This project recognizes the prior rights of domestic use and irrigation throughout the Snake River?

Representative WHITE. Yes. There is no interference in any way, in the authorization of these dams, with the use of water upstream, because there is an abundance of water. I have tried to impress the committee that if we take every drop necessary for irrigation upstream there would still be enough coming in from rivers below Weiser, Idaho.

One of the big problems, after you irrigate land, is to get the water off the land which requires a big investment in drainage. If you pass along over these irrigation districts you will see large canals with high mounds of dirt piled along, and generally those are drainage canals where they have had to go to big expense to get the water back off the land. The water has to be delivered back somewhere; it has got to be gotten off the land. If they did not take the water away again, once it was put there by the streams flowing through all these big canals surging down on the land, you would have a lot of lakes. So that the item of irrigation water return flow is a big item, and calls for an investment to get water back off the land by the construction of drainage canals once it is put on there. If you did not get it off the land would sour and you would make no crops. So that return flow means a lot in irrigation, and the return flow on the Snake River means a tremendous amount of water. Every drop that you put out, except that which disappears by evaporation, comes back, and there is plenty of water in the Snake River down where it makes the boundary line, between Oregon and Idaho and that is as far as the irrigation section extends. From there on it flows into the deepest canyon on the continent; and there is no possibility of using any water for irrigation until you get far below these dams. There you can use the water and divert it out on the land again with an abundance of water for all irrigable land below the dams downstream.

So I cannot see that there is any interference at all with irrigation; and I speak advisedly. I am speaking to you now as the chairman of the House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Senator ROBERTSON. I think you are right, Congressman. I just wanted to make it clear for the record that if at any time, for reasons that we cannot see now, there should be a shortage of water in the Snake River, the domestic and irrigation uses would have a prior right.

Representative WHITE. If the amendment that I propose is adopted, I think it will improve the situation. It failed to carry in the House, but I am again offering it to the Senate. Let us follow the provisions of our State constitution and give preference to domestic use first, irrigation next, industry and navigation next, and power last.

I am going to take the time of the committee, if you will bear with me, to read a resolution and my answer thereto, for the record. There is a good deal of agitation, and the people do not understand the situation.

I am in receipt of this resolution from one of the irrigation districts, located in the district which I have the honor to represent, where the farming section is mostly irrigated lands. I am here to look out for them and protect their interest as a Member of Congress with the responsibility of representing my district and also as chairman of the irrigation district for reclamation. With me reclamation comes first.

This resolution reads as follows [reading]:

"RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY PIONEER IRRIGATION DISTRICT MAY 2, 1944

"Whereas this district consists of approximately 35,000 acres of agricultural lands, 25,000 of which, as well as many other thousands of acres of land in Idaho which are now being irrigated, are badly in need of supplemental water; and

"Whereas there are approximately 6,000,000 acre-feet of water annually wasted down Snake River and out of Idaho which will eventually be used to reclaim and bring under cultivation many thousands of acres of new land, as well as provide additional supplemental water for the lands already in cultivation; and

"Whereas H. R. 3961 (which is an omnibus river and harbor bill) authorizes the construction of dams numbered 1, 4, 7, and 10 and open-channel improvement for purposes of navigation and irrigation on Snake River, and Umatilla Dam on Columbia River for navigation, power development, and irrigation purposes, in each case in accordance with House Document No. 705, Seventy-fifth Congress, with such modification as the Secretary of War may find advisable after consultation with the Secretary of the Interior and such other other agencies as may be concerned; and

"Whereas many legal and engineering authorities on water law have studied the contents and purposes of H. R. 3931, and have expressed the opinion that the bill as now proposed will give a prior right to the downstream interests for navigation and power to the waters of Snake River and its tributaries and shut off the possibility of utilizing the waters of Snake River and its tributaries for the development of the State of Idaho; and

"Whereas said bill also contains a clause giving the Secretary of War such broad authority as might seriously affect the interests of southern Idaho, the wording of such clause being, 'with such modification as the Secretary of War may find advisable': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by Pioneer irrigation district that we do urge that said H. R. 3931 be so amended as to provide that the use of water for domestic, irrigation, mining, and industrial purposes shall not be adversely affected thereby, and that said bill be further amended so as to adequately protect and guarantee forever the right to the necessary use of the streams flowing through Idaho, and especially Snake River and its tributaries, for the above purposes within the State of Idaho; be it further

"Resolved, That we urge that the clause authorizing the Secretary of War 'to make modifications as he may deem advisable' be so amended as not to jeopardize the right to the use of the waters in Idaho above referred to; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Honorable Secretary of War, the Honorable Secretary of the Interior, the Idaho congressional delegation and the Governor of the state of Idaho."

I answered that as follows [reading]:

MAY 15, 1944.

Mr. J. O. BAUM,
President, Pioneer Irrigation District,
Caldwell, Idaho.

DEAR MR. BAUM: The support and assistance of the members of the Pioneer irrigation district of the efforts of the Members of the Idaho congressional delegation to have inserted in the rivers and harbors bill an amendment to safeguard and protect the waters of the Snake River and its tributaries for irrigation as expressed in the resolution that accompanied your letter of May 8 is greatly appreciated, and will be of great assistance in presenting the matter to the Members of the Senate when the bill comes up for consideration. The amendment to the bill that we have prepared, and will submit to the Senate committee in charge of this legislation, is exactly in line with the provisions of the Idaho State Constitution—establishing priorities for the beneficial use of waters in the State of Idaho. The amendment to be offered follows:

"In connection with dams or works herein or hereafter authorized, any use for the maintenance of a navigable channel of the waters of any stream or tributary thereof shall be subordinate to and shall not interfere with any use of such waters for domestic, irrigation, mining, or industrial purposes heretofore or hereafter established under State law."

In safeguarding the waters of Idaho streams for irrigation and development of new irrigation districts, we must not neglect the development of our State's vast resources of raw materials dependent on improving our main river—the Snake—below Lewiston to provide cheap transportation by navigation to tidewater which can be done without taking a drop of water out of the Snake River that can be used above Lewiston for irrigation. It is unthinkable that the waters of the Salmon and the Clearwater Rivers in Idaho, and the Malheur, the Imnaha, the John Day, and the Grande Ronde Rivers on the Oregon side draining a precipitous mountain section in Oregon and Idaho on either side of the Snake River should be permitted forever to run away unused to the sea; and Idaho resources should remain inaccessible and unused, and Idaho industries remain undeveloped by our failure to improve this river for navigation in order to gratify the selfish few who would profit to Idaho's everlasting disadvantage.

Central Idaho, with its Snake, Salmon, and Clearwater River Basins with all its vast resources of mineral, timber, and water power is the making of a second Pittsburgh industrial district.

We must not let those interested in competing transportation systems mislead us on the false proposition that deepening the Snake River from Lewiston to the Columbia by the construction of dams to retard river's flow and provide river navigation would interfere with irrigation upstream in Idaho

This fact is clearly presented in the enclosed copy of telegram from the district Army engineer, Ralph A. Tudor:

"PORTLAND, OREG.

"Representative COMPTON I. WHITE, M. C.,
"House of Representatives, Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, Washington, D. C.:

"Reference is made to your request for further data on stream flow on lower Snake River. Records at Weiser for the period of 1930 to 1940, inclusive, show low flow to be approximately 6,600 cubic feet per second; 90 percent of time flow exceeds 8,500 cubic feet per second; and 75 percent of time it exceeds 10,000 cubic feet per second. At Riparia low flow is 11,000 cubic feet per second; 90 percent of time flow exceeds 15,200 cubic feet per second; and 75 percent of time it exceeds 18,300 cubic feet per second. Flow required to provide slack-water navigation when all dams are built will be less than 1,000 cubic feet per second. Either the Clearwater or Salmon Rivers provide at all times flow in excess of this minimum amount."

We must not forget that the Army engineers have constructed and are successfully operating the great hydroelectric and navigation project at Bonneville. What they have done at Bonneville can be done in constructing and operating the navigation dams on the Snake River below Lewiston without in any way interfering with the use of Snake River waters upstream for irrigation.

Let me assure you, as your Representative, that I propose to support legislation that will fully protect the use of the waters of Idaho streams for irrigation and reclamation.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE, M. C.

I would like to say to the committee, further, that the Army engineers have a long, successful record for improving the Mississippi River. One of the first things that was done by the Government to improve navigation on the Mississippi, as I recall when a boy, was that because of the shifting currents changing the channels they had to have a special pilot between New Orleans and the Gulf, and the Army engineers built the Eads Jetty, a long revetment that narrowed the channel and made navigation up to New Orleans easy. From then on when all these problems arose over the country the Army engineers have been the forefront of the Government in handling the problems.

When the Bonneville Dam was to be built it was entrusted to the Army engineers. One of the first things they had to do was to provide for navigation. They built a lock there; and I never heard a word raised against it when they were talking about building a lock in there. I never heard it said when it had to be so deep and the depth of water was specified that it was going to be a draft on the waters upstream and that it could not be built because it might interfere with irrigation. I never heard a word about that.

There was a great barrier on the Columbia River—The Dalles, a place where the Indians went to catch salmon that leaped over the falls. They are catching them there yet, by treaty right. The Government had to build a canal to get navigation around The Dalles. I never heard that that canal was a draft on the water up the stream and that we might not be able to irrigate some day because they had to have a canal to bring traffic around The Dalles.

I do not see why, with all the water we have in the Columbia River coming in from the States of Oregon and Idaho, we should stop progress and stop the development of the United States and leave these vast resources of timber owned by Uncle Sam, if you please, while we are appropriating thousands of dollars every year to support and administer—that we must leave all these resources locked up; that we must leave this material in the hills that will make railroad ties for the rest of the world; leave the lodgepole pine standing on every hillside for miles and miles. We could treat those poles and make railroad ties, pulp, plastic, and so forth.

Some day the Northwest is going to be one of the greatest industrial sections in the United States.

I thank the committee.

Senator MILLIKIN. I was very much interested in your statement about the priority that irrigation and domestic consumptive use should have, and I am in hearty approval of it. I think I should bring to your attention the fact that the record shows that the Army has testified that if we construct these initial dams, while they are in existence it will require 15,000 second-feet of water during the navigation season, and not until the full project is completed will it be reduced down to 1,000 second-feet.

Representative WHITE. You refer to these dams. I still insist, if there is going to be a shortage of water to carry the navigation or a shortage of water to irrigate—and they are both problematical—irrigation should take preference.

These folks are taking a long-range look when they are raising the issue here, because they are talking about some future plan to use water. As a matter of fact, the Bureau of Reclamation has a very comprehensive program for the utilization of the water, to irrigate new lands, not of the Snake River but the tributaries. We have three great rivers coming into the Snake River in the vicinity of the city of Boise. We have the Boise River, the Payette River, and the Weiser. The waters of each one of those rivers are being utilized. The fact is that the principal source of supply for irrigation in the Boise Valley is out of the Boise River. We have Arrow Rock Dam, and we are now building the Anderson Ranch Dam.

Now permit me to digress just a moment with reference to the latter dam. That is a project that has been proposed for a long time for supplemental water. We have changed our system of cropping in the irrigation districts of Idaho. When we first built these projects it was in order to have water in the early growing season. We never thought much about water in the later seasons. But when the sugar factories came in and we got into the growing of sugar beets, and the creameries came in and we produced milk and butter, we found that late irrigation was almost as essential and important as early irrigation to raise the ordinary crops, because the alfalfa in the summer is taken off and the land has to be used in the fall for pasture, and it has to have water on it or pasture will dry up. The sugar beet just has to have water at the time that sugar forms. If it does not get water at the right time, you will have a short sugar crop. So there has been a great deal of agitation for supplemental water; and they mean just what they are talking about—they mean more water at a later period of the year. These districts use up their storage along about the middle of August to September and October, and frost does not come until pretty late out there, and they are short of water. We had two or three sites to provide storage of supplemental water. There is one place called Garden Valley on the Payette River. We had a place on the Boise River called Twin Springs. We overcame a lot of difficulty and got the President to O. K. the budget and got a million dollars to start at Twin Springs, and the Bureau even took off $100,000 of our appropriation for some laboratory tests. I never could understand how they spent that amount of money just for laboratory tests, but they did it; so our appropriation was reduced that much.

But the Army engineers came in under a new arrangement. It was not done by law but by some kind of a voluntary cooperative arrangement between the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation engineers, and they looked the whole situation over and said, "Gentlemen, we have found a better site." Instead of Twin Springs that had been surveyed and even laboratory-tested by the Bureau of Reclamation, the Army engineers came in and showed them a better way. They went to another site and bought another place, which is called Anderson Ranch. We have that project about half done.

The credit for finding more capacity and a better place goes to the Army engineers, even when we are dealing with the Bureau of Reclamation. So the Army engineers have not been, in Idaho, as I see it, an obstruction to our progress. They have helped us.

Senator MILLIKIN. I think that in fairness I should bring to your attention the fact that they have said that during the navigation season they would take 15,000 second-feet and it has been indicated that that would seriously injure irrigation.

Representative WHITE. Now, would it? Would it take water from present projects or water from potential projects? That is the first thing we should settle. We will soon be getting supplemental water from Anderson Ranch. The main contention is that by building these Snake River dams we will make a draft or establish a priority on water that might be used for future development.

We do have a tremendous irrigation project at Mountain Home. The Bureau of Reclamation have made very comprehensive surveys. I never heard very much about bringing the water out of the Snake River. Their plan is to redistribute the water from these three tributary rivers. In the first place, they will divert as much water from the Weiser River as they can spare. They will use that water and release water from the Payette River and divert that water to the Boise River Basin. That plan is already being undertaken at the Cascade project now, to put the Payette water through the divide and get a 250-foot fall going over to Boise, and then they will release the Boise water and bring some water from the head of the Salmon River and Red Fish Lake through the divide to irrigate this tremendously big plain between Boise and Mountain Home. But that does not say anything about lifting water and pumping it up out of the Snake River.

One of the Senators from my State spoke of diverting all the water of the Snake River for irrigation now running down to the sea without being put to use. Every time I cross the Snake River and see all the water that is running away to the sea, I think that our Senator has a long way to go yet before he stops this water from running away to the sea and putting it on the land. It is a grand proposition; but there will always be enough return flow and enough water out of these tributaries, and there will be enough water to give Idaho products transportation out to the seacoast and out to the world you know most of this material owned by Uncle Sam.

Senator MILLIKIN. I offer for the record, Mr. Chairman, a letter dated April 8, 1944, from General Robins to Senator THOMAS, which confirms the facts which I have just stated to Congressman WHITE.

Senator OVERTON. That will be inserted in the record at this point.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, April 8, 1944.

Hon. JOHN THOMAS,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Reference is made to your letter dated March 24, 1944, concerning the item contained in H. R. 3961 now under consideration by the Senate providing for authorization of construction of four dams and open channel improvement in the Snake River in accordance with the plans submitted in House Document No. 704, Seventy-fifth Congress, third session. You point out that the district engineer at Portland, Oreg., recently informed Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE, Representative in Congress, that a flow of only 1,000 cubic feet per second will be required to provide slack-water navigation after all the dams are built, and you ask that you be advised as to the number of cubic feet of water per second that will be required for navigation purposes between Lewiston and the mouth of the Snake River after dams Nos. 1, 4, 7, and 10 only have been constructed, together with the open channel improvements as proposed in the bill.

Under the coordinated plan presented in House Document No. 704, Seventy-fifth Congress, third session, for improvement of the stretch of the Snake River between the mouth and Lewiston to provide a controlling depth of 6 feet by means of a series of four locks and dams supplemented by open channel work, indications are from studies made at that time (p. 38, par. 86) that a flow of 15,000 cubic feet per second would generally be required during the navigation season. During extreme low flow (10,600 cubic feet per second) a depth of 5 feet would be available. As pointed out in the district engineer's telegram to Congressman WHITE, the flow of the Snake River at Riparia, Wash. (approximately midway between the mouth and Lewiston) exceeds 15,200 cubic feet per second about 90 percent of the time. The proposed 4 locks and dams contemplated in House Document 704 would be so located as to improve the river sections that cannot be adequately improved by open-river methods, and they are but the first step toward the ultimate development of slack-water navigation throughout this reach of the Snake River, as presented in that document, which would require, either by a system of high dams or 10 low dams, a flow of less than 1,000 cubic feet per second for operation of the navigation project.

It is noted in your letter that the view is expressed that eventually all of the water of the Snake River and its tributaries will need to be diverted in southern Idaho to provide for domestic, irrigation, and industrial purposes. In this connection I feel confident that as the plan proposed for ultimate improvement of this river contemplates the slack-water system of navigation, which when completed will require a minimum of stream flow, the progressive development of this basin in the combined interests of navigation, irrigation, and related purposes can proceed under a well-planned and coordinated program without conflict and to the mutual benefit of all interests.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS M. ROBINS,
Major General,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

"MEMORANDA BY E. W. RISING

"It is very clearly shown in the above letter that there will be a conflict between navigation and the use of water for consumptive purposes in Snake River Basin above Lewiston, Idaho, for 10 percent of the time.

"During the low-water periods of August and September there will only be sufficient water to maintain a channel 5 feet in depth without drawing directly on upper-basin storage.

"An amendment to H. R. 3961, now under consideration by the Commerce Committee of the Senate, providing that consumptive uses of water for domestic, irrigation, power, and industrial purposes, shall not be affected adversely by demands of navigation is necessary, if additional diversions of water are to be made from the Snake River or its tributaries during the short-water months, for purposes of providing a supplemental water supply for lands now under irrigation or for lands under a new project."

Congressman WHITE. I asked the engineers if they could verify what the Tudor district engineer said in his telegram about the Clearwater and Salmon Rivers being enough. I would like to have that appear in the record at this point.

General ROBINS. I think the figures given to Congressman WHITE at Portland, Oreg., were put into the record.

Senator OVERTON. Would there be a lack of water for irrigation purposes?

General ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator MILLIKIN. Those figures indicate the difficulties which have just been referred to, General?

General ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator OVERTON. In other words, there is sufficient water, if these five dams are built on the Snake River, to take care of irrigation and navigation?

General ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERTON. I think the mayor of Walla Walla confirms your statement, too, Mr. WHITE.

Representative WHITE. This information is from the district engineer at Portland, who has actual charge of the district, and he is the highest authority that we could get in that connection. It is such a big subject and so tremendously important to the whole Nation that I could not content myself without getting that information.

Senator MILLIKIN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask General Robins, now, whether the comments that have just been made would influence or modify the conclusions of that letter, which I now hand to General Robins?

Representative WHITE. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Bashore is here, and he and I have worked pretty close together. He is the Commissioner of Reclamation. I wonder if he would care to comment on what I said, and bear out my statement.

Senator OVERTON. Very well. We will be glad to have Mr. Bashore make a statement.

STATEMENT OF HARRY W. BASHORE, COMMISSIONER, BUREAU OF RECLAMATION, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR—Recalled

Mr. BASHORE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I believe that Congressman WHITE has stated the case for navigation and irrigation very well. It all resolves down to this issue, it seems to me, that we believe that irrigation should take precedence, should be respected, in the planning of these river channels and improvements, and if that protection is afforded, apparently everybody will be happy.

The plan proposed by the Engineer Corps is, in my opinion, defective only in that it does not include enough dams to provide slack-water navigation in the Snake. We all realize the tremendous importance of navigation in that Northwest region. Congressman WHITE has very eloquently and completely expressed the importance. It is certainly one system that it is very important to the country to have, and it is not difficult to maintain.

I do not believe that I can add anything in the way of clarification to Congressman WHITE's very complete statement.

Senator OVERTON. Do you agree with Congressman WHITE's statement, reinforced by the reports of the engineer and the statement of General Robins, and, according to my recollection this morning, the statement of the mayor of Walla Walla, that there will be sufficient water for both irrigation and navigation with these five dams constructed on the Snake River?

Mr. BASHORE. I believe that I could not go quite that far, Mr. Chairman. If the Congress stops with the five dams and does nothing further, there may come a time, there very probably will come a time, in the history of this country, when there will be a shortage of water for both uses; but if Congress goes ahead with the full plan which the Engineer Corps has in mind, then you will have slack-water navigation which will require only an inconsequential amount of water.

Senator OVERTON. But as the situation exists today, there is sufficient water for both purposes?

Mr. BASHORE. As it exists today, irrigation as presently developed has not had to make any releases for navigation.

Senator OVERTON. So there is sufficient water for both purposes?

Mr. BASHORE. As it exists today.

Senator OVERTON. When you consider the irrigation as it exists today, and the navigation contemplated by the construction of the five dams?

Mr. BASHORE. At least, sir, I can say this much, that the irrigation interests have not been handicapped in the construction of a navigation channel on the Snake and Columbia by being called upon to release water for the purpose of navigation.

Senator OVERTON. All right, sir.

Representative WHITE. Thank you.

Senator MILLIKIN. Mr. Chairman, may I now ask General Robins whether the contribution of the Clearwater River is reflected in the conclusions of this letter?

Major General ROBINS. Yes, sir; that letter tells about the stream flow in the river below.

Senator MILLIKIN. After making the contribution of the Clearwater?

Major General ROBINS. The flow that exists, below.

Senator OVERTON. I do not know that I can understand it—in fact, I have never seen the letter. Can you explain if there is any discrepancy between the letter and your present statement, and, if so, what it is.

Senator MILLIKIN. It is a short letter, suppose you read it.

Major General ROBINS. There are no discrepancies, Senator.

Senator OVERTON. Do you agree with that, now Senator MILLIKIN, that there is no discrepancy between the letter and General Robins' present statement?

Senator MILLIKIN. Yes. The general has cleared up in my mind the question that I wanted settled, whether the Clearwater was adding a contribution that took away the significance of this letter, or whether this letter reflects the contribution of the Clearwater; and the general has said that it reflects the contribution of the Clearwater.

Senator OVERTON. I see. All right.

Senator MILLIKIN. The net effect would be that it requires 15,000 second-feet of water during the navigation season, under the four-dam project, and it would only require 1,000, under the complete project.

Representative WHITE. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest a simple amendment, providing no call would ever be made upon irrigation storage upstream to release water for navigation downstream of these dams? Would such an amendment as that correct the situation?

Senator OVERTON. That would be a matter to be gone into.

Senator ROBERTSON. Would you also include the Missouri River project in that, Congressman, so you would get another supporter?

Representative WHITE. We have more water coming into the Snake than can possibly be used for irrigation anywhere else. We are in the clear on this question of taking water away from reclamation, because we have got water that cannot possibly be used for that, on both sides of the river.

Senator OVERTON. I asked Colonel Feringa to give me the cost of all of the dams in the ultimate plan on Snake River, and he has that information available.

STATEMENT OF COL. PETER A. FERINGA, RESIDENT MEMBER OF THE BOARD FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS

Colonel FERINGA. The total first cost of the 10 dams in the Snake is estimated at $58,625,000. That does not include power installation. The cost of the four dams, which are included in that total cost which I have just given, is $30,200,000. The whole project, including the four dams now in the bill, not including the electric-generating machinery, is $58,625,000. Those figures are from old records not in the printed record, because we only talked about the first step in the project document.

Senator CORDON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the Colonel——

Senator OVERTON. One moment. Do the four dams include the power installations?

Colonel FERINGA. No, sir; those do not. I can give you the cost of installing power at three of those dams, which are the only ones we feel now should have power installed.

Senator OVERTON. Very well; suppose you do that.

Colonel FERINGA. The power installation at three of the dams, for which we have the figures, amounts to $19,000,000.

Senator CORDON. Is that three of the four dams?

Colonel FERINGA. Three of the four dams.

Senator MILLIKIN. That is for three of the four dams?

Colonel FERINGA. Three of the four dams.

Senator MILLIKEN. The final project contemplates 10 dams, does it not?

Colonel FERINGA. That is right

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 21 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject of accident prevention in the United States delivered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] at the Film Safety Award Committee luncheon held in Washington, D. C., on June 8, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The eyes of every American are today on our armed forces in their crusade for liberation of Nazi-enslaved countries. Every eye is turned to the headlines for every fragment of invasion news. Every ear is alert to the radio. The heart of every person is with our fighting forces. The prayers of every man, woman, and child on the home front are with the sons and daughters of Uncle Sam as they wage a war we hoped would never come.

Our war aims are clear cut. Every weapon known to military science is being used to hasten victory. Fighting fire with fire, we hope to end for all times mass murders, mass brutalities and tyranny. Everyone looks forward to the day of a liberated world. Our Commander in Chief has told us that the price we must pay will be heavy. He has candidly told the American people that the way will be long and hard.

But there is more to be done on the home front than to merely wait and hope. Production of the implements of war and supplies for our fighting forces must be stepped up. Every citizen can be proud of the way we are backing the attack. We have much to be thankful for but we must do more than give thanks.

In no other country on the face of the globe can a meeting such as this be held. It is living evidence that men and women with vision are concerned with wartime accidents. Yet, our record since Pearl Harbor is not a source of pride. We naturally expect battle losses and battle casualties. But we should not expect that the tools and supplies of war should be held up because of accidents due to carelessness.

But they are being held up due to just that. In 1943 for example, 480,000,000 man-days were lost to production throughout the United States because of accidents. We might have been much nearer Berlin and Tokyo and much nearer victory had these man-days not been lost.

In waging a war to liberate the world and make it free, we should also keep in mind that one vital part of freedom is safety.

Our Constitution pledges to every man "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Yet lives, many thousands of lives, are being snuffed out daily due to careless accidents. This tragic situation is a stain on our home front. It does not make for happiness.

What is the record? The War Production Board says that production must, from now on, be stepped up. It also says that the manpower situation is crucial. Yet, accidents last year represented a loss to the war effort of nearly 50,000 workers killed and 5,000,000 injured. The number of people injured approximates half the number of our armed forces at home and abroad. Surely, we cannot believe that our people are callous to the extent that they are not interested in this tragic problem.

Accidents have always been with us. Yet, the steady increase in the number is a sad thing to contemplate. Sometime ago the National Safety Council said that if the headlines screamed "the Nation's war-production machine to shut down 1 full week," it would shock the country. There has been no such headlines but there is a basis for the statement.

The growing shortage of productive manpower should be emphasized. In pre-war years it was generally considered that the only worker accidents which affected production were those that occurred on the job. Now, it is realized that production suffers almost as much from an off-the-job accident as from work accident—and that the two groups of workers' accidents form a large proportion of the national total of all accidents.

The occasion on which we are gathered here is to pay tribute and present a plaque to a motion-picture company—Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer—and Pete Smith for a very worthwhile contribution to the effort to halt accidents. This contribution took the form of a picture titled "The Seventh Column." The idea was inspired by the campaign to smash the seventh column—carelessness that causes accidents.

It reminds me that last November a colleague of mine in the Senate, JIM MEAD, of New York, inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very inspiring speech on the subject of accidents by Maj. Gen. T. A. Terry. In speaking of the smash-the-seventh-column campaign, Senator MEAD said:

"This campaign is in every respect unique. It is the outgrowth of a desire of an insurance company to render wartime service. Bennett Moore, vice president and director of public relations of the Liberty Mutual Insurance, of Boston, conceived the idea of terming accidents the 'Seventh Column.' The smash-the-seventh column slogan won Nation-wide attention, so much so that it has been supported by the War Departmen and has become a rallying cry for the safety movement. It is perhaps one of the best known of all wartime slogans—a slogan of public service."

I heartily concur with the statement made by Senator MEAD.

At a time when production is vital to winning the war, we naturally think first of accidents in war plants. They should be our first concern. Let's suppose we were notifying our fighting men abroad of the death and injuries of relatives in the same way that people at home are notified of war casualties. If we were doing this I shudder to think of the effect it would have on service morale.

As I have said before, in building toward a free world we must also build toward a safe nation. One serious phase of the problem is, of course, traffic accidents. It would naturally be assumed that with a decrease in the number of motor vehicles, with a decline in the use of cars, with a shortage of gasoline and tires, that motor accidents would drop off sharply. Yet, such is not the case. For the first few months of 1944, traffic accidents are running fully 15 percent above what they were during the same period a year ago. Certainly, we must think of this situation in planning for the post-war period. Speed limits will be raised. Many millions of men who are driving tanks and planes at full speed in the fury of battle will again take the wheel of cars on the highway. Automobiles that are being worn out will be replaced by new vehicles. We will have plenty of gasoline and plenty of tires.

This would be good news if it were not for the fact that with these things will come a swelling tide of accidents. Unless we move, and move quickly, to arouse public appreciation of the danger, we will have conditions at home that may in every respect be worse that the conditions abroad. That is a bold statement; yet, it is one which we should contemplate.

There is today before the Congress legislation designed to bring about a rebuilding of our important national highways. I have every confidence that when this legislation finally takes shape it will meet the obligation of the Federal Government to assist the States in making roads better and safer.

Early this year the President sent to the Congress a message relating to highways. In that message our Chief Executive said:

"On April 14, 1931, I appointed a committee, known as the National Interregional Highway Committee, to investigate the need for a limited system of national highways to improve the facilities now available for interregional transportation, and to advise the Federal Works Administrator as to the desirable character of such improvement and the possibility of utilizing some of the manpower and industrial capacity expected to be available at the end of the war.

"The committee, with the aid of a staff provided by the Public Roads Administration, made careful and extended studies of this subject, and has submitted its final report which I transmit herewith and commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress. The report recommends the designation and improvement to high standards of a national system of rural and urban highways totaling approximately 34,000 miles and interconnecting the principal geographical regions of the country.

"The recommended system follows in general the routes of Federal highways, and when fully improved will meet to optimum degree the needs of interregional and intercity highway transportation. Its development will also establish a transcontinental network of the modern roads essential to the future economic welfare and defense of the Nation."

I mention highways, because I firmly believe that the only way that we can combat the most tragic phase of our accident situation is to have roads that will make accidents virtually impossible under reasonable driving conditions. Unfortunately, our people are not alert to the importance of modernized roads. I know of no finer service that this group and groups like it can render in planning for the years ahead, than to bring safer roads.

I have talked about accidents because efforts to halt accidents is the theme of this important luncheon. It is a subject that is rather new for me, yet one I have long been concerned with. And I can assure you that as majority leader of the United States Senate, every bit of legislation that has its purposes to give the country better roads, safer traffic conditions, safer working conditions, and a better life, will have my wholehearted support.

There has been presented at this luncheon, the plaque to M. G. M. as I have mentioned. The motion-picture industry has rendered noble wartime service on many fronts. It has helped to arouse a high degree of patriotism. It has provided entertainment for our men and women in camps and on the fighting fronts. It has sent its stars into the battle zones to lift morale. In brief, the motion picture industry has met the wartime challenge. I have confidence that in many happy peace days certain to come, that industry will continue to be alert to peacetime service. Certainly, there is no better way that it could be rendered than to help make America safe.

Problems of the Post-war World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 21 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on June 9, the distinguished senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], who is chairman of the Special Committee on the Decentralization of Industry, spoke to a joint session of the California Legislature on problems of the post-war world. I ask unanimous consent that his address may be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The day is drawing close when we in this country must take on the most formidable, the most complex, and the most fateful task in our whole history. The task I mean is the task of reconversion; the job—the greatest we will have ever tackled—of rebuilding the peace.

Despite its many facets, each formidable in itself, the task of reconversion is in reality a single task. Its many parts are inextricably involved, the whole one and indivisible. The problems of maintaining employment can hardly be separated from the problem of foreign trade, nor can either or both be separated from our fundamental laws and traditions. The future of our system of free enterprise cannot be separated from the problem of international trade policy. The question of our prosperity and employment overlaps the question of a sound international monetary policy. The total national problem, on the other hand, is in reality a problem of regions, of States, of towns, farms, and villages. Should we fail to understand this, we would run the danger of involving ourselves in serious difficulties, perhaps very grave difficulties, from the start.

My duties in the Senate, in particular, my position as chairman of the Committee To Investigate the Effect of Centralization of Heavy Industry, have provided me with many opportunities to study the problem in detail. There are the international problems, trade and monetary, that were unsolved when the war broke—that were, in many ways, contributing causes to the conditions that brought the war about. There are the national problems that were still unsolved when the war involved us. There are all of these problems still unsolved and further aggravated by the war. There are the new problems created by the war. There are the still unrealized problems, which we must anticipate, that will arise as we tackle the job of rehabilitation. The trouble with running away from problems is that it is worse than futile. The problems not only catch up with you; they multiply and grow while they pursue you. They gang up on you, too.

We are approaching a critical point, not only in our own, but in the world's history. There can be no further running away.

Early in July 1943, in view of the many problems, both war and post-war, that were crowding upon us, I wrote letters to 55 Senators, suggesting that a Senate bloc be formed to foster new and expanded facilities for the production of iron and steel in areas outside the acknowledged steel centers. That's the way the centralization committee began. You have no idea how complex the matter has become since. I know whereof I speak when I say that you cannot separate our post-war problems in watertight compartments. Later in October 1943, some 30 Senators and from 50 to 75 Members of the House met in caucus to discuss a program of general industrial decentralization. At this meeting, steering committees of 7 Members from each House were set up. On December 21, the resolution was approved by the Senate, setting up the special Senate committee to investigate industrial centralization.

Shortly, as our work expanded, and we began to perceive more clearly the great complexities in the picture, we set up a special subcommittee to establish and maintain cooperation with State planning boards and other such State and local agencies, both official and unofficial.

I have sketched this brief history for you so that you will understand that my colleagues and I in the Senate have been prying into the problems of reconversion both deeply and broadly. We know the facts. We are familiar with the needs and the difficulties. We have pondered long over remedies. I can assure you that we mean to act, too; that we are very active already.

Speaking from my knowledge of the problems that lie ahead of us, it is my conviction that, far more than the war, the task of reconversion is going to put our democracy, our understanding of it and our faith in it, to the supreme test.

Dangerous pitfalls mark our path. One of these pitfalls against which we must guard is the pitfall of carrying over the war-mood into the problem of peace.

At the beginning of this war we had the impressive experience of discovering that a peace psychology, no matter how adequate to the tasks of peace, fell short, at times almost disastrously short, of the tasks demanded by and imposed by the business of war. Let us not forget this experience in reverse.

War, even among democratic peoples, is a totalitarian interlude. It is a necessity of limited duration, a hateful but necessary job that demands and justifies the suspension of individual planning, of many individual liberties, and raises maximum individual sacrifice rather than individual liberty and well being, to the heights of the greatest social ideal. War has the effect of creating the psychological mood essential for its success—the mood that has for its motive the suspension of all but the military considerations.

This necessary mood, this heroic but collectivist mood, is not the normal mood of this Nation. It is not the mood in which this Nation has achieved its strength, its greatness, and its wealth. We cannot regard it as more than a necessary interlude.

Yet, as you well know, there are those among us who are so enamored of this mood that they would attempt, and definitely mean to attempt, to carry it into the period of peace. Such a peace would be a military peace, a peace of barracks and totalitarian discipline. It would be a peace that would forever destroy the foundations of our democracy, of our constitutional government, of our vital liberties.

We must guard against this mood, which will tempt us strongly because the problems of reconversion, of reconstruction, will be so complex and so trying, and we must be on guard against the men who advocate that we turn to the building of the peace in this mood. These men would cost us the peace.

Because the problem is so complex, the temptation is very strong to pass the whole thing along to the Federal Government. It is a little late to speak merely of the temptation. This trend has already gained a dangerous head start. Should all our States, and all our cities, and all our towns lump their problems together and drop the whole thing in the lap of the Federal Government—incidentally in the very willing and receptive laps of our bureaucrats—the result will be a total problem of such magnitude and complexity that any attempt to cope with it must result in an administrative colossus which we will be unable to control by law. Moreover, the process of government will be made so complex that it will become impossible for the average citizen intelligently to participate in it. The process of government will be removed from the people and the process of administration from all possibility of regulation and control by law.

The trend to centralization, economic and industrial as well as political, constitutes today the greatest menace to democracy. The parallel trend to centralize the reconversion problem, if it is not checked, will provide the favorable conditions for the total and fatal subversion of our democratic form of government. I feel it is my solemn duty to warn you that should the reconversion problem be left overwhelmingly to the Federal Government, the result will be a Federal apparatus that will prove fatal to the position of the State governments and the whole question of States' rights.

This is one reason why I deplore a certain indulgence by many well-meaning Americans—an indulgence that has become too fashionable. I mean those Americans who come to Washington with their prayer rugs and prepared exhortations, as if Washington were not simply the seat of a democratic government but the sacred temple of an ancient oracle. They come to Washington, or turn toward it, and then with breast beatings and loud incantations, plead that the oracle offer some indication about the future of this, and the future of that, problem. Already, you see, even amidst the great democratic process of a national election, the people, in their increasing anxiety, look less to themselves and more and more to the exalted and unapproachable political Mount Olympus on the Potomac.

I deplore this trend because it is unworthy of a democratic people and because it is altogether too symptomatic of the threatening decadence of democracy in our midst. I deplore it again because it is so fatuous. Let me give you an inside tip. There is no oracle there.

True, gentlemen, the Federal Government's hand in the problem of reconversion, as a result of the sheer mechanics of centralization for one reason, as a result of bureaucratic willfulness for another—the Federal Government's hand is already heavy, very heavy, and endowed with revolutionary power. We would be blind to shut our eyes to this fact. The businessman and the farmer would be blind, indeed, if they, concerned about the future, did not show a proper appreciation of this power.

But there's every reason why this power should not be increased.

Let us stop our process of self-mystification. Let us turn to the task we face with a degree of common sense. Our task is to take an economy that has been radically expanded and altered by the uneconomic demands of an emergency situation and put it back on the tracks of sound economic law and the practices consistent with our system of free enterprise.

First of all, emergency measures will be required to carry us through the transitional period. Factories cannot stop producing tanks one day and start producing automobiles or toasters the next. It is as clear as day, facing these emergency measures, that the State governments have easier access to information as to what will be required. Have easier access to information; and can do the job with a simpler apparatus; can do it without necessitating a duplication of the state apparatus in Washington, which will have to be done if the whole problem is to be handled from Washington. Beyond the question of efficiency, there is the basic democratic question—the right of the States, of the people in each State, to determine for themselves what they wish to do, and how.

Much of the problem that each State will face is the result of a national policy dictated by national necessity. A degree of national responsibility cannot be evaded. This national responsibility speaks for a national policy that would equalize the economic burden of the emergency period. Coordination, where coordination is required, and equalization, as the conditions dictate, should be the maximum of Federal participation. I am not arguing against men, against individuals in Washington or elsewhere. I am arguing for efficiency, for simplicity, for democratic procedure.

Obviously, gentlemen, this battle cannot be fought effectively from Washington. My colleagues in the Senate and I have never hesitated to do all in our power to check the tread to centralization and to government by willful men instead of government by law. But ultimately the issue must be decided by the State governments. The problems cannot be evaded. Either you will solve them, thus avoiding the necessity for excessive centralization of power in a body that is furthest removed from the life of the people and from popular control, or the Federal Government will have to solve them. We can put the issue before you. We can call your attention to the dangers. We cannot do more than that. The problems must be solved. The debate is bound to become a little academic if the problems remain unsolved while the State governments sleep.

I speak again from experience when I say that we in the Senate are not suffering from a shortage of plans. My point is not that we cannot do the planning. Alas, one well-meaning fool can devise more plans for the cure of all human ills and the solution of all our pressing problems than all the wise men since the beginning of time could successfully carry out, even if they were granted an eternity of time.

There are a lot of workable plans if you are willing to allow our Government the exalted role of shepherd and the American people the simple and cure-all status of a flock of sheep.

Again, let us take a common-sense view of one large aspect of the reconversion problem, an aspect that has tremendous long-range implications.

Three-fifths of the area of this country lying west of the Mississippi accounts for only one-fifth of the national population. This area accounts for at least half of the minerals mined in this country. It has by far the largest reserves of untapped mineral resources. It has enormous reserves of the strategic minerals of which we found ourselves short at the beginning of the war, and which are so vital to all the new processes. It possesses three-quarters of the potential water power of this country. Its timber and sea resources are fantastically large. Yet this area, this empire with its enormous wealth and potentialities, larger than India, as large as Europe excluding Russia, accounts for only one-fifth of our population, only one-fifth.

Everything argues for the intelligent development of this area, including reasons of national security. Our security in the Pacific demands a larger population in the Western States, demands more industry, more agriculture. The story of Soviet Russia's resistance might have been far different if Russia had made our mistake, had left Siberia undeveloped, had made Siberia economically and militarily dependent upon western and European Russia.

In addition to the question of our national security, the question of a better balanced and less centralized economy also demands the development of the West. A larger urban population in the West would open new prospects to the agricultural States of the Middle West, would prove a boon to eastern industries, too.

Finally no other single prospect has so much to offer for the solution to the total post-war economic problem.

The West offers new prospects and new opportunities to millions of people who have reached the zenith of their hopes and possibilities in the overcrowded and overdeveloped East. A pronounced westward movement of population would set the industries of the East humming by creating a maximum demand for durable goods, producers' goods, and consumers' goods. The over-all picture, excluding the West, would lead us to the conclusion that we have already overexpanded. But, on the other hand, think of what would happen should 10,000,000 new settlers be attracted to the West. Think of the demand for housing, power, transportation, household goods, electrical appliances. On the basis of studies and surveys made by the centralization committee, I venture to say that an intelligent policy of developing the West would open to this whole country a new era of prosperity and would go far to add much needed stability to our national economy.

Such a policy toward the West—a policy dictated by our national security and our national economy—would immediately create new opportunities for transforming savings and deposits into active and profit-making investments. It would open to millions of workers in the East, and to their families, new opportunities for a healthier life. The density of population in the Western States is roughly about 12 to the square mile. Compare this with 675 to the square mile in Rhode Island, which practically equals the density of the population of Java, the world's most densely populated country. Compare our 12 to the square mile with New Jersey's 553 and Connecticut's 550. New York State has a density of population of 281 against China's 104 to the square mile.

I am emphasizing the common-sense approach. Are we lacking in opportunity? We have a whole new empire to build. We can at once increase our wealth, provide prosperity, stimulate industry, create employment, and at the same time relieve some of the dreadful congestion of the East.

But, gentlemen, don't be optimistic. As soon as we pose this problem as a national problem and attempt to handle it from Washington, you have the opposition of the East. The East has never understood the West. You know that. It is not a theme that I have to develop at great length. All the energy of the East will be devoted to depriving you of the war industries you have acquired. I cite this to point out once again that centralization does not make for simplicity but confusion and contradiction. Centralization does not make for efficiency but only for selfish bungling. Lump all of our problemes into one and the very balance of power resulting from the now unbalanced distribution of population and wealth tends in the direction of accentuating all of the evils of excessive concentration of population and industry on the one hand and those of the arrested development of our vital and rich areas on the other. Centralize this problem and you place it within the hands of our vested interests.

The development of the West is a real opportunity. It is an opportunity that touches the imagination. New industries, new businesses, new enterprises, new opportunities for professional people, would provide a salutory blood-bank for our system of free enterprise. It would strengthen its popular base. It would be refreshed and invigorated with new blood and a new optimism. But to realize this opportunity the States themselves will have to go into action. The Western States must individually and collectively take over the task of preparing the ground, preparing the plan, and mobilizing for the job.

I have pointed cut that the State governments are the logical and the proper agencies to handle the emergency problems of reconversion. I want to point out as well that the long-range problems can be handled best and most directly by the State governments. The opportunities offered by the development of the West is one instance. There are opportunities in the South, too. The South is industrially underdeveloped for its population. The Southern States have a density of population of some 50 to the square mile, which is above the national average of 44 to the square mile. The Southern States do not need more people. They need more industries.

The Southern States need and are entitled to a fairer share of the national income. The Western and the Southern States are allies; we have a common cause, a national cause, the cause of a healthier and more equitable economy, the cause of the Nation's prosperity versus the cause of vested selfish interest. We are allies, but here again, to be intelligent and effective allies, the Southern States must develop their problem and present it in terms of their resources, their potentialities, while we must present our problem in terms of our own resources and potentialities. We can serve each other, serve a great common cause; but we can serve each other effectively and intelligently only if we avoid lumping our problems in a national stew, but, instead, work to help each other with each other's clear, specific, individual problems.

What I mean to say holds good for the whole Nation. You cannot lump together the problems of California, of Nevada, of Alabama, of New York, and Kentucky, and arrive at anything like a common problem. If you cannot have a common problem you cannot have a common solution. Where a common solution is impossible, the centralization of the whole complex of problems is unreasonable and impractical.

California and Nevada are neighbors. But you in California have already a sufficient density of population to make possible the development of mass-production industries. We in Nevada cannot approach our problems on that base. We have no such population. Your further development will help us. Nevertheless our problems are individual. We can work together, we must work together, but we cannot make our problem one. We may have common objectives but we have not got common instruments and common problems.

Now, gentlemen, nobody in the world is more competent than you to deal with the problems of the State of California. Nobody in the world is closer to the people of this great State or more familiar with their needs and their desires.

I do not hesitate to say the same for the government of every State of this Union. If these State governments have hesitated to take aggressive action it is because they have been so intimidated by the political processes of the past decade that they do not know where they stand.

I know the many objections. Yes; there is the problem of revenue. I say to you, stake your claim, get to work on the problem, make your intentions clear, and then fight for the means. Start the work, have something to show to back your argument, and you will find, I assure you, that you have more friends in Washington than you know.

I would like to strengthen my argument why the reconversion job should be taken over largely by the States, with the assistance of the local governments, by pointing out a few practical details.

In the work of the centralization committee, we discovered that we needed accurate information on the population shifts that have occurred since the war. You have no idea what a complicated and round-about job it is to get such information in Washington. The best that you can get is only an appropximation. You cannot very well estimate the needs and problems of regions and States if your estimates of the population, one way or the other, are off by a million or two, or perhaps even more.

It would be much simpler for the States—if they shared in the responsibility—to take the time off to get these very important figures and get them right. I'm stressing this simple problem because, while it may appear very simple in itself, it is an important ingredient in the whole solution. There are hundreds of such simple problems, each raising the same point in question.

To study the problem we must have accurate information on industries and resources and transportation and population, not merely in each State, but almost in each county, city, and town. And when we do get this information, through the maze of researchers and agencies, it is dead information. It lacks the vitality and the impulse of life, of interest. The vital force is lacking. We have the information, but not the living interest, the vitality, the vision that must be brought into the picture if our plans for the reconversion is to be responsive to living men and moving and progressive interests.

There are other and very important problems behind the reconversion problem that cannot be lumped together. There is the question of what is to be done about the practice of bleeding States of their resources without permitting the people of these States the opportunity to add to their natural wealth by processing or manufacturing. This is one of the core problems as regards the future of many States in the West and the South.

It would take me days to exhaust the list of problems that have come up in the work of the centralization committee—problems that can be handled better, more directly, and with less trouble and cost by the State governments.

Gentlemen, let us call a halt to the rhetorical invocations to Washington to reveal its hand. This very pleasant but almost useless pastime has been carried so far that a man can almost make his political reputation by simply standing up and addressing a few commonplace questions to the Federal Government. This is nothing but a form of procrastination. I say to you, Take over, before you are taken over.

If the Washington branch of the new international bureaucracy is to handle the whole problem for the Nation, then, I assure you, it will wait, and very smartly so, until the confusion is so great, and the situation so critical, that there will be little opposition to whatever it chooses to do. They can wait. The question is, Can we?

I speak to you as one who is up to his ears in the problem. Vanity might tempt me to say to you, Leave it to me and my colleagues. You have nothing to worry about. All you have to do is work, sacrifice, fight, pay taxes. We'll take care of the rest. Truth, however, leads me to advise you to take over. Take over without delay.

Every town and every city should have its own plan. All of these plans should be coordinated, integrated as much as possible, by the State governments. Each State should have its own plan and should look to its own apparatus for the execution of the plan. Where economic interests overlap, regional committees should be set up by the States. Study your problems, decide what you want, organize yourself for the task, complete your regional organizations as quickly as possible, and be prepared to make your wishes recognized.

Some very important questions may remain unanswered for a time to come. Let us not be deterred or confused by questions which are made to appear important, even crucial, and which really are not. I mean such questions as the renegotiation of contracts.

There is not a single question before the people today in itself of sufficient importance to justify any delay by the governments of the States and the governments of the cities in setting themselves to the task of preparing the necessary plans and effecting the necessary organization so that the peace we shall build will be a peace, economically and politically, achieved with the full participation of the people.

Throughout the world democratic government has been weakened by an historic process which the democratic peoples have often, only too often failed to grasp. As the problems of government under the impact of social, industrial, and technological developments became more complex, instead of decentralizing so that the people could through direct participation keep abreast of the developments, the method that was adopted was one of centralization. This method more and more has tended to remove the problems of government from the people, and the people from all the essential conditions necessary to allow them the opportunity of intelligent choice. On the one hand, the people have been left with little more than their anxieties, adrift in a world of contradictory and uncertain trends and tides. Demagoguery became the main political instrument, exploiting the anxieties and the antagonisms that spring from uncertainty and confusion. On the other hand, the processes of the highly centralized governments have became more and more the property of an esoteric cult of power-lovers, parading under a mantle of altruism. This chasm between the people and the Government grows wider each day as the people find the processes of government more and more beyond their reach and beyond their grasp and as the demagoguery of the entrenched bureaucracy becomes more and more skillful and ruthless. This chasm must be bridged if democracy is to survive.

Only through the instrumentality of the State governments, through the assumption by the States of the responsibility for the tasks awaiting us can their chasm be bridged. Only so can we bring the people back into the councils of government, and bring the processes of government back within reach of the people.

If the post-war America we are to build is to be a democratic America, a people's America, we must at once rescue government from what it is rapidly becoming—a dark and mysterious magic that must be worked by saints, supermen, and indispensables. We must tear this mystery asunder. We must bring the people into the government and bring government to the people.

This can be done only through decentralization. This fateful historic task rests today with the State governments more than with any other body. The task of reconversion is your responsibility and your opportunity. The future of democracy is in your hands.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 21 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD on the subject of the Prevention of Accidents in the United States, delivered by Col. John H. Stilwell, president of the National Safety Council, at the Films Safety Award Committee luncheon, Statler Hotel, Washington, D. C., June 8, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I regard this award luncheon as another milestone in our continuing effort to halt the swelling tide of careless accidents. Thus it goes without saying that I am honored to have a part in this unique ceremony. So much has been said on the subject of accidents that we are reaching the point of repetition. Yet with all that has been said and all that has been done, accident prevention continues to be our greatest home-front challenge.

We are faced today with a sad paradox. On far-flung battle fronts our men and women are giving their lives so that America can live in our traditional way. But here on the home front, at a time when the manpower situation is desperate, we are literally wasting precious life and valuable property due to carelessness.

I have often asked myself whether our people are really concerned with accidents; whether they accept them as the price we must pay for industrialization and faster transportation. Yet I cannot believe that this is true. Rather I like to think that perhaps we have not found the right way to bring about that public consciousness; that public opinion so necessary to the solution of a common problem.

It is for this reason that I say that this is a very significant occasion. I say it because here are gathered leaders in the motion picture world and leaders in the safety field. They have much in common. They are both concerned with public service. And visual education can help us do the job of accident prevention.

Our motion pictures have become more than mere entertainment. They play a vital role in arousing public interest and forming public opinion. The men and women in the industry are doing a remarkably fine job in helping to keep up morale. As a result, the industry is serving in this perilous wartime with great distinction.

And I have every confidence that when victory comes the motion-picture industry will turn from wartime service to new heights of peacetime service on the home front. When that glad day comes I am sure that our far-sighted leaders in the industry will lend their efforts to making peacetime America a safer America.

Anticipating that day, the National Safety Council and cooperating groups stand ready to give full cooperation in making the great mass of people aware that accidents can be prevented. Mr. Harris has told you that the National Safety Council is taking over the functions of the Film Safety Awards Committee. We accept this honor with full realization of the challenge it presents and the fine work that has already been done. I spoke earlier of the important role that movies can have in making our people alert to the accident problem. We have here today living proof of that statement.

About 2 years ago a great insurance company, in seeking ways to do a real wartime job, ways to back our armed forces and to serve our people, conceived the idea that accidents are truly the "seventh column." As a result, the effort to "Smash the seventh column—carelessness that causes accidents" has become symbolic of the whole safety movement. This slogan and its accompanying activities have literally breathed life into safety activities. The man who conceived this idea is one of our distinguished guests here today. I would like at this point to ask Bennett Moore, vice president of the Liberty Mutual Insurance Co., to stand up.

It is customary for a speaker on the subject of safety to endeavor to startle an audience with statistics. I shall forego this custom. I do this because the movies, through the medium of a splendid picture, have shown us a better way to arouse attention than to count the dead and the injured. In other words, to point the way to accident prevention by stimulating public appreciation of how accidents can be prevented.

The Film Safety Awards Committee, working hand in hand with the movie industry, has been largely responsible for this development. Thus, the National Safety Council is in reality taking over an established and functioning activity. Originally the Motion Picture Traffic Safety Committee, the Awards Committee is largely another product of Liberty Mutual. The late David S. Beyer, director of the Traffic and Safety Bureau of Liberty Mutual, was extremely active in setting up this subject.

And the purpose of this luncheon today is to present the David S. Beyer award on behalf of the Film Safety Awards Committee to a movie company for an outstanding contribution to safety. Let me tell you the story briefly.

When the "Smash the Seventh Column" campaign was launched, it caught the public fancy as a wartime slogan. In fact, it attracted so much attention that a major producing company, seeing another opportunity for public service, titled a short subject dealing with accidents "The Seventh Column." This short is head and shoulders above any previous visual treatment of the safety problem. As a result, the Film Safety Awards Committee, a few months ago, selected "The Seventh Column" as the outstanding safety picture of 1943. This gathering today is for the purpose of making the award. In addition to the main award for treatment of general safety, the committee voted honorable mention for sequences in feature films focusing attention on occupational safety. These pictures were M-G-M's "Swing Shift Maisie" and Columbia's "Good Luck, Mr. Yates."

Representing the industry here today is Charles Francis Coe, vice president, Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, an associate of Will Hays, who has played a prominent role in increasing the scope of public service on the part of the movie industry. Mr. Coe will tell us something of how the industry desires to help.

But before we hear from Mr. Coe, I would like in behalf of the Film Safety Awards Committee and the National Safety Council, which will carry on the committee's work, to present to him this plaque. It is donated by Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. in memory of the late David S. Beyer. In presenting the Beyer award to Mr. Coe I ask him to deliver it to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and that master of short subjects, Pete Smith, with a message.

The message is that all concerned with accidents appreciate the contribution that has been made to a worthy cause. And with it goes the hope that the motion-picture industry will strengthen its ties with those of us in the safety field and go forward with us in making America a safe place as well as a happy place.

The O. P. A. Conference Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the conference report on the O. P. A. and the discussions about the act convince me of two things. One is that the O. P. A.'ers can have done many things that appeared at variance with the printed word, but also with the spirit of the Price Control Act. The second conviction is that many injustices could be avoided if and when the O. P. A.'ers wished to avoid them.

The O. P. A. Act, Public Law 421, Seventy-seventh Congress, chapter 26, second session, provides the following:

Make subsidy payments to domestic producers of such commodity in such amounts and in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as he determined to be necessary to obtain the necessary maximum production thereof.

If the O. P. A. can subsidize a vegetable canner so that he obtains a fair price for his product, and after the W. F. A. has increased the producer price of corn from $9 to $17 per ton and up to $27 or $28 per ton in New England, I would like to know why in the name of common sense the O. P. A. and W. F. A. allow the packers to pay as little as two-thirds of parity for light hogs and still pay the packer a subsidy on the meat produced the same as is paid on the support-priced hogs?

The O. P. A. and W. F. A. have sufficient authority of law to give all producers a parity price if they wished to do so. In other words, the reason that a little-underweight hogs have been purchased by the packers at less than parity and some of the lighter ones purchased at as low as 50 percent of parity, and the reason that the O. P. A. pays a subsidy to these packers on the basis of support prices is right on the doorstep of the O. P. A. and W. F. A. Until they correct this unfair situation, they are deserving of the criticism they have received and will continue to receive.

Discriminations in Railroad Freight Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. L. McCLELLAN
OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 21 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able argument made by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART] on the subject of discriminations in railroad freight rates before the Interstate Commerce Commission in Washington, D. C., on June 14, 1944. The argument was made in connection with the so-called Southern Governors Freight Rate case.

There being no objection, the argument was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF SENATOR TOM STEWART, OF TENNESSEE

My contribution to the argument in this proceeding is to be limited principally to a discussion of the significance and effect of the amendment of 1940 to section 3 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act by which the words "region, district, territory" were added to that paragraph. This is, as you will readily perceive, the subject listed as No. 7 of part I of the topics suggested by the Commission. My familiarity with the background and purpose of that amendment leads me to undertake to point out and emphasize to the Commission the real and unmistakable meaning of that amendatory legislation.

First, may I say that Congress intended by the addition of the quoted phrase to section 3 (1) of the act to effect a real and substantial change in the basic law against discriminations. Congress was familiar with the outcome of a previous attempt to bring about a change in the national freight-rate structure when the United States Supreme Court, in its decision in the case of Ann Arbor R. Co. v. United States (281 U. S. 658), held that no change had actually been made by the Hoch-Smith resolution in the basic law. In framing the legislation I am now discussing Congress did not rest its case on the passage of a resolution directing the Commisison to investigate the rate structure, as was done when the Hoch-Smith resolution was passed, but went further and added some important language to section 3 (1) of the act so as to make the inhibitions of that paragraph apply directly to discriminations in rates as between regions, districts, and territories.

Not only was the Congress familiar with the results of its effort by the simple expedient of a resolution to affect the contour of a rate structure, but it was the beneficiary of much other information gathered over a long experience in the regulation of commerce. I was conscious of the fact that the underlying purpose of the original act to regulate commerce was to eradicate and control discrimination or, as the Supreme Court expressed it in Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Mottley (219 U. S. 467), "to cut up by the roots every form of discrimination, favoritism and inequality." The operation of the railroads without national regulation had demonstrated that discriminations, rebates, preferences, prejudices, and abuses of all kinds had become prevalent throughout the country and after careful and thorough investigation and consideration by Congress the original act was passed. Naturally, the main effort in this initial legislation was directed at the particular abuses which had developed. Discriminations of various kinds were the principal ones.

Since that time Congress has conducted many other inquiries and it has had the benefit of annual reports from the Commission detailing its experiences in the administration of the basic regulatory law.

After the turn of the century another particular form of discrimination made itself manifest, centering largely in the great intermountain territory, but outcropping also in other regions. I have reference, as you have perhaps already perceived, to the long- and short-haul discriminations. Congress took note of this situation and finally made the fourth section of the act more rigid. I cite this historic incident here to indicate the continuing purpose of Congress to adhere to its original determination to control discriminations in the freight-rate structure of the country and in the common carriers' performance of their public function of transportation. So far as I have been able to judge, Congress has not relaxed the law against discriminations in any instance, but has always sought to make more effective its control of this form of abuse.

Freight classification, a particular phase of rate making that may be made a vehicle of discrimination by and of itself, is a subject that has received special mention by the Commission in its annual reports to Congress since 1887. Congress has been told many times of the importance and desirability of uniformity of classification. Some of your early reports contain some very logical and convincing argument to that end. Congress also knows that the Director General of Railroads in the First World War, through the assistance of the Commission, brought about a substantial measure of classification uniformity in certain particulars, such as the description of the articles and minimum carload weights.

Your reports to Congress also show that following the First World War, that is, during the decade of the twenties, the Commission instituted several regional or territorial investigations of freight rates. I believe you have officially designated these as Eastern Class Rate Investigation, Southern Class Rate Investigation, Consolidated Southwestern Cases, and Western Trunk-Line Class Rates. I understand, although I do not know the details of these investigations, that they did not abolish differences or distinctions between regional or territorial rate structures yet they may have, and probably did, ameliorate these differences to some extent. I understand also that you accomplished by these decisions a high degree of uniformity of rates within the respective regions or territories. This was done under the law before the amendment to which I am addressing myself was passed by Congress. If you were a layman on the outside, or if you were a Member of Congress charged with the responsibility for legislation in this field, I believe you might reasonably form the conclusion that I did when I looked into the record; namely, that the law was effective when applied to regions or territories but that something was lacking when the law against discriminations was given a wider sweep and applied to the Nation as a whole where one regional rate structure could have been compared to another.

In looking over the digests of cases over the years, I think one might reasonably form that conclusion. For instance, I notice that a great many of the earlier cases held that undue prejudice or preference could not be said to exist as between shippers or communities unless the same carrier served them or participated in their traffic. In some cases, where joint rates were involved (and I assume that joint rates would be prominently involved in interterritorial or interregional traffic) it was held that a mere showing of participation in a rate by a carrier is not sufficient to establish undue prejudice if defendants do not control the rate or cannot affect it by the carrier involved canceling its participation. Elliott Jones & Co. v. Atlanta & W. P. R. R. Co. (144 I. C. C. 374), is a case in point, but there are others. This view of the law as it originally stood would, I am sure, make it difficult to get at and control discriminations between territories and regions.

There is another sidelight on this question of dealing with territorial or regional discriminations under the old law. The only reference in the original section 3 (1) to a geographic unit was by the use of the word "locality". Undoubtedly of course that word was to be given its plural as well as its singular meaning, but (and I think this is important in evaluating the effect of the amendment of 1940) localities in a plural sense did not possess the significance that the word "district", "territory" or "region" possess. The latter comprehends, not merely numerous localities, but localities so integrated that they constitute a definite geographic, economic, and social entity and, particularly when applied to territories in a transportation sense, definite groups of railroads with, as now seems to be true, distinctive rate structures and methods of spreading out or distributing the general burden of rates. Instead, therefore of having an inhibition in the law against (insofar as geographic units are concerned) discrimination between localities we have a definite and positive prohibition against discrimination between districts, territories, and regions. I think here, too, is an answer to the defense which I notice from your digests has frequently been made in these discrimination cases, that section 3 (1) does not condemn differences in rates where the transportation burden is distributed differently. Now, I think, the law comprehends the method of distributing this burden and requires an examination of it because that may be responsible for a forbidden discrimination, particularly if there is not an ample justification from a transportation standpoint (not a mere historical standpoint) for the differences in this distribution of the transportation burden.

I have said that in my judgment Congress intended by the amendment under consideration to effect a substantial change in the basic law on discriminations. I think I have a commission precedent, based upon another change in this section, for such a view. I have reference to the Albany Port District case (219 I. C. C. 151). This proceeding was started by a complaint of the Albany Port District Commission, an agency of the State of New York, alleging that Albany and Rensselaer, N. Y., were being charged unreasonable rates on export, import, coastwise, and intercoastal traffic, and that they were being unduly prejudiced by lower rates on similar traffic to and from other north Atlantic ports. Complainant contended, in developing its case under its allegation of prejudices, that the existing rate adjustment operated as an artificial barrier which had to a great extent prevented Albany from participating in port traffic. Defendants answered by saying, among other things, that they did not and could not legally prejudice Albany because no one carrier or group of carriers could remedy the situation under an alternative order issued under section 3 of the act. The defendants relied in part also on the decision of the Supreme Court in Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. United States (289 U. S. 627), decided in 1933, which held that the word "locality" appearing in the original section 3 (1) did not comprehend a port. Congress, however, has amended this paragraph by adding the words "Ports and port districts." As to the degree the carriers' control of rates at the complaining and allegedly preferred points the Commission remarked upon the fact that some large carriers, in substance and effect, were responsible for maintaining a general rate structure applicable at all the ports involved. It concluded that if a carrier could escape the legal consequences of such discrimination—I am stating the effect rather than the exact words of the Commission's holding—in the circumstances presented the Commission would be without power to remove prejudice existing in any extensive rate adjustment. After reviewing the legislative history of the amendment of section 3, which added "ports and port districts" to it, the Commission said that it thought the amendment was intended to cover just such situations. I understand the Commission's order in that proceeding was put into effect and I take it that no one felt justified in challenging the Commission's construction and application of this amended law.

So it established effective authority to remove discriminations in freight rates throughout a port district despite a plurality of carriers serving the various shipping points. I am convinced the case cited above establishes a clear precedent, equally applicable to regions, districts, and territories, now that they have been added to the antidiscrimination provisions of section 3 (1) of the act. Manifestly, the amendment in question is as comprehensive and appropriate for controlling discriminations between regions and territories as the earlier one was for controlling discriminations between ports and port districts.

If, in the face of the long history of an expanding antidiscrimination policy in Congress, there can still be any doubt of what the National Legislature intended this amendment to do, I believe I can dispel that doubt by a review of the discussions and legislative incidents that led up to its enactment.

Where doubt of the meaning of any law, or any provision of it, may cloud the minds of those entrusted with its administration it is and always has been sound practice to look to the intent of the law-making agency and to examine all evidence that might establish or clarify this intent.

You will be impressed, I believe, as I have been in reviewing chronologically the history of the 1940 amendment, not merely with the unanimity of purpose of the proponents of this provision, but with the growing agreement among the Members of both Houses of Congress as to the effectuality of the wording employed.

In the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress there were introduced in both Houses several resolutions seeking to broaden the Interstate Commerce Act by extending its antidiscrimination provisions interregionally and calling for an investigation by the Commission of reputed rate discriminations. Senate Joint Resolution 99, offered in the Senate by Senator HILL, and House Joint Resolution 223, offered in the House by Representative RAMSPECK, are typical of these proposals. The former was incorporated without substantial change in the provisions of S. 2009, reported by the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee and accepted by the Senate, and the Ramspeck companion resolution served a similar purpose in House committee discussions, and became a part of the House substitute measure.

On the score of the extension of the Commission's authority to remove discrimination, the report on S. 2009 (presented to the Senate by Chairman WHEELER on May 16, 1939) made this significant comment: "There has been no substantial change therein, except that the words 'region, district, and territory,' appearing in lines 20 and 23 on page 26 have been inserted. This insertion is taken from a resolution by Senator HILL, directing the Commission to investigate interterritorial freight rates." Evidently, the committee considered the addition of the words, "region, district, and territory," a substantial change.

The aims and efforts of the members of the committee with respect to the provisions in question came in for full and, I think, very illuminating discussion on the floor of the Senate during the 4 days of debate that led up to the passage of the bill.

I should like to quote briefly from those discussions to recreate the atmosphere that pervaded the Senate and bespoke the Senators' state of mind and disclosed their intent. I refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 22, 1939, beginning with the fourth paragraph of Chairman WHEELER's remarks on page 5888 and continuing for some three pages. He began by reviewing the popular demand from the South and West for the removal of freight-rate barriers and the efforts of members of his committee to comply with it in the provisions of the bill. He first mentioned the injunction to the Commission to investigate these reputed discriminations and remove them.

This brought forth questioning from Senator CONNALLY, who expressed a doubt that the Commission was granted sufficient authority to remove any interterritorial discrimination they might find. In response, Chairman WHEELER read the undue preference and prejudice section of the bill, which is now a part of the Interstate Commerce Act and to which I am addressing my remarks. And he offered this comment:

"Then we have added the words 'region, district, territory,' which are to be found at the bottom of page 23 and at the top of page 27."

Mr. CONNALLY replied: "That is at least some progress."

Mr. WHEELER then continued: "The previous provision with regard to 'discrimination' simply referred to discrimination as to 'locality, port, port district, gateway, transit point,' without specifying the region, district, or territory. So we felt that by broadening the language we would at least take away that excuse, and we would provide expressly that the Commission should not discriminate in its rate structures. The Commission is directed to proceed immediately. Perhaps it will not mean anything to the Commission but, as I said a moment ago, if what Congress says does not mean anything to the Commission when we pass legislation, then so far as I am concerned I am willing to have Congress pass more stringent laws. At the present time however, I feel that as far as we could go would be to direct the Commission to investigate, and then to put into effect any orders necessary, and then to broaden the other section with reference to unjust discrimination."

Further explaining the action of drafters of the bill, Senator HILL, who headed the subcommittee on discrimination, added, after reiterating WHEELER's construction of the provisions in question, "In that connection let me say that my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who is very much interested in the subject and who sat with our subcommittee for several days helping us to work the matter out, himself introduced a resolution, which, as I recall, is more or less substantially the provision which is written in the bill. I am sure the resolution was not any stronger in any way than is the language now written in the bill."

Then the inquiry was taken over by Senator Lee, of Oklahoma, who, after reading testimony on specific rates from the subcommittee record, commented: "There is the difference thrown out in strong relief of 98 cents for 100 pounds hauled 300 miles just over the Missouri River, as against $1.53 in western Oklahoma and Texas. And that is the point I am sure the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Alabama had in mind in the proposed amendment. I wish to say to the Senator, who has worked so hard on this matter, that our only interest is to be sure that that condition will be changed.

"As the Senator from Texas has well pointed out, that situation has existed for years. Of course, the Interstate Commerce Commission knows that already. If we trust only to their generosity or to their feeling of justice, I fear that it will not be changed. But we hope that the bill will contain such mandatory language as to bring about a change.

"Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I have generally found that when the Senate and the House pass a measure, even though we do not direct the Commission positively to reduce the rate, yet the Commission recognizes that we are the policy-making body and they generally try to rectify these matters. As I understand, the Commission has a case pending before it at the present time, and is going into some of the very matters to which the Senator from Texas, the Senator fram Alabama, and the Senator from Oklahoma have called attention, and I am of the opinion that some of these matters may be straightened out."

Through the comment of Senators Wheeler and Hill it becomes quite clear why the provisions were embodied in the simple amendatory language that has since been added to the act and equally as clear what the proponents of the amendment were aiming at. The debate continued in the same tenor, several other Senators joining in and a little later on they went into the meaning of the word "unlawful" as employed in the provision. In response to a suggestion that other wording be employed, Senator Wheeler made this significant comment: "The experts from the Commission tell me that the word 'unlawful' is the broadest term that could possibly be used. If a rate is unreasonable or discriminatory, it is held by the Commission to be unlawful; so that 'unlawful' is the broadest term that could be used with respect to it."

I mention this for more than the word in question, the clear implication of the Senator's discussion is that members of the Commission, or the staff, themselves suggested the wording of the amendment, as I have always understood they did. It is an inevitable assumption that the Commission experts chose the best language their training and experience could command to carry out the aims and intentions of the Members of Congress. I might mention that in this debate Senators WHITE of Maine and REED of Kansas added their seasoned opinion in support of Senator WHEELER's interpretation of the meaning of "unlawful."

The "undue preference and prejudice" section was separately considered and specifically adopted by the Senate without dissent on May 23.

The limits placed on my time permit me to detail only a fragment of the Senate debate on the amendment, but I should like to comment in conclusion that the whole tenor of it was in support of an effort to remove interterritorial rate discriminations and nowhere, insofar as my examination of the RECORD discloses, did any Member suggest that the proposed amendment was aimed at anything else.

The bill embodying it passed the Senate on May 25, 1939, and went over to the House.

After due consideration by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Chairman LEA on July 18 of that year reported to the House the bill with an amendment that constituted virtually a new bill. However, on the undue preference and prejudice feature, the House report discloses there had been no substantive change.

The House debate on the antidiscrimination provisions of the bill, while briefer, clearly indicates on the part of Members a viewpoint, aims, and intentions synonymous with those of the Senate. I cite this comment by Chairman LEA in introducing the question: "Now, I want to refer for a moment to the Ramspeck resolution. That is embodied in this bill. It directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation of certain freight differentials, and then to make the orders that are necessary to remove the unlawfulness of rates found to be unlawful. It further provides, in the provisions prohibiting discriminations, the protection of territories and districts. In my judgment that resolution is directed at what is one of the most important situations in rate structure. It points to a place in our rate structure where the greatest opportunity to help our transportation system on an economic basis lies. The correction of that condition would serve the interests of shippers and carriers alike."

On the next day Representative PEARSON of Tennessee spoke more at length in the same vein, and I may add that in the House, as in the Senate, there was no suggestion on the part of any Member that the provisions had any less purpose than the removal of interterritorial rate discriminations.

The House then adopted the amended bill and the measure was committed to a conference committee which struggled for more than a year to report a bill on which both houses could agree. This was accomplished only after the bill had been committed twice to the committee and a great many disagreements composed, but through it all, insofar as the committee report (No. 2016, 76th Cong., 3d sess.) discloses, there was no change made in the antidiscrimination provisions in the legislation.

Campaign Expenditures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the attempt to amend House Resolution 551, adopted by the House, by the Committee on Rules was aimed at the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Very properly, however, it has been amended to make the inquiry applicable to all persons and entities.

I suggest the congressional special committee examine into the expenditures for the election of President, Vice President, Members of the House of Representatives and Senate not only by labor organizations but by powerful manufacturing and financial groups. If the C. I. O. or the A. F. of L. are to be challenged in their collections and expenditures of funds during the campaign, then, certainly, the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and other similar groups should be put to the same inquiry. Also, powerful families and dynasties which have been throughout our history instrumental in making or breaking political personages should likewise be screened. There are the Pews of Pennsylvania, the du Ponts of Delaware, the Morgans and Rockefellers of New York, the Guggenheims of Colorado.

In this inquiry, it is hoped that the members of the special committee will be very careful in their demarcations as to what is or is not political activity. The bill provides for examination into the violations of the so-called Hatch Act. I voted against the Hatch Act. To my mind, it is a political abortion. It cannot be enforced. It provides that 3,000,000 workers cannot engage in political activity, whatever that may mean.

Inquiries at the Department of Justice indicate that it is just as difficult to enforce the Hatch Act as it was difficult to enforce the Prohibition Act. Apparently, grand juries refuse to bring in true bills and petit juries refuse to convict and judges are most loath to impose severe sentences. The comparatively few convictions obtained resulted in most mild sentences. In most cases sentence was suspended. In one case a fine of 1 cent was imposed. In another case the punishment was 1 hour in the custody of the marshal.

Why should not Federal employees advocate the election of any candidate? A Federal worker has the right to have his say like any other citizen. Why should he not be permitted to address a gathering, be the gathering of 3 or 3,000, and tell what he thinks of the campaign issues, of the conflicting contentions of the candidates? To deny him this privilege is to deny him the protection of the Bill of Rights, specifically, freedom of speech and freedom of press. If the Federal employee goes beyond the realm of propriety or does the bidding or chores of any political leader or ward heeler, his administrative or departmental head or bureau chief can discipline or punish him by adoption of appropriate regulations. There are plenty of statutes in existence that could clothe the passing of such regulations. Such administrative remedy is far better than a horrendous yet unenforceable "political noble experiment" like the Hatch Act.

Men who are in Government service at $1 a year are subject to the Hatch Act. That is absurd.

Periodically, we are asked to extend the exemptions of the bill. We are asked to extend the exemption to members of the Selective Service Board, to teachers, and so forth. I am for continuing the exemptions until the bill is so cut to pieces as to be useless.

The War Production Board, the Office of Price Administration, the War Manpower Commission, the War Labor Board not only use dollar-a-year men but even have volunteers who serve without compensation, and also so-called day-to-day services of men who have been called in as experts in their own particular field. If the Hatch Act were enforced against these particular men, there would be nothing left of these particular bureaus and boards. Such employees who are experts would have to resign. There is the case of an expert who acts as a War Labor Board member and receives the regular per diem compensation of $25 per service. The Hatch Act provision would apply all day—that is, this expert could not act as a board member during the regular working hours and make political speeches that night. On other days this gentleman or other officials similarly situated could go campaigning to their hearts' content so far as the Hatch Act is concerned.

These anomalies highlight the absurdities of the act.

Nor are we sincere in our attempts to enforce the Hatch Act. We only appropriated $50,000 a year for that purpose. We only render lip service to it.

A shipyard worker, formerly a member of a political organization, perhaps a precinct committeeman for either the Democratic or Republican Party, takes a job as a worker in the Federal navy yard. He has to stop his political activities, although he may have been a precinct captain for 10 or 20 years. That proscription is absurd.

The Hatch Act excludes 3,000,000 American citizens from taking their appropriate share in properly molding or influencing an important decision in the coming election.

Furthermore, we had a fine example recently of a definition of "political action." Certain Army authorities banned the reading by soldiers of several important books. One of them was Charles Beard's book on the Constitution. Another was the Yankee From Olympus. The first was published seriatum in Life, and the other appeared in the Reader's Digest. They are both splendid books. The Yankee From Olympus is the biography of Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. Yet these harmless but educational and enlightening books were barred as involving politics. To indicate to what appalling lengths we go when we attempt to define what is meant by "politics" under the Hatch Act, a few examples will suffice. A Federal employee might be a student of Henry George and a firm believer in the single tax system. He may want to conduct classes in his department, or he might want to speak before a group on the lecture platform. Under the Hatch Act, I believe he would be barred. Another Federal worker might wish to abolish the electoral college. It might be an issue in the coming election. He would be barred from voicing his opinion because that might be indulging in politics. Federal workers must put blinders on their eyes, plugs in their ears, and gags on their mouths. They must be, in short, robots. They must see nothing, hear nothing, say nothing. They must, finally, dwindle into mere ciphers.

There has been the tendency to single out the C. I. O. Political Action Committee for special treatment. Yet this C. I. O. committee was completely exonerated in a report made by the Department of Justice. Its activities have been primarily concerned with awakening a political consciousness among C. I. O. members. It has inculcated its members with the need for political education. It has campaigned for the soldiers' vote, for post-war work, for the setting up of full employment conferences. It has urged their members to register and vote in the election. The objects of the committee are:

First. To mobilize the electorate for full and enlightened participation in the 1944 elections, National, State and local.

Second. To unite workers, farmers, and all progressives for political action.

Third. To assure the renomination and reelection of Franklin D. Roosevelt as President of the United States by welding the unity of the people around his candidacy.

Fourth. To elect a Congress committed to full support of President Roosevelt and of the program and policies which he espouses.

Fifth. To secure the election of progressive candidates to other offices.

Sixth. To make political contributions in connection with the 1944 elections.

Seventh. To assist in financing the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in the conduct of its activities.

While the investigating committee is at it it might well train its guns on other labor groups. How about William L. Hutcheson, head of the carpenters' union, who will undoubtedly back the Republican nominee—perhaps with money of his own or of the union. Hutcheson has backing for the nomination of the Vice President on the Republican ticket. If the C. I. O. is to be singled out for special consideration because it is backing Roosevelt, perhaps Hutcheson should be singled out as well. Then there is the United Mine Workers with John L. Lewis. How much will he and his backers spend to beat Roosevelt?

Efforts to Aid Refugees Completely Stymied in Spain by Our Ambassador Hayes—Celler Demands Recall

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the War Refugee Board was established by Presidential directive in January. Under the able direction of John W. Pehle, many refugees have already been saved.

Because of the work of the War Refugee Board successful cooperation has been gained in a number of our American embassies and legations, notably in Bern, Lisbon, Stockholm, Ankara, as well as in capitals of Latin-American countries. But like a lonely island in a great sea, Madrid is the exception. Absolutely no cooperation has been accorded Mr. Pehle and the War Refugee Board by our Ambassador to Spain, Carlton Hayes. This is most reprehensible and passing strange.

The President has set up a free port or a haven at Fort Ontario, N. Y., for these unfortunates. Following the President's example, England has granted several thousand certificates of entrance to Palestine to these refugees who are to be taken out of southern Italy, having come there through the underground. The military will thus be relieved of the necessity for supporting and feeding them. Again, following the President's example, England has likewise established a free port for refugees. Spain, too, might follow in establishing such havens if Ambassador Hayes would so much as approach the Spanish Government to place the suggestion before it.

Because of the cruel recalcitrance of Mr. Hayes, money for the relief and escape of refugees was sent to Portugal and several hundred were saved. Mr. Hayes resented this; his pride had been injured because his inaction had been circumvented. Mr. Hayes complained. It is noteworthy that had Mr. Hayes been willing to cooperate thousands could have been saved through Spain instead of hundreds through Portugal. Our Minister in Lisbon, Mr. Norweb, has been most humane and actively sympathetic in his attitude and stands ready to do more if aid were forthcoming from Carlton Hayes.

What are the motives and reasons behind Ambassador Hayes' attitude? The burden is upon him.

It is common knowledge that Ambassador Hayes has not even tried to obtain the cooperation of the Spanish Government in carrying out the policy of the President as announced in the directive setting up the War Refugee Board. It is hard to believe that the Spanish Government, if approached on humanitarian grounds, would not be willing to help in this great cause.

Ambassador Hayes has the hardihood to balk not only the War Refugee Board and the Treasury Department, but the State Department as well. The Treasury Department, with the approval of the State Department, has issued a license to an American relief organization in Spain to carry on relief and evacuation work therein. Ambassador Hayes has actually refused to transmit to the American relief organization this license approved by such high authority. It is exactly on par with a like license issued to relief organizations in Switzerland. In the case of Switzerland, the issuance of such a license, together with the cooperation of the Legation at Bern, has resulted in greatly furthering the relief and evacuation program.

It is the studied policy of the War Refugee Board in seeking cooperation of various countries to relieve the governments of all burdens, since the Board guarantees maintenance and rapid evacuation of all refugees. The cost has been borne by private agencies and at no expense to the American Government. Nonetheless, there has been consistent refusal on the part of Hayes to present to the Spanish Government for its consideration any plan to facilitate the evacuation of refugees into and through Spain, despite the fact there would be no responsibility of maintenance attached to the Spanish Government. In other words, the Ambassador has been reluctant, for reasons best known to himself, to ask the Spanish Government to take any action. It would cost Spain nothing and yet gain for her world good will.

It is difficult to understand the position taken by Ambassador Hayes. Can he arrogate unto himself the authority to defeat the President's declared policy? Does he not appreciate that his adamant and cold-blooded attitude has tied the hands of the War Refugee Board? Has Ambassador Hayes grown so inhuman as to fail to realize that human lives are at stake?

The War Refugee Board is concrete proof that where there is a will to achieve coupled with humanitarian purposes, and where the organization is not bogged down with red tape and diplomatic niceties, work can be accomplished which the weak and hesitant failed to do. For example, take the case of Turkey. Before the establishment of the War Refugee Board we had in Turkey an ambassador who was ready and willing to render all possible aid, but who lacked the official backing of Washington. But with the promulgation of the War Refugee Board, Ambassador Steinhardt has been the means of initiating, together with Ira Hirschmann, official representative of the War Refugee Board in Turkey, a program that has already saved many lives. And there were those who said previously it could not be done. How much more shabby and ill-considered then is the attitude of Ambassador Hayes?

It would indeed be tragic if the efforts of the War Refugee Board were thwarted by Hayes' persistent refusal to permit a full-time representative of the War Refugee Board to be stationed in Spain, for so he has done, despite the fact that other countries have raised no such objection.

Will Ambassador Hayes be permitted to make policy in contradiction to the stated policy of our President?

The time has come to put the screws upon the Francophile. Hayes should be recalled.

Not a One-Way Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a Congressman's job is not a one-way job.

There was a time, before the coming of the New Deal, when necessary legislation could be considered and passed in a few months and a Congressman was then free to go home, visit with his constituents, learn their views, attend to his own business, come back to Washington, inspired by the contact with the home folks, to do his best.

But with the coming of the New Deal, there has been an endless succession of apparent and real crises and emergencies calling, in the opinion of the New Dealers, for the enactment of one law after the other; first, one creating a new agency or assigning new duties to an old one, and after that, other new laws to correct the faults of the first.

A new agency or board is created to take care of some fancied or real grievance and then almost before the ink is dry other acts of Congress are required to plug the loopholes, increase the power, extend the activities, make new appropriations for, the newly found so-called remedy. The result has been that, urged by the executive department, Congress has continued bit by bit to ignore its good sense, surrender its independence, and yield to ever-increasing bureaucratic demands.

So now Congressmen find that, in the opinion of many people, they are expected to stay in Washington 365 days of the year. It follows that a Congressman gets out of touch with his people. His time is too much occupied with legislation. He not only becomes affected but afflicted with Washington thinking, and Washington is self-centered; forgetful of the rest of the country; intent too often upon its own little petty affairs and, as a sideline, endeavoring to solve the troubles of all the world, while, at the same time, determined to prescribe rules and regulations, not only for the farmers but for business of all kinds.

Since the New Deal caught the fancy of the people, their troubles have multiplied and most Congressmen find themselves almost overwhelmed by either suggestions as to remedies, demands that an end be put to injustices or insistent requests for legislation benefiting special groups.

In my humble judgment about the best service a Congressman can render is to visit the home folks frequently and discuss frankly the problems which confront us here at home, as well as those growing out of our foreign policy—this because the home people as a rule have their feet on the ground. They have not lost their sense of proportion. They are ever conscious of the realities of life. They know where bread, milk, and meat come from—not out of cellophane or cans. They know that hard work is the only answer to many of our problems. They think things through clearly and, 9 times out of 10, they have the correct solution. Therefore a Congressman should get home and learn what his boss wants, needs, must have, if we are to continue as a republic.

While home the efficient Congressman, of course, leaves in his office, especially in wartime, a competent secretary who can act as an intermediary between the home folks and department heads, relaying requests for information, the answers to pertinent inquiries.

One of the most important parts of the secretary's and Congressman's duty—and by me the one first given attention—is that of giving the parent, the wife, the relatives, and friends of those who have been taken into the service obtainable information as to those who have gone and which otherwise is not so speedily available.

Those who would remake America have had considerable to say about the duty of Congressmen remaining here in Washington. Naturally, they would like to see Congress stay here, get out of touch with the people, so that they themselves might suggest and elect representatives who were less responsive to the people's desires.

But that little scheme will not work, at least not so far as I am concerned. I intend to get around the district, where my bosses, the voters and those who do not vote, can tell me what they want, why they want it, and the reason for their opinions that their requests, either for relief from oppressive directives or laws, or for remedial legislation or actions, should be made possible of fulfillment.

It is my hope that during the coming recess I can get into every town and city in the district to listen to the advice of those I represent so that, when Congress meets again, my services may be of more value to the district, to the Nation.

Our Post-War American Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD on the subject of our post-war American merchant marine, I include therein a letter written by Robert H. Patchin, vice president of the Grace Line, Inc., a large part of which was published in the New York Herald Tribune of June 11, 1944. The entire article deserves very serious consideration and is sound.

JUNE 6, 1944.

WILBUR FORREST, Esq.,
New York Herald Tribune,
New York City.

DEAR MR. FORREST: I believe you and the Navy League have done a great job in eliciting from so many Senators pledges of support for an adequate post-war Navy and by "adequate" I mean a fleet much larger than the pre-war force. In my opinion, however, these replies were defective in one important particular—they made no mention of the need for a larger, active merchant marine. As you know, and as General Marshall and Admiral King have admitted in their reports, our impact in the war was delayed for lack of merchant ships and this went for the air attack as well as the overseas transport and maintenance of troops.

Although the most brilliant exponent of the indispensability of merchant shipping in war was an American officer, Captain Alfred T. Mahan, our Navy has always been weak in this respect because of our vacillating maritime policy. Thus, it was necessary to buy foreign ships to transport even our small forces to Cuba and the Philippines in the Spanish-American War. When Theodore Roosevelt finally got together 16 battleships in a battle fleet and sent it to the Pacific and around the world to show the Japanese that we were not weak in the Pacific, it was coaled throughout the voyage by foreign ships, British and Scandinavian chiefly.

Before World War No. 1 we had so few ships that our commerce was paralyzed by the war and we had to build a $3,000,000,000 merchant fleet, most of which was not completed until after the Armistice. However, the fact that the United States did get under way a vast ship construction program assured reserves of men and materials for the Allies and contributed mightily to winning the war.

Between World War No. 1 and No. 2 substantial gains were made in the establishment of competent, regular, and frequent American flag steamship services from the three coasts of the United States to the chief markets of the world. American shipping companies gained a position of increased importance on these routes with the result that our commerce was better off when war began in 1939 than it had been in 1914. But, as more than two-thirds of our commerce was being carried by foreign ships, we were crippled in providing carriage of our essential imports and of exports to the rest of the world which turned to us when European sources of supply were closed off.

Fortunately, the Maritime Commission had begun in 1937 a program of fast new cargo-ship construction but few units had been completed by September 1939 and our own preparedness program suffered for lack of ships. Then, after we had repealed our neutrality legislation and the Nazi submarines began to take an increasing toll of our ships, even before we got into the war, it became apparent how weak this country was. Our preparedness program was held up for lack of ships and after Pearl Harbor our impact on the war was delayed for the same reason. There is good reason to believe that both the Germans and the Japanese relied on our maritime weakness in timing their attacks. They realized that the United States would eventually come into the war but they felt they could win before we could build enough ships to make our military effort count. One need only to read General Marshall's report to see how our effort would have been much more prompt had more ships been available.

It quickly became apparent that the United States was the only place where merchant ships could be built faster than the Germans could sink United Nations vessels then afloat. Britain had neither sufficient shipbuilding ways, material nor manpower to do the job. Existing American shipbuilding facilities were inadequate but the industrial power, materials and manpower were available. Old shipyards were enlarged and new yards were built and a reservoir of skill, equipment and manpower was channeled into the total shipbuilding plan with results that have amazed the world. Merchant ships are now being launched at the rate of five a day with a steadily increasing proportion of the fast, economic C and Victory types and a decrease in the Liberties. This could have been done nowhere else.

By the middle of next year the United States will have built 45,000,000 tons of shipping consisting of 4,500 new merchant ships and tankers. This total of 45,000,000 deadweight tons will be equal to more than two-thirds of the total tonnage of the world existing in 1938. Of course, the United States has no idea of "hogging" world shipping but the need of avoiding past perils is obvious.

In 1938 the United States had about 11,000,000 tons of merchant shipping, more than half of which was in coastal and intercoastal trades. The merchant marine consisted chiefly of old freight vessels, although a substantial number of modern fast combination passenger and cargo vessels had been built. Possibly 40 percent of the latter type have been lost and as the present shipbuilding program does not include the passenger types, that deficiency remains to be remedied, as does the lack of smaller freight vessels of 4,000 to 7,000 tons. However, the war-built fleet is efficient. The fast freight vessels of the C and Victory types are equal to or better than any of that class hitherto built anywhere in the world. The same is true of the new tankers. The Liberty ship is equal to a good pre-war 11-knot freighter, useful for bulk cargoes but not for liner service such as the commerce of the United States chiefly requires.

Along with the disarmament and little-Navy sentiment that menace the future of American naval strength, there is some evidence of a little-merchant-marine philosophy. This takes the form of doubts as to the ability of American shipping to compete without vast subsidies. Another negative argument being advanced is that shipping is the lifeblood of Britain, Holland, and the Scandinavian countries. The same thing might be said of Germany, Italy, and Japan, but those who would return the American merchant marine to its inadequate pre-war status do not venture at present to include these nations in their arguments. There have even been suggestions that if the American merchant marine should largely increase its pre-war minor (less than 30 percent) share of the carriage of our own foreign commerce, other maritime nations would be deprived of shipping earnings to an extent which would greatly impair their ability to buy American merchandise.

This argument has been proved misleading. Net earnings from the carriage of freight is such a small percentage of the value of the goods that the shift from foreign to American vessels would affect our export trade to only a negligible degree.

Another factor in the situation is often overlooked, namely, the possibility, if not probability, of a general world-wide increase in trade, possibly permitting the United States to gain without impairing the shipping earnings of others. Then there is the opportunity, pointed out by Admiral Land, that the United States should take up a part of the position formerly held by Axis maritime powers who used their merchant fleets for political and military purposes.

Suggestions that the United States settle back to a merchant fleet of pre-war size (11,000,000 deadweight tons), consisting of new instead of old, fast instead of slow, vessels, must necessarily be based on lack of faith in greater world trade or the proportionate share of the United States therein.

But even if the world trade should not increase, experience has twice demonstrated that the United States needs a substantially larger merchant fleet for the service and encouragement of its commerce in peace and as a stand-by for the Navy and Army in war.

The idea that this auxiliary shipping service over and above a small merchant fleet can be assured to the Navy by maintaining a laid-up fleet of five or ten million tons does not meet the situation. You can have a laid-up fleet but you cannot have a laid-up personnel. An effective Navy calls for a good deal more than battleships, carriers, destroyers, submarines, etc. It would be more practicable to lay up some of the warships and rely on a larger active merchant marine for a reserve of officers and seamen enrolled in the Naval Reserve.

Our maritime development during this war is notable, not only for the ships turned out but for the personnel trained. Merchant marine academies have been established which have schooled a fine class of young Americans to be merchant-marine officers and by the end of the war the merchant-marine personnel will have reached a total of 200,000 officers and men, as compared with between 30,000 and 40,000 before the war. Employment conditions being as they are, it will not be so difficult hereafter as it formerly was to get first-class young Americans to go to sea.

The idea that an American merchant marine can be maintained only by a vast outlay in subsidies is not valid. It is true that it costs more to build and operate American than foreign ships. The subsidies authorized by the Merchant Marine Act are designed to equalize this disparity in costs. Ordinarily, the size of the merchant fleet would be limited by the amount of money that Congress would be willing to spend to build ships at the American cost and sell them at foreign prices, thus placing the purchasers on an equal footing with their competitors. However, due to the war, our Government has built this great fleet. The money has been spent. The ships exist. The only way for the Government and taxpayers to get something back is to sell the ships for private operation as contemplated by the Merchant Marine Act and give the shipowners the opportunity to earn the money to pay for them. Thus, the question of construction subsidy for the freight fleet has largely been solved.

It is probable that it will still be necessary on highly competitive lines to pay operating subsidies to overcome the higher American cost of operation. This, however, in the case of the new fast and economic ships should not be very large. It has been estimated (see article Shipping and the National Defense in Grace Log for February-March) that $40,000,000 a year in operating subsidies would maintain a substantially larger merchant marine. Had we expended this amount for 10 years before World War No. 2, we would have more quickly prepared for war and our weight in the war would have been heavier and earlier and far less costly in money and life.

To sum up, this war has shown that the center of gravity of world maritime strength has shifted to the United States. This country has assumed greater responsibilities of a political, military, and economic character. It is pledged to the maintenance of a stable peace by force if necessary. We have already built a Navy thrice the pre-war combat strength. Our allies are quite willing that we should maintain a big Navy, but some of them dislike the idea of bringing our merchant shipping into balance with the naval combat strength for purposes of defense or to increase it to the point where it will more effectively encourage our commerce in peace and protect it when deserted by foreign shipping as it always has been in war.

I hope the Navy League will think it worth while to accent the merchant shipping side of the naval problem.

Sincerely yours.

R. H. PATCHIN,

O. P. A. Conference Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, the conference substitute, section 105, modifies the amendment which I offered and which was adopted by the House without opposition.

The substitute merely omits the provision for optional public hearings.

The substitute gives our citizens substantial protection to which they are entitled, and thereby eliminates "star chamber" proceedings.

With the protection of counsel and a record made by a reporter, persons subpenaed need no longer fear the inquisitorial power of O. P. A. investigators.

C. I. O. Political Action Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD W. SMITH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the entrance of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee into the political life of our country confronts us with a threat for which we are utterly unprepared. Not only are the Republican and Democratic Parties threatened with possible disintegration from within by this organization, but there is involved a real menace to our democratic way of life.

In June 1943, the Communist Party, U. S. A., held a special meeting of its leading functionaries at which its proposed dissolution as a political party was announced. Gene Dennis, reporting jointly with Earl Browder, stated that "special consideration should be given to the approaching 1944 elections."

Speaking before the Communist constitutional convention on May 20, 1944, Earl Browder, former general secretary of the "dissolved" Communist Party, United States of America, and now president of the newly formed Communist Political Association (C. P. A.), gave further expression to the intentions of this subversive group, as follows:

This election must not be left in the hands of the old party machines of professional politicians. * * * We must cross party lines. * * * The people * * * must build their own organizations for political action, beginning in the neighborhoods, and wards, extending to districts, towns, and cities, to the States and the Nation as a whole. * * * We will participate in political life as independents through the established party organizations of our progressive associates. * * * We remain an organization of Communists. (Daily Worker, May 22, 1944, p. 3, supp.)

In conformance with the general pattern set forth by Mr. Browder, the Communists have chosen as their special instrument in the 1944 campaign the newly formed C. I. O. Political Action Committee, which has already set up 14 regional offices covering the entire United States, operating chiefly within the Democratic Party and in certain localities like Oregon and Maine within the Republican Party. Communist support of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is unmistakably demonstrated by the following typical citations from the Daily Worker, official Communist organ:

A key factor in determining the result of the national elections will be the extent of the political organization of labor, and the C. I. O. committee is the instrument for doing the job effectively (March 11, 1944, p. 6).

Referring to the circular of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, directing A. F. of L. unions to desist from any cooperation with the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, the Daily Worker declares:

The Green letter, attacking the C. I. O. and its Political Action Committee, is timed with the Dies committee's drive and general reactionary gang-up against this most effective political movement among the workers for continuance of the Roosevelt policies (March 4, 1944, p. 6).

Let me cite also a circular letter, undated, sent out to delinquent subscribers by Rebecca Grecht, business manager of the Daily Worker:

Every worker, every trade-union member, must take action during the coming months, to broaden the influence of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. * * * To know what to do and how to do it—you need the Daily Worker. * * * Renew your subscription today.

Despite the fact that I have taken issue with organized labor from time to time on specific issues, I do not for a moment challenge its right in a proper and lawful manner to engage in political activity to further the interests of the organized labor movement of the United States. But I emphatically deny that this movement is essentially promoted in the interests of American labor or the American people as a whole. Let me cite the statements of recognized and loyal American labor leaders in proof of this fact. On March 14, 1944, Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, issued instructions to all affiliated national and international unions in the name of his executive council, calling upon them "to cease and desist from collaborating with the C. I. O. on political policies." On April 4, 1944, the American Federation of Labor Weekly News Service, issued by authority of Mr. Green, referred to the C. I. O. Political Action Committee as infested "with Communist leaders of every tinge of red."

On February 29, 1944, John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, former president of the C. I. O., declared:

The Communists dominate the C. I. O. today. Philip Murray is today the prisoner of the Communists in his own union. They control him and the C. I. O. through their seats on his executive committee. And there isn't a blessed thing he can do about it.

Sidney Hillman is just as badly off. Both of them have got to play ball with the Communists now or die.

This is the set-up which has given birth to the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, and seeks to control the political destiny of the Nation.

After making an exhaustive study of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, the Special Committee on Un-American Activities declared in its report of March 29, 1944:

The record shows beyond the possibility of any dispute that well-known Communists immediately assumed important roles in the regional, State, and local activities of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Murray and Hillman may allege that it was a mere coincidence that their organization so completely conformed to the one whose pattern had been drawn by the Communists. They cannot deny the presence of well-known Communists in the ranks of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee as it has been functioning from coast to coast during the past 7 or 8 months (p. 9).

The most important local unit within the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is the American Labor Party in New York. The history of the latter organization reflects the pattern of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in its development. From the outset, the American Labor Party officials, led by Sidney Hillman, were loud in their protestations against charges of Communist influence or domination. Just as in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee the front line men were almost invariably non-Communist. But when it came to everyday spade work in the neighborhoods, wards, and house-to-house campaigns, it was the Communists who took over. In this connection I will cite the testimony of individuals who were high in the official circles of the American Labor Party. The following statement was issued over the names of Dean Alfange, the 1942 American Labor Party candidate for Governor of New York; Joseph V. O'Leary, former State controller, elected with Labor Party support; Alexander Kahn; Dr. George S. Counts, the retiring State chairman; Alex Rose, the retiring secretary; and Andrew R. Armstrong, the retiring treasurer:

The primary returns leave no doubt that Mr. Earl Browder has captured the American Labor Party. The presence of Mr. Sidney Hillman within this Browder-Marcantonio coalition is of but minor significance. The overwhelmingly Communist-dominated new State committee undoubtedly will also attempt to nominate non-Communists on its executive committee to present an innocent façade before the public to expand thereby its insidious influence. (New York Times, March 30, 1944, pp. 1, 15.)

In a public statement officially and publicly withdrawing from the American Labor Party, David Dubinsky, one of its leading founders and president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, gives a remarkable insight into the methods employed by the Communists which they are now applying on a national scale through the C. I. O. Political Action Committee:

Starting out with an advantage of 25,000 colonized Communist votes, on which they could always count in our previous primaries, and the additional Communists who enrolled last year in the A. L. P. * * * it required but a minor voting contribution from the Hillman end of the partnership to assure victory for Browder and his Communist Party * * *.

I regard the former American Labor Party as a Communist labor party, and am therefore withdrawing, publicly, and officially, from that party. Mr. Hillman can act as a front for the Communists; I never did and never will. (New York Times, March 31, 1944, pp. 1, 15.)

Subsequently the International Ladies Garment Workers Union withdrew its financial support from the American Labor Party. The resigning members of the American Labor Party thereupon formed a new party, the Liberty Party, which in its constitution provided for the exclusion of Communists from membership. They may well have established a precedent which other political parties will have to adopt.

Already the C. I. O. Political Action Committee has succeeded in electing as a delegate to the national convention of the Democratic Party, Mervyn Rathborne, of California, whose record of Communist activities and connections is described at length in the March 29, 1944, report of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities (p. 158ff). Political observers have called attention to the possibility of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee assuming what amounts to practical control of the Democratic Party.

Permit me to pose for the consideration of Congress certain problems which are presented by these developments.

We are witnessing the birth of a new totalitarian political machine in the United States which seeks to control the vote from the pay roll to the ballot box. Here is the picture. Government agencies through official pressure and the institution of the check-off system are forcing workers to join these C. I. O. unions. These unions are notorious for their high-handedness and lack of internal democracy. Members are compelled to contribute to the enormous treasury now being amassed by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, under pain of the loss of a livelihood if they refuse. The members of these unions are being deluged with propaganda giving a warped viewpoint on candidates and campaign issues. The Communists, who have taken over economic control of the workers in key war industries through the C. I. O. unions, are now engaged in shackling them politically.

An amazing incident of the situation is the open and insolent disregard of the law by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in its activities.

The amendment to the Corrupt Practices Act, contained in the so-called Connally-Smith bill, plainly prohibits a labor union from making a contribution in connection with any election for President, Vice President, and Members of Congress, or for a political committee to accept such contributions.

For months this C. I. O. Political Action Committee has been flooding the country with speeches, pamphlets, interviews, and publications urging the election or defeat of candidates for Congress, the Presidency, and the Vice Presidency, and boasting of the huge sums of money contributed by various C. I. O. labor unions to the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in connection with such activities. No plainer case for prosecution under the law by the Department of Justice could be conceived.

I have repeatedly called the attention of the Attorney General to these activities and urged the prosecution of the guilty parties.

Copies of my correspondence with the Attorney General on the subject, which are attached hereto, should form a significant chapter in the efforts of a Communist-dominated labor union to take over the American Government.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1944.

Hon. FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I desire to direct your personal attention to a flagrant violation of the criminal provisions of section 9 of the War Labor Disputes Act, commonly known as the Connally-Smith Act. Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O., in an article in the February 1944, issue of the American Magazine, outlines the objectives of the so-called "C. I. O. Political Action Committee." The article is entitled "Labor's Political Aims," which aims are clearly indicated in the article as designed to influence, if not control, the national elections in 1944.

Philip Murray, President of the C. I. O. and author of the article, on page 28, makes this statement: "The various C. I. O. unions have made an initial contribution of $700,000."

Section 9 of the Connally-Smith Act makes it unlawful for "any labor organization to make a contribution in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors, or a Senator or Representative in, or a delegate or resident commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for." And provides that an officer of any labor organization who consents to any contribution by the organization shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year or both.

Mr. Murray is President of the C. I. O. The article is a defiant confession of the violation of the statute.

A number of other officers of the union are named in the article as parties actually engaged in carrying on the unlawful enterprise.

I respectfully request that you present the whole matter to a Federal grand jury forthwith, with a view to the indictment and prosecution of those engaged in this conspiracy to control the national elections of 1944.

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD W. SMITH.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1944.

Hon. HOWARD W. SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This acknowledges your letter of January 10, calling my attention to possible violations of the Smith-Connally Act.

I have instructed Assistant Attorney General Tom Clark to inquire into the matter immediately, and to take such action as may be appropriate under the facts as developed.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1944.

Hon. FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I thank you for your letter of January 13 advising me that you have instructed Assistant Attorney General Tom Clark to inquire into and to take such action as may be appropriate with reference to the subject matter of my letter of January 10.

As other evidences of this and similar violations of the criminal provisions of the Connally-Smith Act are brought to my attention, I will take the liberty of sending them on to you.

Yours very sincerely,

HOWARD W. SMITH.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 6, 1944.

Hon. HOWARD W. SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: On January 10, 1944, you wrote me complaining that a flagrant violation of the criminal provisions of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, as amended by the War Labor Disputes Act, was revealed by an article by Philip Murray of the C. I. O., published in the February issue of the American Magazine. This article described the newly organized Political Action Committee of the C. I. O., and stated that various C. I. O. unions had made an initial contribution of $700,000 to the work of the Committee.

I at once ordered a thorough-going investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and instructed the Bureau to look not only for possible violations of the criminal provisions of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, but also for violations of the provisions of the Federal statute (the Hatch Act) which limits the amount which may be contributed in connection with an election for a Federal office.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation advises me that the officials of the Political Action Committee and of the C. I. O. made their records available to the agents of the Bureau, who, in compliance with my order, have examined the books, records, and correspondence in the files of the Political Action Committee at its offices in New York and in its regional offices, and in the National Headquarters of the C. I. O., and have interviewed officials of the Committee.

The Federal Corrupt Practices Act, concerning which your question arises, makes it unlawful for "any labor organization to make a contribution in connection with any election at which Presidetnial and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to Congress are to be voted for, or for any candidate, political committee, or other person to accept or receive any contribution" so prohibited. The act contains definitions of the terms "political committee" and "labor organization," and for the purposes of this letter we may proceed on the premise that the Political Action Committee is a political committee as so defined and that the international unions which have contributed to it are labor organizations as so defined.

It appears from the investigation so made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee was formally created at the national convention of the C. I. O. held at Philadelphia on November 4, 1943, which adopted a resolution outlining a program for the activities of the committee. The international unions thereupon appropriated funds to defray the expenses of this program. The principal objects of the program, as stated in the resolution, were to stimulate the political consciousness of the individual members of the unions, to make them understand the value of the vote and the importance of exercising it, to interest them in participating actively in the political and community affairs of the localities in which they live, and to instruct them on general issues, such as (1) "the support of our military effort"; (2) "the maintenance of our economic, social, and legislative standards, as a guaranty of wholesome living standards for our people, and the protection of the highest possible morale among our millions of war workers"; (3) "the mobilization of all of our resources for the vigorous prosecution of the war"; and (4) "a sound and progressive post-war program to ease the difficult transition to a peacetime economy, give full employment to our people, provide an adequate system of social security in time of unemployment, sickness, and old age, and lay the basis for a more secure and abundant life."

The language of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act above quoted makes it applicable only to elections at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for; another section of the act provides that it is limited to general or special elections and is not applicable to primary elections or conventions of political parties. Contributions in connection with State elections in State campaigns are not covered by the act.

The investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the activities of the committee has not disclosed any violation of the above provisions of the act. The Bureau reports, in fact, that the only contribution discovered by it made by the committee for the election of a candidate was a contribution of about $15,000 to the campaign for a candidate for the governership in New Jersey; but this would not be prohibited by the Federal law.

Furthermore the Federal Bureau of Investigation reports that the files of the committee contain instructions to its agents to conform to the provisions of the Federal statute. A letter from the chairman of the committee to all the regional directors contains the following statement on this point:

"I want at this time, however, to call to your attention the necessity of scrutinizing all of the expenditures of your office to make certain that they are made in strict conformity with all of the provisions of law, and particularly with the requirements of the Smith-Connally Act."

The investigation shows that the committee has received a total of $569,608.06, $400,000 of which was in lump sums of $100,000 each, appropriated by three of the international unions and the C. I. O., and the balance of which came principally from other national unions. These sums were sent for the support of the program of the committee above referred to. As of January 31, 1944, the committee had made total expenditures amounting to about $39,000. The greater part of these expenditures, other than the approximately $15,000 contributed for the State campaign in New Jersey above referred to, are stated to have been for salaries, for current office expenses, travel, etc., which expenditures are, of course, not prohibited by Federal law.

Activities of the committee to date in furtherance of its general program above referred to in the nature of general organization of the national and regional offices, the launching of a get-out-the-vote campaign, consisting in the effort to have the unions get their members to register and qualify as voters in their respective communities, a campaign in favor of the soldiers' vote bill, a full employment conference, and the preparation of a post-war program, are not, likewise, prohibited by any Federal law.

Based on the foregoing investigation, it appears that to date there has been discovered no violation by the political action committee of the criminal provision of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, as amended, or of the Federal statute limiting the amount which may be contributed in connection with an election. Certain expressions in the article in the American magazine to which your letter referred might be subject to the construction that in the future, action might be taken by the committee which would not conform to the provisions of the Federal statute; but no such illegal action has been discovered. If future acts by the committee of a nature prohibited by the act should occur, I can assure you that appropriate action will be taken by this Department.

With kind regards.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 7, 1944.

Hon. FRANCIS BIDDLE,
The Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I am in receipt of your letter of April 6 in further response to my letter of January 10 calling your attention to activities of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee which appeared to be in violation of the criminal provisions of the Connally-Smith Act in that the C. I. O. unions were making, and the political action committee receiving, contributions "in connection with" the Federal election.

I am amazed to learn from your letter that the investigations for 3 months of the alleged crime was confined to the records and statements of those charged with the commission of the crime, which records and statements have been accepted by your office without question. The investigation seems to have been confined to asking the accused if he was guilty, and accepting with enthusiasm his statement that he was innocent.

Your letter concedes that the C. I. O. is a labor organization and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee a political committee, but asserts that no crime has been committed because the money has not been expended in violation of the law.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee is by its name as well as its activities a political committee. The law, in plain and simple words, makes it a crime for a political committee to receive contributions from a labor union or for a labor union to make such contribution. It is only necessary that the contribution be made "in connection with an election," and not necessarily in the interest of any particular candidate or party.

The crime consists in a political committee receiving a contribution from a labor organization in connection with any Federal election. When the union contributes, and the political committee receives, the crime is complete, irrespective of how the money is eventually used. Your own letter discloses that labor unions have made, and the Political Action Committee has received, contributions. I am sure that no one is so naive as to believe that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is collecting these huge sums of money on a national scale for the purpose of giving Sunday school picnics.

The Department of Justice is charged with the duty to present to a grand jury any case where there appears to be a strong probability that a crime has been committed. My files, which have been available at all times, will disclose ample evidence that cries out for a grand jury investigation.

The only result that I can see of the Department's investigation is that the accused was given 3 months in which to persuade the Department of Justice that it was not guilty. In 3 minutes, I could have given your investigators enough evidence from the files in my office to justify presentation of the case to a grand jury, but no investigator from your Department ever communicated with me or evinced the slightest interest in any evidence which I could supply. For instance, if you are in doubt as to whether the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is seeking to influence the 1944 elections, I quote from a C. I. O. publication in which Sidney Hillman, chairman, is quoted: "We must build up a drive for Congress, we could do the job in 1944 to elect the proper representatives in Congress and by 1948, we can retire every reactionary in Congress." Another publication of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, obviously paid out of the funds which you state have been collected, is as follows: "But if we fail to elect a progressive government in 1944, all we fought for, sacrificed for, built up painfully brick by brick, will be swept away as if by tornado." I have much other data of a similar character which is available to you.

I fear that in the multitude of your duties, this very vital matter has not had your close scrutiny. I, therefore, respectfully request that you reopen the investigation under your personal supervision, and that the new investigation be not confined to the absurd limit of merely consulting the person charged with the commission of the crime.

Yours very sincerely,

HOWARD W. SMITH.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 10, 1944.

Hon. HOWARD W. SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: In your letter of January 10, requesting an investigation of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, you referred only to Mr. Murray's article in the February 1944 issue of the American Magazine as the basis of your complaint, and in your later letter of January 14 you stated "As other evidences of this and similar violations of the criminal provisions of the Connally-Smith Act are brought to my attention I will take the liberty of sending them on to you."

As I received no further word from you in accordance with your letter, I assumed that you did not have other evidence in your possession.

I shall be glad to have the material which, in your letter of April 7, you report is in your files, and I have directed Mr. G. Maynard Smith, of my staff, to obtain it for me.

With personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 11, 1944.

Honorable FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 10 relative to your investigation of the activities of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. The letter was delivered by your Mr. G. Maynard Smith with whom I discussed the matter in some detail.

I have turned over to Mr. Smith all of my files relating to the subject for his inspection.

Yours very sincerely,

HOWARD W. SMITH.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 12, 1944.

Hon. FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: You will, of course, recall previous correspondence I have had with you concerning the violations of the Corrupt Practices Act by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, and you will doubtless recall that after your letter to me of April 6, in which you stated that you had discovered no violation of the law by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, I wrote you under date of April 7. In reply to that letter, you wrote me under date of April 10 stating that you had directed Mr. G. Maynard Smith, of your staff, to obtain from me the evidence in my files. Your Mr. Smith called on me on April 11, and I turned the files over to him with the understanding that they would be examined, and further investigation conducted.

A period of 2 months has now elapsed during which I have received no further communication from you nor any indication that it is the purpose of the Department of Justice to prosecute violators of the Corrupt Practices Act.

As there are rumors that other well-financed minority groups may adopt a similar subterfuge to violate the Corrupt Practices Act on the strength of your previous opinion, it seems to me imperative that an early and decisive opinion in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee case should be had. Otherwise, any group such, for example, as corporations, could adopt a similar subterfuge by setting up a political action committee to which they could contribute large sums of money that would ultimately be used to influence the coming elections. Such a situation would seem to me to be the equivalent of a repeal of the Corrupt Practices Act.

May I earnestly request an immediate answer.

With kind personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD W. SMITH.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 14, 1944.

Hon. HOWARD W. SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SMITH: I have your letter of June 12, with respect to violations of the Corrupt Practices Act by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

The files that you turned over to Mr. G. Maynard Smith, to which you refer, were examined but did not give us any additional information.

For some time Mr. Tom Clark, head of the Criminal Division of the Department, has been engaged in a further investigation not only of this committee but of other organizations engaged in political activities. If any violations of the Federal statutes are shown, prosecutions will follow.

With personal regards, believe me,

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General.

An Amazing Document

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Sun of June 20, 1944:

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

AN AMAZING DOCUMENT

I hold in my hand a mimeographed letter dated May 26, 1944, and issued by United States Department of Agriculture, Buerau of Agricultural Economics, 222 Mercantile Building, Berkeley 1, Calif. Attached to the letter is a questionnaire: The object of asking American citizens intimate questions is clarified in this paragraph of the letter:

"These facts * * * show the effect on the devolpment of the American community when the land is generally farmed in large tracts. Perhaps major cause of differences between these two communities is that where the land is farmed in large blocks, four-fifths of the families receive their support from wage labor and have little security and no permanent roots in the community. The gulf between them and large land owners is great, and they do not participate in social events together. Where the working farmer is the rule, there is a closer tie between him and his helpers, and the proportions of farmers, laborers, and merchants are more nearly equal."

Now as to the questions: The questionnaire not only wants to know about church and/or Sunday school membership of all the members of the family but also about frequency of attendance and earlier affiliation. Hitler, of course, had a grandmother clause, so that earlier affiliation was dependent upon the right number of generations in the changed religion. Martin Luther, John Knox, and Calvin, to say nothing of Cardinal Newman, would have been in a lot of trouble over that. But this question is pursued further as follows:

"2. Did any member of your family change denominations upon coming to this town, or since you have been here? 3. If so, what was former affiliation (indicate in last column of question 1)? 4. Do you attend church more or less frequently now than before the change?" Perhaps the Department of Agriculture would like to count the gold stars that the children bring home from Sunday School, or the apples they give the teachers.

Now they want information about—

"6. What informal activities did members of your family participate in? Type of activity: (a) school functions; (b) card parties; (c) picnics; (d) dances; (e) movies; (f) community affairs.

"7. Do you have a small group of close friends? Number in group?

"8. Where do they live?

"9. What do they do?

"10. Do they all belong to one church or club? What one?

"11. List families with whom you visited regularly in 1943 and 1940 (if different) and whom you consider your more intimate friends."

That No. 11 will surely make trouble. Imagine what would have happened to Romeo and Juliet if any such questionnaire had had to be made out in their day. The stabbings would have taken place in the first act or earlier. And look what they want to know about your intimate friends:

"Name, occupation or tenure, related, ethnic group, number visits in their home, your home, residence, year."

Please tell me what an "ethnic group" is. Stalin is a Georgian—a mixed Indo-Aryan-Taurian people with undoubted Mongolian, to say nothing of Tartar, and possibly even Scythian stocks. Suppose Mr. Roosevelt when he visited Teheran had to answer this questionnaire and say that he visited an Indo-Aryan-Taurian-Tartar-Scythian called a Caucasian for a better word.

Frankly, nobody on God's green soil has any business asking an American citizen whom he visits, why, and what ethnic group the visitee belongs to, and as long as our people submit to this busybody snooping and spying and butting into their lives, there will be folks to do it. I pledge myself now to sock the first one who comes my way in the eye and I call upon red-blooded, hairy-chested, strong-armed Americans to take the same kind of pledge. Marion Clawson, who signs this letter, says:

"This method of interviewing, the type of questions asked, and the methods of combining and analyzing the results, have all been used for many years by both public and private agencies in sociological studies in many parts of the country. The best place to obtain information regarding farm and community life is from the people who participate in it; the best way to obtain such information is to ask the people themselves about it."

You see, they blame it on you.

The American Pledge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARDIN PETERSON
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in my district I am fortunate in having a very dear friend and an outstanding editor, the Honorable E. D. Lambright, editor of the Tampa Morning Tribune, Tampa, Fla. Recently he wrote, and there was published in the Tampa Morning Tribune, the American Pledge, which, in my opinion, deserves a permanent place among the great documents of history, and I am, therefore, taking the privilege of asking that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that it may be available for my colleagues and many others to read. The pledge referred to is as follows:

THE AMERICAN PLEDGE

At Concord Bridge—
American men,
Firing the first shots
For a free nation.
At Gettysburg—
American men,
Fighting each other—
Dividing their country
Yet making it stronger.
At San Juan Hill—
American men,
Battling on foreign soil
To save a people,
Create a new republic.
At Belleau Wood—
American men,
Dying far from home,
Yet winning a war
They thought would end wars.
In Normandy—
American men,
Again fighting, falling,
For the same cause.
This time their blood
Shall not be shamed in peace.
This time their victory
Shall stand.
This time their sons
Shall live!
In America—
American men,
Heirs of today's heroes,
Holding high their heritage,
Will keep the peace, compel
All other peoples to keep it—
So that not again
Will men be slain—
Our men—or any men—
To sate a tyrant's greed.
So help us God!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ED ROWE
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, in the cruel days of this war, little does one suspect how soon the fatalities and bad news will reach into his own close circle of friends. A very good friend of mine, formerly associated with the Cleveland News and the Cleveland Press, then coming to the largest city I represent to be associated with the Times-Press, later being promoted to associate editor of Newsweek and lately known as editor of the page Washington Trends in the Washington bureau of Newsweek, recently departed from this country on a special assignment for that publication.

He completed one mission over Italy, after which he was taken to a very secret rendezvous to perform a special mission for Newsweek. Today I have been informed that William Shenkel, editor of Washington Trends, is reported missing over Japan, taking part in the recent raid by the new Superfortresses and was along especially to report that raid to the American people.

It seems but a short time ago that I had occasion to meet him on a day of great joy to him when he brought his baby boy to my office in my home town that I might see this baby. I will not soon forget the winsome smile on those features that day, as his jovial expression was a little more pronounced than usual. Now that baby boy in his adolescence may be fatherless because his father placed duty to his public in reporting the initial raid of the B–29's over Japan over and above his love of home and family. It is with deep regret, I am sure, that the American people acknowledge the loss of the alertness and ability of this fine outstanding newspaperman, and it is with grief that his friends accept the news of his being missing.

Crop Insurance or Wheat and Cotton Insurance?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 4911 is on the Calendar to be considered tomorrow, June 22. We have had wheat insurance for several years and later added cotton insurance. This insurance program has cost the Government millions of dollars.

A year ago legislation was enacted to discontinue the insurance program as of July 1, 1944. One of the reasons of the losses has been that only two crops, wheat and cotton, were insured and the overhead was too great. A broader base with a wider coverage would have reduced the overhead. Flax, which was a $146,000,000 crop in 1943, has been added to the wheat and cotton in the proposed legislation incorporated in H. R. 49, though corn with a value of over $3,400,000,000 is not included in the proposed insurance in 1945. Tame hay with a 1943 value of over one billion three hundred and eighty-eight million is not included though it exceeds in value either the cotton or wheat production for the year.

Certain individuals have criticized Members of Congress for being opposed to crop insurance when in fact they only opposed wheat and cotton insurance.

There are two apparent crop insurance angles to consider at this time: First, a long time program which should include all crops and not be confined to a small part of the Nation's crops, and, second, since we are engaged in war it would appear more desirable to provide insurance for war crops like peanuts and soybeans, and other oil-seed crops than to set up an insurance program that is largely devoted to crops of which we have an abundance, like cotton and wheat. There is no need to select cotton and wheat and give them any special support by providing for insurance for them when they are not the food production problems of the day. Cotton and wheat are already provided 90-percent parity loan protection by other legislation.

Wheat production for 1944 is estimated at over a billion bushels. If this estimate is realized, at threshing time, it will be the first time since 1915 that we have had a billion-bushel wheat crop. Millions of bushels of wheat are being fed to livestock, while the W. F. A. is having difficulty in finding sufficient corn for industrial purposes as well as for animal feeds. Cotton is in such an abundance that millions of pounds are being subsidized in order to get rid of it, after millions of dollars have been paid for raising it or not raising it, and other millions because it did not bring enough in the market place. Some $6,000,000 is expected to be paid as a subsidy to producers of insulation material in 1944.

We are in a war; we should insure war crops if we need a further increase in the production of these war crops. We should not legislate for a few at the expense of the many, and if we insure any crops, other than war crops, the insurance should cover a broad base, and the insurance should pay its own way. This crop-insurance legislation is of great national importance. Both major political parties have recognized its significance. Most farm organizations have expressed their attitude.

We cannot and should not continue to legislate for two or three crops that represent a small part of American agriculture. We have had altogether too much legislation of this kind during the past 10 years, and we at least should be willing to resist the pressures during wartime.

The following letter from Mr. C. E. Burkhead, of the B. A. E., indicates the production and value of the most important farm crops of 1943:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1944.

Hon. REID F. MURRAY, M. C.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MURRAY: In answer to your request made by telephone today, we are showing below production, and value of production for a number of crops produced in 1943. We have assembled this information in the manner requested by you—by showing the individual crop having the greatest farm value first and other individual crops in descending order.

In case we have omitted a crop (or crops) that you might desire, we are also enclosing a copy of Farm Production, Farm Disposition, and Value of Principal Crops, 1942–43, issued in May of this year and in which you will find additional crops and more complete information for the crops we are showing below.

Production and farm value of crops, United States, 1943

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 21 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Constantine Brown dealing with the dismissal of Hjalmar Procope, Minister from Finland to the United States, published in the Washington Star, of June 20, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS CHANGING WORLD

(By Constantine Brown)

The reason behind the dismissal of Hjalmar Procope and his three counselors from the United States is that the State Department became convinced the Finnish Legation's telegrams to the Helsinki government describing in too rosy colors the friendly feelings of the American people toward Finland have contributed to Finland's determination not to accept Moscow's peace terms.

Mr. Procope has been the most popular diplomat in Washington ever since he arrived here. His popularity was due not only to his charming personality, but to the fact that he represented a nation which was truly democratic.

Moreover, at a time when all the debtor nations were describing this country as "Uncle Shylock" because the American Government insisted on their paying the $20,000,000,000 they owed us since the last war, Finland went on paying her debts. Finland's debt, measured in dollars and cents, was relatively negligible. But there were other European nations which also could have made "token payments" and did not.

When Finland became Germany's war associate in fighting Russia, the White House and the State Department changed its attitude toward the Finnish Legation. Underneath the warm feelings for "little Finland" did not change. But officially, for reasons of high politics, a marked coolness toward the Finnish envoys developed in high quarters. Moscow has been insisting that we follow London's example and either declare war or break off diplomatic relations with Helsinki. The administration, realizing that such a move would not be popular in this country, informed our Russian associates that we might induce Finland to accept Moscow's peace terms and, consequently, it would be better if we maintained diplomatic relations.

The State Department has frequently asked Mr. Procope to urge his government to accept Russia's proposals. There is no question that he forwarded these messages to Helsinki. But at the same time Mr. Procope and his aides, who remained popular in Washington, informed their chiefs that the view of the State Department was not shared by the rank and file of the American people.

In support of this contention, Mr. Procope cabled to Helsinki speeches made on the floor of the House and Senate, articles written in American newspapers, and the gist of the conversations with responsible Americans. Sometimes the latter was highly colored and exaggerated.

In his frequent meetings with responsible Americans at luncheons and dinner parties, Mr. Procope and his principal aides who are being sent back to Finland emphasized what it will mean to Europe if the United States helps Russia to establish an oriental civilization over that continent. He spoke openly about the millions of Poles, Balts, and even Finns who were sent to concentration camps in Siberia by the conquering Russians.

The Minister is credited with having enriched the international diplomatic dictionary with a new expression. "Plebisciting," according to Mr. Procope, stood for the word theft when it was a question of a large nation taking over a smaller neighbor. It was based on the fact that Moscow claimed title to Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania because of a plebiscite held under the threat of the Russian divisions which had entered these three republics to protect them. The word made the rounds of Washington. The expression was amusing although not particularly complimentary to our eastern war associate.

President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull, together with their advisers, are fully aware that the Finnish Minister was not a Nazi sympathizer. It is said that no such trace could be found either in his utterances or his dispatches. But he had become what the State Department describes as a nuisance. He was too popular, too active in spite of the restrictions imposed on him and his staff many months ago.

Desperate China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, an editorial labeled "Desperate China," in the Washington Post of June 21, 1944, commenting on the loss of Changsha and the consequent threat to the entire Hankow-Canton railway line, begins as follows:

General Chennault has done more with less than any other commander in this war. He is also a man of uncommon common sense. For these reasons anything he says about the war in China is of impressive authoritativeness. If the Japanese are successful in clearing the entire Canton-Hankow railroad and building defensive positions on it, he says, the Asiatic war could be prolonged for years.

Once more I want to stress that the American people are concerned about the seriousness of the military situation in China, and as the picture unfolds are becoming daily more aware that if the Japanese succeed in establishing a north-south railway line across China and cleaning up the air bases between that line and the coast, the Allied cause will have suffered a major setback. The fathers and mothers of America, whose sons will be sacrified in larger numbers if the war in the Far East is thus prolonged, will soon want to know why those who have it in their powers to allocate supplies, especially transport planes, are not leaving General Chennault with enough air transports so that he can get full use out of his air force unit and attain his objectives, one of which is to render the Chinese armies the necessary assistance to check the Japanese advance. The Japanese threat in the Far East at this particular moment is along the interior Chinese railway lines. Let us, first of all, concentrate where the menace is the greatest and give General Chennault and his Chinese and American airmen the support which they require and which they so richly deserve. Men who are familiar with the situation in the India-China area express the opinion that there are enough transport planes in that entire theater of operations to provide General Chennault with the aviation supplies which he requires, provided too many planes are not diverted for other purposes; but should any more planes be required it would seem a comparatively simple matter to allocate a fleet of Douglas Skymasters—C–54–A models—which, as I have pointed out on previous occasions, are so well suited for the over-the-hump service.

The Washington Post editorial of June 21, 1944, read as follows:

DESPERATE CHINA

General Chennault has done more with less than any other commander in this war. He is also a man of uncommon common sense. For these reasons anything he says about the war in China is of impressive authoritativeness. Evidently he is profoundly concerned with the present Japanese offensive along the Hankow-Canton railroad. If the Japanese are successful in clearing the entire Canton-Hankow railroad and building defensive positions on it, he says, the Asiatic war could be prolonged for years. That is something to ponder over, even as we jubilate over the B–29 attack on Japan. After all, even after we reduce Japan, we shall have to clear the Japanese out of China.

The Japanese drive in China is proceeding from two main directions. In the north the Japanese advance has at last overrun Changsha where thrice in the past the Chinese threw back the invaders. The Chinese once again put up a heroic resistance with the help of the Fourteenth Air Force, whose fighters and bombers have been active over a wide area of the Hunan front. But the enemy is powerful and, except in the air, enjoys great superiority in equipment and fire power. Furthermore, the withdrawal of a large number of seasoned troops from Manchuria after the announcement of the Russo-Japanese pact of March 31 enabled the Japanese to throw into this fourth battle of Changsha more troops than they employed in their previous assaults.

At the same time the Japanese have started a drive north from Canton with the ultimate hope of making junction with their forces now in the vicinity of Changsha. This southern spearhead has got as far as Fengtsun on the railroad 30 miles north of Canton. In itself this latter drive constitutes no real menace to the Chinese since at Fengtsun the Japanese are still 325 miles from Changsha. But in conjunction with the southward drive it means an accentuation of the danger facing our Chinese allies.

The fact must not be forgotten that once in possession of the entire stretch of the Hankow-Canton railroad, the Japanese would have an interior line of communication all the way from Manchuria to South China. Furthermore, the loss of that line by China would cut China in two. And, lastly, Japanese control of the Hankow-Canton line would deprive China and our Fourteenth Air Force of vital airfields from which Japan's supply line along the Formosa Strait has been hard hit. All in all there was never a greater need of reinforcing China's fighting capacity than there is today.

Flag Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARDIN PETERSON
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, we have just celebrated Flag Day. A very appropriate address concerning Flag Day, made by Fraser S. Gardner, national employment officer for the Disabled American Veterans, before about 1,200 students of the Eastern High School, Washington, D. C., Wednesday forenoon, June 14, 1944, Flag Day, has come to my attention.

Because of the very pertinent statements in this address, I here extend it as part of my remarks, as follows:

Fellow citizens, I am honored by being the representative of the Disabled American Veterans on this program honoring our country's flag. Those men who so gallantly have borne mute evidence of their heroic sacrifice in following the flag in the service of our beloved country, again with love and reverence, salute the emblem of our freedom and our strength—our Nation's flag.

It was during the dark days that followed the Declaration of Independence that efforts to create some semblance of unity and resistance formed the background for the dramatic incident which occurred in the modest shop of a Philadelphia needle woman named Mrs. Betsy Ross. To her shop, in the summer of 1776, came a distinguished group of patriots, headed by General Washington. They had with them a rough sketch for a flag, a symbolic banner behind which they hoped to unite the efforts of the Thirteen Colonies. Thus it was that this needlewoman set herself to the immortal task of making our first Star-Spangled Banner, and, while this particular flag was never formally recognized by Congress, it was used on many occasions before the efforts of Betsy Ross finally culminated in official recognition by the Continental Congress, which, on June 14, 1777, the first birthday of Old Glory, adopted a resolution: "That the flag of the 13 United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 13 stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

When the Star-Spangled Banner was first flown at the head of the Continental Army, its general, George Washington, described its symbolism as follows: "We take the stars from heaven, the red from our mother country, separating it by white stripes, thus showing that we have separated from her, and the white stripes shall go down to posterity representing liberty."

Following the cessation of hostilities, and the organization of the United States, under its new national constitution, the flag continued to be modified by the addition of a star and a stripe for each State coming into the Union. After the admission of Kentucky and Vermont, a resolution was adopted in January 1794 making the flag one of 15 stars and 15 stripes.

Realizing that the flag would soon become unwieldy with the addition of a stripe for each State, Capt. Samuel C. Reid, United States Navy, presented to Congress the suggestion that the stripes again be 13 in number, representing the 13 colonies which struggled to found the Nation, and that a star be added to the blue field for each additional State coming into the Union. This suggestion became the text of a resolution by Congress, effective July 4, 1818.

Many years later President Wilson said: "This flag, which we honor and under which we serve, is the emblem of our unity, our power, our thought, and purpose, as a Nation. It has no other character than that which we give it from generation to generation. The choices are ours. It floats in majestic silence above the hosts that execute those choices, whether in peace or in war. And yet, though silent, it speaks to us, speaks to us of the past, of the men and women who went before us, and of the records they wrote upon it."

And, now, ladies and gentlemen, our annual commemoration of Flag Day, first celebrated as such on June 14, 1916, was inaugurated by a proclamation by our then President, Woodrow Wilson, reading as follows:

"My fellow countrymen: Many circumstances have recently conspired to turn our thoughts to a critical examination of the conditions of our national life, of the influences which have seemed to threaten to divide us in interest and sympathy, of forces within and forces without that seemed likely to draw us away from the happy traditions of united purpose and action of which we have been so proud. It has, therefore, seemed to me fitting that I should call your attention to the approach of the anniversary of the day upon which the flag of the United States was adopted by the Congress as the emblem of the Union, and to suggest to you that it should this year and in the years to come be given special significance as a day of renewal and reminder, a day upon which we should direct our minds with a special desire of renewal to thoughts of the ideals and principles of which we have sought to make our great Government the embodiment.

"I therefore suggest and request that throughout the Nation and, if possible, in every community the 14th day of June be observed as Flag Day, with special patriotic exercises, at which means shall be taken to give significant expression to our thoughtful love of America, or comprehension of the great mission of liberty and justice to which we have devoted ourselves as a people, our pride in the history and our enthusiasm for the political program of the Nation, our determination to make it greater and purer with each generation, and our resolution to demonstrate to all the world its vital union and sentiment and purpose, accepting only those as true compatriots who feel as we do the compulsion of this supreme allegiance. Let us on that day rededicate ourselves to the Nation 'one and inseparable,' from which every thought that is not worthy of our fathers' first vows of independence, liberty, and right shall be excluded and in which we shall stand with united hearts, for an America which no man can corrupt, no influence draw away from its ideals, no force divide against itself—a nation signally distinguished among all the nations of mankind for its clear, individual conception alike of its duties and its privileges, its obligations and its rights."

That proclamation was signed by President Woodrow Wilson on May 13, 1916.

Every year since then our country's President has issued a similar proclamation calling upon Americans to commemorate June 14 as Flag Day.

What significance does Flag Day have for us this year, 27 years after the original Flag Day in 1916? Our flag is now again a battle flag, the symbol of our unity in the fight of our country and its allies, to resist, and finally to crush, the wanton aggression of a few nations that have violated all international law and agreements in order to try to take, treacherously and ruthlessly, what they wanted from others.

If their efforts to enforce their will upon others should unfortunately succeed—but it won't—then our own safety and freedoms would become forfeitable at any time.

It is unthinkable to permit the rule of force to be substituted for justice, to permit might to supplant right, to permit rigid regimentation to replace collective cooperation, to permit complete censorship, to squeeze out freedom of the press, to permit dictatorship to drive out democracy. These drastic methods of government, with the complete loss of our prized freedoms, and of our individual opportunities to work for the well-being and happiness of ourselves and our children, would immediately follow the domination of dictatorships.

Our beautiful red, white, and blue flag is now the bright symbol of the determination of all good Americans to protect America, to crush its enemies, to perpetuate Americanism and all that Americanism includes, and to assist other peoples to attain the "four freedoms"—freedom from fear, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and freedom from want.

Flag Day, my fellow Americans, is significant to all of us as an opportunity to renew our faith in our own representative form of government, and to renew our mutual determination to protect and to perpetuate our American freedoms.

As so well stated in the lovely poem by Wells E. Bemont:

"Unfurl the flag, display with ours,
To represent the many powers,
Whose aim through earth's eternal hours
Is full and lasting freedom.

"Revere the flag with emblem bright,
The crimson bars on field of white,
And may it ever stand for right,
Beloved flag of freedom."

Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, the recent Polish congress at Buffalo gave ample proof of the unity and solidarity of Polish-Americans on the great question of Polish autonomy.

Never perhaps in the history of the Poles in this country has there been such a representative, such a solemn, and such a determined and inspired concourse of Americans of Polish blood. An intense fervor of American patriotism pervaded the gathering which left no doubt in the minds of observers that here was a group that could be depended on to the last man and woman to remain true and loyal to our own country, to be ever ready and willing to sacrifice everything for the sake of American security and American liberty.

In a word, the congress was fairly permeated with the recognition that Polish-Americans owed much to this Nation and that they were prepared, if called upon, to pay that debt. Indeed their brave sons in the armed forces have demonstrated beyond any doubt that there is no braver, nobler, stronger, or more courageous American than the Polish-American.

But the Congress was also possessed by another powerful feeling and that was the feeling that America owes something to the Polish-American in the grave crisis that presently embraces the motherland—fairness and justice in appraising her claims for the recapture of her birthright of freedom and independence, and forthrightness and candor in acting through diplomatic channels and any other method that may be available to the end that the pledges to small nations seeking and fighting for the recovery of their freedom and independence shall be kept.

This Congress must make its position clear on this vital issue. We have announced our belief in and faith in the principle of self-determination, we have encouraged our own people and other peoples to fight for it and we must do everything in our power to make sure that this battle for the right shall not be fought in vain, either in the present or future.

I have very many Polish-Americans in my district and I know and appreciate the greatness and sterling qualities of this group. They are, above all, God-fearing and law-abiding. They are industrious, thrifty, frugal, and honest. There are few sluggards among them. They respect the rights of others, they bring up their children as fine Christians and fine Americans and they seek no special favors. They are gifted and talented in the arts and in the crafts. They combine what is rare in any people, the artistic and the practical. They love their church, their families, and the institutions of America with the fiery passion born of centuries of struggle against tyranny. They love liberty because they know what it is to fight and die to achieve or protect it.

But the Polish-Americans are a determined people and they possess a strong sense of justice and a passionate love of the land and traditions of their forebears which has contributed so much to the Polish character and to America.

These people were terribly aroused by the Nazi aggression, and this feeling turned to bitter hate with the spectacle of ruthless destruction of the cities and countryside of Poland, the decimation of their monuments of culture, the cruel slaughter of their kinsmen. In these circumstances there was probably additional reason why gallant and courageous Polish boys by the hundreds of thousands flocked to the colors and can be found today in every battlefield, in the air, on and under the sea, where our American forces are fighting the enemy. Far in excess of their proportion to our total population, these Polish-American boys have been cited for valor and gallantry in action and have paid the supreme sacrifice. Surely there is no stronger, tougher, braver, more courageous fighter in all the world than our own Polish-American boy. He has won his spurs in action. He has discharged with interest his obligation of patriotism and loyalty to the country for what it has given him and his family.

But these good Polish folks also love their native land, the birthplace of their fathers and mothers. They want to see it free again. Nazi domination is detestable and base. But Russian domination is no less hateful. Communism with its traditional enmity toward religion, the home, the family, the marriage institution, freedom of thought and action, is most obnoxious of all. The Pole by nature is an individualist—a lover of creative art, free enterprise, and initiative.

Thus, is it surprising that our Polish-Americans are so disturbed and upset over the events transpiring in Europe? They observe the steady pressure of Russia on the gateway to their country—the occupation of substantial parts of it, the threats toward the remainder. They see Russian puppet governments springing up all over Europe; yes, and in the Orient, inexorably spreading Communist principles and Communist techniques to well-nigh all of the world. They note the effort to infiltrate Poland with Communist ideas—the Polish Red youth movement, the battalions of women, the propaganda of press and radio designed to woo the people of Poland and prepare them for the advent of communism.

All these things have deeply moved and gravely concerned our Polish-American friends, as indeed they must be a source of grimmest anxiety to all Americans who love human liberty and desire a peace based on justice and the right of every people to determine their form of government without outside interference, military or ideological domination.

Let us be on guard and on watch, and let us be realistic. This is not the time to be lulled into an easy-going optimism that these grave developments will take care of themselves. This is a time for Americans to recognize the limitations of their own power, but to use the power America now wields in our own interest and in the interest of the ideals for which we fight. To be just, fair, honest, and honorable with all nations, certainly should be our aim and hope. To protest injustice and work against aggression and conquest certainly is our purpose and determination.

To Poland and every other small nation threatened with extinction or ideological penetration we must hold out the willing hand of assistance and cooperation. And this Congress cannot move too quickly in these perilous days to declare and effectuate a staunch policy of Americanism at home and abroad that will command respect and enable us to preserve democratic government.

The Missouri River Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the House will soon recess, and I hope that when the Members of the States along the Missouri go home that they will look into the Missouri River problem and come back with a greater understanding of the problems which confront all of us in that area. The times call for serious thinking, and when we consider the Missouri and its tributaries we are considering one of the greatest resources that this country has. Let us talk with our neighbors and try to come back with the soundest possible idea for the future development of the Missouri, so that it will be to the benefit of all the States through which it flows.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am including an editorial concerning the Missouri taken from the Montana Standard for June 12, 1944:

SOMETHING MORE THAN VITUPERATION REQUIRED

It is a pity that there should be acrimonious contention and vituperative debate over this water problem that confronts the people of the great Missouri Valley. The problem never will be solved by villification or by attributing base and selfish motives to those with whom we do not agree. And the problem must be solved without further delay.

Many in Montana have been scanning eagerly and anxiously every word, every opinion, every suggestion that has come from our neighbors below in the hope that something will be found upon which we can agree and make a start for the solution of a tremendously vital problem.

There should be regret that some in places of community leadership believe they can bring a solution of the great problem of water by calling names. It is rather shocking that a newspaper in so fine and upstanding a metropolitan community as Kansas City should condemn the people of the Upper Valley because they insist upon their rights to the use of the waters of the Missouri.

These people always have believed it fundamental that water goes with the land. Otherwise this vast and incalculably rich area never would have been settled. With the use of water its immense resources, first of gold and silver, helped to rehabilitate this Nation financially and economically at the close of the Civil War. In a single gulch of Montana more than $75,000,000 in gold dust and nuggets was sent out to the prostrate East in the years immediately following the close of that war. Not a hundredth part of that vast treasure could have been reclaimed from the earth had no water been available. And that was only just a beginning when there were only a handful of settlers in the territory.

It is fully as regrettable that here at the top of the valley, where we are striving to protect our very existence by advancing our claims to the water, some should answer in kind and make petty threats of economic blacklisting against our neighbors below.

In our great problem, so vital to us and equally as vital to the people below who suffer from the rampages of the river, let us follow the magnificent example set for us by a great newspaper of the lower valley, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. That newspaper agrees that it is a monumental problem, that no solution can be reached unless all the divergent interests are represented and served in the ultimate decision.

We of the greatest valley in the world are one people engaged in an extraordinary variety of pursuits. We have regard for each other. Those below have no desire to wreck our fine and expanding industries. We have no desire to deny them protection from floods or to deprive them of the beneficial use of the river's waters.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch has demonstrated its high consideration for us here at the river's beginnings. Recently it published in full detail a far too lengthy dissertation from Butte on the needs and the problems of the people of Montana who are dependent upon the waters of the Missouri, although it is likely that its editors entertained some serious exceptions. That was a demonstration of good will and good faith. It was evidence of complete fairness.

We must come to an early agreement as to the control and division of this vast resource. Our hope here in Montana is that it can be done on a mutual basis, that we can reach our own agreement among the States involved, and that when such an agreement is reached, it shall be carried out by some properly created agency which must be guided and limited by the terms of the agreement. Thus the interests of all will be served and injury and loss and suffering will be stopped.

Such an agreement is in prospect. We are close to it today and we shall be closer to it tomorrow, if we can restrain our extremists. The Army engineers' plan and the Reclamation Bureau plan for the disposition of these waters together furnish us all the information that is needed.

The time for mutual recognition and common action is at hand.

Juvenile Delinquency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report of the Subcommittee on Public Health, Hospitals, and Charities of the Committee on the District of Columbia on juvenile delinquency:

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC HEALTH OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1944.

The Subcommittee on Public Health, Hospitals, and Charities of the Committee on the District of Columbia respectfully submits the following report on juvenile delinquency in the Nation's Capital.

A survey of this subject was initiated January 27, 1944, by your subcommittee, as the result of the receipt of complaints from individuals and associations, and publication of reports regarding increasing delinquency among Washington's youth.

The chairman of your subcommittee conducted lengthy hearings and made personal inspection tours of places of supervised youth activities and received the testimony and recommendations of many of the outstanding officials of the municipal government, including the juvenile court, the police, the public schools, and the Recreation and Welfare Departments, as well as leaders in church, private social agencies, Boy and Girl Scouts, the boys' club movement, and numerous interested parents.

We conclude that while Washington's suddenly swollen population has resulted in the creation of an alarming situation, that there has been an increase in delinquency and delinquency tendencies shocking enough to call for more concerted remedial and preventive efforts than have heretofore been organized by the community.

This statement is not to be taken as one denouncing modern youth for, given its proper chance and the right kind of guidance, it will stand the test, but rather is one emphasizing that the adults in charge have been remiss in providing the counsel, the sign posts, the facilities that present conditions—wartime conditions—demand.

This committee recognizes that morals, character building, and parental responsibilities cannot be created by legislative act any more than there can be by that process the inculcation in the child's mind of a proper sense of values. These come from home and church training, from proper associations, and from good organization of public and private programs and facilities, and the committee is of the opinion that the present problem, accentuated by the wartime spirit of restlessness, can be met adequately only by the effective cooperation of all related elements of the community, civic, educational, religious, receational, and social work, public and private. There are many ways in which this can be done, and we find that here and there new programs and studies have been started in the National Capital that speak well for the motives of its adult and responsible citizenry.

Your committee in its report will attempt to cover some of the causes and preventive measures, and include recommendations it believes will have a helpful effect if adopted.

EXTENT OF PROBLEM

First of all, the committee was concerned with the question of whether there had been abnormal increase in juvenile delinquency in Washington within a recent period. We found there had been an increase that was in some measure beyond that which could reasonably be attributed to an increasing population. For instance, data submitted by Maj. Edward J. Kelly, Superintendent of Police, revealed the following as the arrests of minors for offenses of all classes, including traffic violations:

Fiscal year	Male	Female	Total
1940	4,787	582	5,319
1941	6,586	549	7,135
1942	6,685	710	7,395
1943	6,439	1,006	7,445
July to October 1944	2,603	316	2,919

Arrests of juveniles for felony charges

Fiscal year	Male	Female	Total
1940	721	22	743
1941	1,666	21	1,687
1942	1,506	20	1,526
1943	1,340	110	1,450
July to October 1944	556	12	568

It might be noted that if the 4 months' period above reported were the average for the whole fiscal year, the grand total number of juvenile arrests for felonies in 1944 would be 1,704, well above any of the previous 4 years.

Children, 17 years old and under, arrested for drunkenness in public places:

Fiscal year	Male	Female	Total
1939	14	4	18
1940	9	4	13
1941	12	9	21
1943	72	5	77

Such figures as these are supported by published reports of representatives of the Department of Justice showing, for the Nation as a whole, a shocking increase in arrests of juveniles for crimes, all of which indicates we are in need of increased activities on the preventive and correctional side of the score.

HOUSING CONDITIONS

There are many causes of juvenile delinquency, and in this regard, we do not attempt to draw any line between hereditary and environmental factors, for we have reason to believe that both are of the greatest importance in considering the problem. A child born and reared in the slums might rise to great heights of achievement, if he had the proper stimulus, though the chances seem to be against it; just as a child reared amid all educational and social advantages, might—and sometimes does—go wrong. One witness before our committee made the very convincing statement:

"It is hard to be an angel in the slums."

It may be added that these studies, confirming earlier ones reported on by this committee, convinced us that insanitary and inadequate housing conditions continue unabated in the District of Columbia, and that in sections where these conditions predominate, there is a higher rate of delinquency than in others. Conspectus, overcrowding, insanitation, conditions that depress the opportunity for the development of good sound social values, serve as a breeding ground for delinquency, as well as disease.

Since this subject is under a comprehensive study by another committee of Congress, which is expected to soon make positive, detailed recommendations, we leave the question there except as to a reminder that slum-clearance action is vital.

MENTAL DISORDERS

It appears to this committee that one of the most crying needs of the District is a more progressive and better financed system of meeting the problems of juveniles who are mentally substandard. The established District institutions supposedly meeting this problem are inadequate and understaffed. This situation is recognized by some District officials, but action comes so belatedly that the problem always is ahead of performance, and the war priorities situation has intruded to further delay corrective construction programs. Perhaps Congress, too, has a responsibility in this, for there is nothing new in this situation. District officials may not have shouted loudly enough, but Congress perhaps should have heard the call earlier.

Leaving blame and generalities aside, it is painfully apparent that the District now lacks, and for a considerable time has lacked, adequate facilities for housing an appreciable portion of mentally deficient persons who should have institutional care. The District Training School for Feeble Minded at Laurel, Md., is not only inadequate as to housing and other facilities but it is lacking in sufficient personnel to control the situation, judging from the unquestioned reports of the number of "escapes" and the lack of control of inmates who cannot be left to their own resources.

Welfare Director Ray L. Huff frankly reports that the Laurel institution is filled to capacity, that there is a certified list of 350 who should be placed there but for whom there is no room and to whom no District care can now be given; that there is probably a much larger list needing care but not yet certified; that, largely due to improper facilities and inadequate numbers of supervisory personnel, some 300 former inmates of this institution are now at large.

We regard these circumstances as a sad commentary on the District situation. We submit that this problem has been accentuated by the critical materials situation and the wartime labor shortage, but we find that it was existent, apparently in large measure, before the United States entered the war.

On the same subject, though differently related, it should be stated that testimony before the committee highlighted the lack of scientific planning as to case finding and treatment of incipient cases of mental disturbance among school children in the District. The newly but tentatively established guidance clinic of the juvenile court, which was described at the time of its inception last October by Judge Fay L. Bentley, as a major step in coping with the problems of child delinquency, is threatened with short life, for no provision was made in the 1945 District Budget for its continuance. We recommend funds should be provided for its continuation. Likewise, the Commissioners have refused approval of funds sought by the Health Department for the proposed establishment of a psychiatric clinic under that Department to deal with the problems of substandard mental cases on a city-wide basis. Support for our views that such funds should be provided is found in our record of hearings in testimony by Ray L. Everett, of the Social Hygiene Society, by Welfare Director Ray

Huff, and Robert L. Haycock, the superintendent of schools. The latter, speaking of the need to expand the "adjustment classes" in the public-school system, emphasized this necessity for those people who are a "little off center" or a "little out of step" with their classmates.

VOLUNTEER PREVENTIVE MEASURES

It was indicated in testimony before this committee that many segments of Washington's civic life have been aware of the problems of juvenile unrest, and many constructive steps already have been taken. This applies to voluntary groups even more so than to public agencies. The principal lack to date has been an effective coordination of public and private efforts though there has been progress along this line in the past year.

For instance, the Council of Social Agencies has been making studies, the board of education has established a city-wide representative committee, and certain church groups have been outstandingly active in regard to the problem. Supplementing this, church, public, and private social welfare groups have been promoting remedial programs, many of which seem to strike at the roots of the condition. If there has been a lack of proper and effective city-wide organization, there has not been a lack of appreciation on the part of enlightened leaders of the gravity of the problem they faced, nor their dedication to serve in its solution.

Parent-teacher groups, social workers, religious leaders, boys' clubs, Boy and Girl Scouts, social hygiene experts, police officials, juvenile court officials, among others, have pondered the problem. Organization of special delinquency committees in each school has been suggested, community groups have been proposed and in some cases established to deal with the situation, parents and teachers have consulted, schoolhouse canteens have been set up to conduct supervised dance and play activities; proposals have been offered to extend hours of service by public libraries as a means of affording worth while free entertainment.

DIFFICULTIES FACED

While the above-stated programs are directed to the right purpose, they are confronted with obvious difficulties. War demands have taken many trained workers from the juvenile court, from the District Recreation Department, from all and sundry staffs where trained personnel are needed. Probably there is justifiable need for deferments in numerous cases but the priority of demands of the war are so compelling we can but suggest that temporarily there must be improvization, substitution, and replacement organized as best it may be. As an expression of profound faith, we voice our belief that American zeal and ingenuity will fill the gaps and effectively function.

SOURCES OF CONSTRUCTIVE AID

It is the belief of this committee that organization and operation of neighborhood councils, with the cooperation of parent-teacher groups, as suggested by school authorities, will prove helpful when inspired by broad principles and kept clear of personal issues.

Numerous church and socially minded groups already have promoted interesting and wholesome recreational or character-building programs that are providing splendid activities for leisure time. School Superintendent Haycock suggests leadership, so far as possible, by teachers and other school employees in guidance of the leisure-time activities of school children, expansion of recreation-supervision programs of the school system, assignment of more teachers as youth counselors, extension of adjustment classes for maladjusted pupils, and extension of public library facilities as a means of affording interesting and worth-while leisure time for youth pursuits.

We are convinced that one of the main factors contributing to juvenile delinquency is the lack of religious education and inspiration both for the child and the parents. Testimony presented to this committee indicated a much too small percentage of our boys and girls were regular attendants of Sunday schools. One of the reasons for this probably rests in the indifference of parents with respect to religious activities.

Within the past 2 years the board of education has more deeply realized the seriousness of the juvenile-delinquency problem. Surveys were conducted which disclosed that about 25 percent of the boys and girls found in some measure of trouble came from homes in which both the father and mother have positions. This war-aggravated situation is one of the most difficult with which to deal, for most of such parental employment has a patriotic motive transcending the pay, yet in many cases it leaves the child or children without proper parental guidance, for which there can be no comparable substitute.

As a result of this survey, efforts are being made to provide guidance for leisure-time activities of school-age children through extension of supervised recreation; however, as yet this has fallen short of the goal. One of the attractive features inaugurated in junior high schools has been the school "canteens" which includes free movies, dances, and refreshments. Under proper supervision these social functions could go far in providing a healthful usage of youthful energy, while providing wholesome fun. While there were questions as to whether there should be any charge for such events, staged in a public school buiding, the answer of witnesses was that these were extra-curricular affairs and that the children, or their parents, were quite willing to pay for what they wanted, especially for dance music and other entertainment.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

Economic security is receiving the serious consideration of the Federal and District authorities, and it is something which requires the efforts of the entire community to accomplish. For years local and Federal authorities have been working with the problem of housing, and slowly but surely low-cost housing has been made available to people in the lower income groups. The Hébert bill, streamlining the District government and giving more authority to the Board of Commissioners, is expected to bring about quicker action on numerous municipal matters which now are delayed until Congress passes individually on them. This legislation should improve the functioning of the District government.

Juvenile delinquency is not something which occurs overnight. It starts in the home and is progressive. After the child starts to school the teacher is the one who first notices its antisocial behavior, and it is her duty not only to try to correct it—in classes of not more than 25 to 30—and to see what she can do in connection with the home, but to bring to the attention of the school doctor anything that she feels should be remedied.

Along with the schools come the clubs. You have the Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, Police Boys Club, and so forth; and whenever the teacher finds that the student is not interested in club work, she should do something to encourage interest. There, again, the teacher needs to work closely with the parents.

Your regulatory agencies do not take charge until after a child becomes a delinquent, and from then on it is the duty of the regulatory agency to cooperate with the teacher and with the family.

In regard to economic conditions, if a child is in a neighborhood where they normally have good regulations, good police protection, and a high standard of family life, these will all have a tendency to keep the child in line. However, if the economic condition of the family is near or below the subsistence level, the problem is greatly aggravated.

CAUSES OF DELINQUENCY

The following were found by your committee as being among the factors contributing to juvenile delinquency:

1. In many homes both the mother and father have jobs. Consequently, their children lack proper parental supervision and training.

2. Broken homes, with father in war service, or mother in full-time employment, brothers or sisters away from home—any of which circumstances may cause attitudes of unrest or uncertainty in the impressionable child.

3. Children employed under unwholesome conditions that limit educational progress or expose them to immoral habits.

4. Migration of family groups into Washington, particularly those from the South, where children have been uprooted from familiar and perhaps more comfortable surroundings to be lodged in congested inadequate housing.

5. Attendance at dance halls, beer parlors, and other places of commercial amusement where constructive supervision is lacking.

6. The war-aroused general spirit of excitement, anxiety, tension, and adventure—which is felt by all, but probably to a more compelling degree by the youth than by adults—and which is reflected in disregard of discipline, especially by those who have not had the advantage of considered care.

7. The ease with which today's youth earns "big money" with the pupil sometimes making a higher wage than his teacher and, in too many instances, without having adequate training in how to spend or save his earnings. While the easy-money problem is definitely war related, the committee regard it as highly important, and one that will not necessarily pass with the ending of the war.

8. The easy-going performance of the District Alcoholic Beverage Control Board which, in the face of increasing problems of enforcement, has invoked fewer suspensions and revocations of permits than in former years, without any justifiable showing that, despite wartime increases in population and growing shortages of potable supplies, there is a reduced desire for drink or created greater respect for regulations.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Your committee then come to these recommendations:

1. That District recreation facilities, seriously curtailed by war activities, should be expanded and that all possible steps should be taken to make fuller use of existing facilities. Included in the latter reference is nighttime use of public-school buildings where there is a showing of a substantial number of interested persons and where necessary supervision can be provided.

2. That funds be provided for continuation of the psychiatric clinic at the juvenile court.

3. That funds be provided for creation of a Department of Mental Hygiene.

4. That action be taken by school authorities, and other city officials, if necessary, to bring about full cooperation by owners of all movie houses and other places of amusement to bar children of school age from such places during school hours, unless accompanied by parents or guardians.

5. That municipal officials and others use all legitimate means to secure adequate and proper facilities for the District's Industrial Home Schools and the Training School for Feeble Minded as soon as the war priorities situation will permit.

6. That programs of enlistment and training of substitute recreation leaders, in public and private organizations, be initiated to fill the places of men and women who have embarked on war services.

7. That there be created by formal appointments by the Commissioners a District Juvenile Commission to serve as a clearinghouse for pertinent data on problems of children and as a fact-finding and advisory body to suggest constructive programs to the District Commissioners and to Congress, and to public and private agencies dealing with the problems.

This commission should include representatives of established organizations now at work on the problems, such as the public schools system, the Board of Public Welfare, the Health Department, the Council of Social Agencies, the Washington Federation of Churches, the Federation of Citizens' Associations, the Federation of Civic Associations, the juvenile court, the District Recreation Department, the Social Hygiene Society, the Boy and Girl Scouts, the boys' clubs, and the parent-teacher associations.

We feel the District government should provide any reasonable and necessary expenses to cover payment of clerical help to enable the Commission to conduct its correspondence, compile factual data, and outline its recommendations.

Since this would not be an operating agency, but an advisory group, it does not appear there would be needed any considerable appropriation and probably the needs of secretarial help could be provided by loans of secretarial or clerical help on a part-time basis from one or more of the District agencies, but if formal authorization and appropriations were found necessary, we ask the Commissioners to prepare and forward them. We hold that the prospective result of coordinated advice and efforts would far outweigh the contemplated minor cost of perhaps $5,000 to $10,000 a year.

The Board of Education already has made a start in this direction with the creation of an advisory committee on juvenile problems, which includes representatives of various public and private agencies. Our proposal is not intended to disparage the work of that advisory committee but rather to make it possible for a more formally recognized and permanent agency, to be named by the District Commissioners, to operate on an even more effective basis. Perhaps the city heads will find it desirable to merge the existing committee into the commission hereinbefore proposed.

8. That the requests of the Commissioners for funds for employment of additional playground leaders be approved.

9. That the requests of the Commissioners for employment of seven additional inspectors for the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board be approved, with the hope that this increase in the Board's own staff will enable it to obtain a more intimate knowledge of what is happening in some of its licensed places.

10. That the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board consult its record on the question of whether or not it has been too lenient with licensees who have been careless as to their regard for the letter and the spirit of the law—a liberal law which should be strictly enforced as the best means of preventing a return of prohibition with all its evils.

11. That all members of the District Board of Public Welfare make frequent inspections of District welfare institutions operating under their direction, particularly those dealing with juveniles, to assure a personal knowledge of conditions over which they exercise control.

Something About Winchell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, Winchell has had many things to say about many people. The people should have an opportunity of reading something about him written by a fellow New Yorker, who should know whereof he writes. The release is as follows:

WINCHELL GETS A TASTE OF HIS OWN MEDICINE

NEW YORK.—Walter Winchell, who publicly admits to being the country's outstanding reporter of gossip and scandal, becomes the victim of his own device—gets a taste of his own medicine—in a 52-page booklet just published in which he is handed his own species of "scallions" and is accused of being a "dupe of Axis agents," a promoter of "Hitler's divide-and-conquer strategy," and a leading figure in an asserted home-front plot to impose totalitarian government on the United States.

It is also charged in the booklet that Winchell is the "mouthpiece" for an "un-American gestapo," and the "press-agent stooge" of a smear bund.

The booklet, which prys into Winchell's private affairs, probes his public pronouncements, reviews his "checkered" career and declares that he is powerful and dangerous and a menace to America, is authored by Joseph P. Kamp, New York publicist, who has been excoriated by Winchell principally as a collaborator of Congressman MARTIN DIES.

Entitled, in sly and bitter humor, "With Lotions of Love * * *" the booklet is published by the Constitutional Educational League, Inc., of which Mr. Kamp is a vice chairman. The League was organized by war veterans in 1919 under the sponsorship of President William Howard Taft and Gen. Leonard Wood and is known nationally for its militant opposition to un-American activities and for its exposés of Communists, Fascists, and Nazis.

"With Lotions of Love * * *" picks up the Winchell saga where other biographers have left off. It gives time, place, and unrestricted detail of asserted incidents in the career of "America's No. 1 newsboy." "It is certain to raise Winchell's blood pressure as well as the reader's eyebrows," the author said in a statement.

The booklet declares that "Winchell, as a Naval officer, is a joke," and then proceeds to tell in detail how little he knows about the Navy and recites the unbelievable story of his "active" service record. It points out that, contrary to Winchell's public statements, he had requested "deferred status" because "he believes he can best serve interests of Navy by remaining in an inactive status."

Winchell's slurs against the Army are also highlighted together with the charge that his "propaganda" has been branded as "detrimental to the war effort" by Military Intelligence.

Winchell's one-man campaign against Congress is given particular attention with special emphasis on his controversy with Congressman DIES, and his passages-at-arms with Representatives RANKIN and HOFFMAN.

While admitting that Winchell is "probably not a Communist," the author asserts that he is "much worse than a Communist" and in support of his accusation enumerates some of the columnist's acts and items which are asserted to have helped the Communist cause.

In releasing the booklet Mr. Kamp declared: "For 20 years Winchell has perpetrated a ludicrous and mischievous hoax. Numerous articles and several books have been written about him and his mean and malicious scandalmongering. While all of these previous writings have been factual in content, most of them have presented Winchell as nothing more sinister than an illiterate boor . . . a dull fellow, with a penchant for smart-alecky wisecracking, who generally amused his 130,000,000 American betters by a frank confession of peeping under drawn blinds and sniffing at social garbage cans.

"My purpose is to allow the American people to see for the first time this jester to the court of bad taste stripped of his cap and bells so that they may judge for themselves whether his wartime antics are those of a clown or a conspirator."

In a preface to his booklet, Mr. Kamp identifies Winchell as an important and vociferous agent of a home front underground movement seeking to impose a totalitarian form of government on the people of the United States.

This movement, according to the booklet, is headed by a powerful group of internationalists whose politico-sociological scheming involves high personages in official Washington. This movement, the booklet discloses, is aided and abetted by a smear bund which maintains an un-American Gestapo to snoop on the American people and to spy on representative patriotic organizations.

The Dies committee is cataloged as a Fascist outfit, the booklet charges, and Little Business Men of America, the Racquet Club, the Republican Club, the Prayer League of America, the United States Police Reserve Association, the Society of the Cincinnati, and the International Catholic Truth Society, among others, are named as subversive organizations in the secret files.

"Investigation further discloses," the author declares, "that a listing of borderline subversive groups includes the American Bar Association, the Republican National Committee, the National Association of Manufacturers, the Knights of Columbus, the National Americanism Commission of the American Legion, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars."

The heavily documented material in "With Lotions of Love * * *" is taken mainly from two chapters of Mr. Kamp's forthcoming book Un-American Gestapo.

Refugee Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement prepared by me for presentation before the House Committee on Immigration, June 21, 1944. The meeting was canceled because of the heavy legislative program. It follows:

I appear to record my unqualified support of the measures under consideration before this distinguished committee today. So far as the various bills are concerned, it does not matter to me which one, or which combination of any of them, you may decide to support so long as the historic American principle of asylum is enunciated and speedily adopted by the committee. There is not, and should not be, any partisan, or even nationalistic, considerations attached to these measures. They seek to permit a great humane salvation of thousands of our fellow-beings who have felt the cruel lash of unspeakable tyranny and persecution—men, women, and children sorely afflicted and grievously mistreated solely because of their race, their religion, their political views, or simply because they were caught in the tragic network of global war.

It so happens that predominantly our Jewish brethren have been the chief and most conspicuous sufferers from the oppression and bestiality of ruthless zealots. But other races and other faiths have also been visited with a form of intoleration and brutality which has few parallels in the annals of history. To make matters worse, these Jewish people because of the faithlessness of a selfish international diplomacy which engineered the defeat of the abrogation of the white paper have been denied harbor and refuge in their own lawfully constituted national homeland of Palestine. Barred even from their own ancient native land, driven from pillar to post, these pitiful victims are forced to wander as exiles over the face of the earth, turned away from every haven of safety, starving, and destitute and homeless.

Other races and faiths, including the Italians, the Polish, the French, and others, have suffered a similar fate—their homes destroyed, their fortunes stolen, their earthly possessions pilfered, their innocent children slaughtered before their very eyes. All these unfortunates look to America—to us, with hopeful hearts to save them from a destiny more cruel than death—enslavement and torture.

We cannot fail them. Not only as Americans whose country has traditionally held out the hand of refuge and comfort to the afflicted and the persecuted, but as human beings whose hearts must be deeply moved by this sight of suffering and barbarous punishment, we must perform our sacred duty to mankind. We must not turn these people away from the last door upon which they can knock for shelter and a chance to live. We must let them in; we must bind their wounds; we must give them shelter in our midst—all of them who suffer indescribable anguish and tearfully pray for deliverance from tyranny and injustice.

This does not mean that we will have to discard our present immigration laws, nor that we will unwisely multiply the social and unemployment problems of the post-war period. We can stipulate, as these measures do, that when the war is over and conquered territories have again been liberated, these people will be returned to their own countries.

Members of the committee—tomorrow may be too late. Every day sees thousands of these victims slain, tortured, driven to madness or a slow death by starvation. In the name of humanity and mercy, in the name of Him who died for the salvation of mankind, let us take these sufferers to our own secure homeland. I urge you with all my heart, I plead with you with all my earnestness and strength—report these measures at once and demonstrate to the whole world, particularly to the crazed tyrants who have perpetrated these outrages, that the soul of America is as kindly and human as its sword is invincible and mighty.

I have every confidence that to a man you will harken to the pleas of humanity.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, for the opportunity to be heard.

Pledge to the War Wounded

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARY T. NORTON
OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Malvina Lindsay, from the Washington Post of January 15, 1944:

THE GENTLER SEX

(By Malvina Lindsay)

PLEDGE TO THE WAR WOUNDED

(For a woman at home)

I will begin now faithfully and prayerfully training myself for the test of battle I am soon to meet—that of welcoming back the war wounded and making them feel that it is home as usual.

If I see a maimed serviceman on the streets, I will firmly stifle any urge to stare curiously, or to turn away with the slightest gesture of shrinking, or to let even a shadow of commiseration cross my face. I will summon all the sensitivity of mind and aristocracy of soul I possess, and give him the usual, matter-of-fact glance I would give any stranger.

I will never, under any circumstances, be so boorish and unfeeling as to ask any serviceman about his wounds or to seek to draw him out on his battle experiences.

I will never, in a public place, comment to a companion, even in a whisper, about a serviceman whose battle injuries are apparent. I will realize that even though he may not see or hear me, his acute sensitivity will make him unhappily aware that he is a subject of attention.

I will never let the term, "Poor fellow" pass my lips—or abide for a moment in my thoughts—in connection with a battle-scarred serviceman.

If anyone I know or love lies wounded in a far-away hospital, I will not write him dishearteningly or too curiously and anxiously, but will rather try to make him feel that I am not unduly worried or alarmed and am not attaching too much importance to the physical afflictions he has suffered. I will try to communicate to him my calm, cheerful, and hopeful acceptance of whatever has befallen him.

If any member of my family returns partly whole from this war, I will make it my major undertaking to see that he is treated as far as possible as a completely whole and normal person.

For the sake of all those men in my orbit of life who may return home sick or wounded in body or mind, I will cultivate in myself the habit of cheerfulness. I will cherish about me joy, laughter, and gayety, both now and later, knowing that these things often have more curative value than medicine.

I will determinedly root out of my own nature any neurotic, shrinking attitude toward those who bear the permanent marks of battle. I will train myself to regard these scars with reverence as testimonials of human courage and character.

I will constantly remind myself of the mental achievements of great men and women who have been physically handicapped. I will remember St. Paul the Apostle, the lame Queen of Sheba, the blind Homer and the blind Milton, the deaf Beethoven, the crippled Alexander Pope, the invalid Stevenson—and I will also remember that one of the foremost figures right now in world leadership, who is also the President of the United States, attained his distinctions under physical handicaps as severe as most wounded veterans will return with.

I will try to meet this test of battle behind the lines with as much courage and steadfastness as the brave men who incurred these wounds displayed at the battle front to guarantee to me the way of life I now enjoy.

Termination of War Contracts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH MRUK
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. MRUK. Mr. Speaker, "the day is rapidly approaching when primary responsibility for settlement of terminated war contracts must rest squarely upon war contractors and subcontractors themselves, rather than upon any agency of the Federal Government." I am quoting Mr. Paul Engstrum, a nationally known consultant, industrial engineer, and authority on contract termination and on Government and war contractors' procedures. He is the director of the contract termination division of a well-known firm of Federal consultants in Washington, D. C.

Mr. Engstrum has told me, so rapidly has the War Department moved to reinforce its organization for handling settlements of canceled contracts and in setting up policies and procedures for termination boards to follow, that in the near future it may become practically current in disposing of such cases. In the meantime it is urging contractors themselves to get their organizations in readiness for the day when the present trickle of contract cancelations mounts into a tidal wave.

Up to the present, termination settlements have been relatively small in relation to total war production. W. P. B. Chairman Donald Nelson, giving what he termed a "realistic view" of the war-contract situation, said recently that the Government's outstanding obligation for goods still to be delivered totaled about $75,000,000,000, or "considerably more" than the 1943 production.

A second big fact—

Said Mr. Nelson—

is that out of $210,000,000,000 in prime contracts placed by Government since June 1940, the face value of contracts terminated up to April of this year totaled only $22,000,000,000.

Most of these canceled contracts were swiftly replaced by contracts for different models of the same product.

Thus, while a few terminations have been coming through almost daily, the great flood of them will pour out over the country on "X-day," the day Germany falls.

Steps have been taken to make holders of America's more than 2,000,000 prime and sub contracts for war goods "termination-minded." These include the following:

First. The setting up of "termination units" within individual companies holding war prime and sub contracts. This plan has the backing of both the War Department and the United States Chamber of Commerce. It is designated to help companies prepare the way for sudden cancelations which might come in a large quantity at any time. Once these units are properly organized, they are expected to help both their own organizations and the Government termination agencies dispose of cancelation problems.

Second. The War Department is having certain personnel trained in termination procedure by the United States Office of Education.

Third. Streamlining of Army policies to make termination as speedy and as final as possible. One of the latest of these policies is the constant revision of General Procurement Regulation No. 15 to bring them up to date with changes in termination legislation and surplus property acts. For example, the Army has just announced that it has revised the procedure governing the review of contract-termination settlements for smaller contractors. Whereas, formerly each proposed settlement agreement involving the payment of more than $5,000—excluding payment for completed items or work at the contract price—had to be examined by a War Department advisory panel before final settlement could be concluded, the revised regulation raises to $25,000 the minimum value of a contract which must be reviewed by a settlement board before final termination payments can be made.

The Army has announced that termination claims of $171,000,000 have been settled. The surplus property resulting from these terminations has been sold or disposed of in new war contracts, and $133,000,000,000 actually have been paid out by the War Department in final settlements. These payments cleared off $2,000,000,000 in face amount of canceled contracts on which claims have been made. Over two and one-half billion dollars of additional contracts were settled without any claims at all.

However, it is estimated that war contractors still are entitled to claim more than one-half billion dollars in settlement of fixed-price contracts which already have been terminated. Up to the 1st of May, only a little more than $130,000,000 of these unsettled claims actually had been filed. The Army feels that it is vital that this job be speeded up by industry in general. To get paid, the contractors' claims must be properly submitted in detail.

To obtain a settlement from the Government on a terminated contract, a contractor must present all facts on which a negotiated settlement can be based. The primary facts are: First, a complete inventory of all property for which reimbursement is expected, and second, a complete statement of costs allocable to the terminated contract. Hence, the Contractors Termination Organization must be manned by responsible officers of their own company, who should in turn be advised by termination consultants, in order to be able to prepare these facts accurately and speedily.

In many quarters in official Washington, stress is being placed on this aspect of the demobilization job: When termination comes, industry must be prepared. War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes disclosed recently that instructions will go out to all war contractors within the next 30 days, notifying them of the percentage cutbacks which will be applied to them at the end of the European war.

Mr. Byrnes emphasized to a special Senate committee that delay in the settlement of terminated contracts will greatly aggravate transition to peacetime employment and if delay is to occur "Then we might as well immediately provide for a huge public works program."

Outlining comprehensive steps which have been taken by Army procurement officials to curtail military production immediately upon the collapse of Germany, the War Mobilization Director said that the Army already has prepared a revision of its current supply program to be put into effect on the day Hitler surrenders. These revised procurement schedules have been made available to W. P. B. The Army shortly will make these tables available to its field offices, and contractors will thus be able to get an inkling of proposed reductions in their orders in time to cushion the effect of termination on their organization.

Official statements from Washington war agencies continue to emphasize the need for termination preparedness at the company level. This is necessary if executives are to avoid expensive and unnecessary delays in winding up their business with the Government. Primarily, the job is viewed from official sources as one of education, to make industry aware of what must be done. The problem is complicated by the fact that the whole procurement process filters through prime contractors, through thousands of subcontractors, and in turn to the suppliers of the subcontractors.

An authoritative spokesman for the Army made the following statement in connection with adjustments of production cut-back and the termination of war contracts:

> The effective utilization of manpower, facilities, and materials in the production of supplies and equipment of the Army of the United States requires constant planning. Changes in production programs are necessary as the war progresses from one stage to another. It is vitally important that we make these changes if lives are not to be unduly sacrificed and the taxpayers' money is not to be spent for munitions which have become obsolete or semiobsolete because of changes in enemy tactics, terrain, or climatic conditions. Such changes can have serious consequences upon living conditions and employment in particular areas. It is, therefore, essential that all reductions in programs and cancelations of contracts be given careful consideration.

The implications of the contract termination job for American industry are staggering when viewed in the aggregate. War expenditures are running at a daily rate of more than $300,000,000. Schedules call for nearly $69,000,000,000 in arms production for 1944. This represents an average monthly rate of 20 percent over last year.

A sudden cancelation of even a portion of these huge war contracts will come as a rude shock to the companies holding them. Yet such a prospect is exactly what industry faces on X-day, when the European military campaign is finished and the Allied war machine can turn its attention to the Pacific. A reduction in over-all military equipment needs of from 35 to 50 percent is forecast for the period immediately after the fall of Germany, and this country's war plants will bear the brunt of this reduction.

On the assumption that, on the average, industry is 2 months ahead of deliveries in its expenditures for production, the amount of claims which would be filed if all contracts were terminated would be one-sixth of $69,000,000,000, or about $11,300,000,000. If industry, on the average, is 3 months ahead of deliveries, the amount of claims would be one-fourth of $69,000,000,000, or roughly, $17,000,000,000.

Despite the magnitude of this termination problem, the miiltary services are doing everything possible to protect the contractor. More information on cutbacks will shortly be available. Encouragement is given the establishment of company termination units and the training of men to staff them. With continued cooperation the jol of transition to a civilian economy need not be insurmountable.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, in this solemn hour when our Government has apparently in effect broken diplomatic relations with little Finland I wish to extend my sympathy to the Finnish people of this Nation.

Finland has for many years demonstrated a fine moral honesty that might well be emulated by other nations. Without fail she has met her obligations on her national debt to this country. In many other respects this brave nation has given us proof of the high character of her people, their love of freedom and democracy and their willingness to die to preserve her birthright of free men and women.

It is urged by our Government that Finland fights against one of our allies. It might well be mentioned that that ally fights against only one of our major enemies and still retains friendly relations with the nation that attacked us. But in any event, I deplore the fact that Finland, or any other nation, should have punitive action taken against it by this Government simply because she fights to protect herself against aggression and seeks to preserve her boundaries and her territory from unwarranted invasion. If the principle of self-determination is to have any substantial meaning, if the words of the Atlantic Charter are sincerely put, if our pronouncements of freedom, liberty, and democracy are to be something more than hollow echoes, our Nation cannot logically take sides for any reason, or on any pretext, against a brave people struggling for their existence, their lives, and their independence.

It is bad enough that Finland should be invaded and conquered; but it is worse that she should be made the victim against her will and by the force of arms of a deliberate communistic infiltration. I sincerely trust that the long-time policy of this American Government will not subscribe to this most unfortunate result. I hope that our State Department will reconsider this grave question and give Finland as a free and independent nation the recognition she deserves. This course will be pleasing and gratifying to all true lovers of freedom but most of all to the very many American citizens of Finnish descent in our midst whose loyalty to America and whose contributions to American life are certainly not exceeded by any other group in the Nation.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article by John O'Donnell from the Washington Times-Herald:

CAPITOL STUFF

(By John O'Donnell)

As might well be expected, the Soviet Embassy here and the thick red line of F. D. R.'s fourth-term backers, led by Comrade Browder and Mr. Sidney Hillman of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, are delighted over the State Department's ouster of Finland's minister to the United States, Hjalmar Procope, and three of his aides, along with their immediate families.

With considerable smug satisfaction, some of the worthy gentry in the State Department are now announcing that the removal of the popular Finnish minister from this Capital "has closed up the last Axis listening post in Washington."

But so far as we have been able to discover, Moscow has no intention of shutting down Japan's listening post in Moscow.

For some strange reason, the State Department at first was very coy or jittery (or perhaps it was just honest ignorance) when it came to discussing the make-up of the Japanese staff in Moscow which is naturally interested in digging up all the military information possible about the effectiveness of the American-made 10,000 airplanes, 5,600 tanks, etc., etc., that we have poured into Russia.

But finally after a 24-hour interval the Department came through with a list of the Japs on the watch in Moscow, as of last month.

Our enemies, the Japs, have a very effective and large staff of expects in their diplomatic business of keeping on good terms with the Russians and quite properly digging up our military secrets.

Shrewd Naotake Sato is Tokyo's Ambassador in Moscow. His opposite number, the Soviet Ambassador to Tokyo, is Jacques Alexandrovich Malik.

The top men in Japan's set-up in Moscow form a spy bureau which is impressive to our military and naval men who have met them in peacetime.

The Jap Army experts in Moscow are directed by Col. C. Yabe and Maj. K. Nokhara—or were in May when last word was received here from the enemy listening post.

Naval Attaché Capt. S. Yamaguchi and his aides, including Capt. M. Fumoto, are very busy picking up what they can learn about our Navy secrets and plans and shooting the information under diplomatic secrecy back to the Jap Imperial Staff in Tokyo.

The list of Japs in Moscow is well salted down with experts in aviation and espionage. The latest list showed the presence in Russia of these top-flight Jap agents, career men in the legalized art of spying when carried out under diplomatic immunity:

Minister-Counselor G. Morinima, Counselor Kameyama, Secretaries Takeuchi, Kawasaki, Yukhani, Akivama, Takakhasi, and the big-shot undercover experts, designated as attachés, Umenuro, Komuro, and Kawamata.

So far as Washington has been able to discover, Pal Joey Stalin is very sot in his ways when it comes to moving him with the plea that American admirals and generals would feel a lot better and safer if Stalin's Jap guests in Moscow were given a diplomatic heave-ho and gently ushered away from their listening posts where they are industriously laboring to gather and ship back to Japan the hottest United States military secrets.

We've politely intimated to Pal Joey that the presence of Japanese army and military experts in a spot where they can get ripe and valuable information on our American equipment shipped to Russia may mean the death of American fighting men in Burma, or in the Southwest Pacific under General MacArthur, or in the broad Pacific command of Admiral Nimitz.

Pal Joey has just puffed on his pipe and smiled. He put on the pressure for us to boot out the Finns. We did. We renewed our request that he play ball and oust from Moscow our enemies, the Japs.

Pal Joey has given us the diplomatic grin, the Russian shrug, and sits tight.

When general resentment flared up in Congress against the manner in which the State Department had handled "L'Affaire Procope" there was a buzz of inspired whispers from our worthy diplomats.

The gist of this behind the hand whispering was that Procope was too friendly with Senators and Congressmen who simply don't like the Roosevelt administration.

Coming down to specific cases, one of these inspired whispers from on high was that Procope had tipped off certain Senators (Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire among them) that this Government was turning over to Stalin our cruiser Milwaukee.

Well, we took the trouble to run this whisper down. The one gentleman who should know, because he proclaimed it on the floor of the Senate, is positive (and this is the highest authority) that he didn't get the news from Procope, never spoke to Procope about it, but did get it on separate occasions from two high ranking officers in the United States Navy.

"In the long run," observed one of our distinguished Senators yesterday, "in the long run, I repeat, the people of Finland are going to receive more respect and admiration from the people of the United States than a lot of these fourth-term strategists up on Pennsylvania Avenue."

Well, we remember that back in the days when we were writing sports, the Finns were mighty good long distance runners. We recalled the piece we once wrote about Paavo Nurmi. But that was a long time ago. And the smooth perfection of the legs of those brother Finns—Willie and Hans Kolehmainen. And that was a long, long time ago. But in the "long run," as the Senator observed, we're betting on the Finns.

We whole-heartedly agree with those brave words of President Roosevelt when he rebuked the pinkish American Youth Conference on the White House lawn, back in '40 when they hailed the red aggression of Finland.

Said F. D. R. of Finland that afternoon.

"Here is a small republic in northern Europe. A republic which, without any question whatever, wishes solely to maintain its own territorial and governmental integrity.

"Nobody with any pretense of common sense believes that Finland had any ulterior designs on the Soviet Union.

"American sympathy is 90 percent with the Finns in their effort to stave off invasion of their own soil. That American sympathy by now is axiomatic.

"The Soviet Union, as a matter of practical fact, as everybody knows, who has the courage to face the fact, the practical fact known to you and known to all the world, is run by a dictatorship as absolute as any other dictatorship in the world.

"It has invaded a neighbor so infinitesimally small that it could do no conceivable, possible harm to the Soviet Union. A small Nation that seeks only to live at peace as a democracy, and a liberal, forward-looking democracy at that."

Father's Day, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at Immanuel Presbyterian Church, Cleveland:

There is a peculiar poignancy to this particular June day for all of us. Our hearts are torn with the ever-present thought of what the invasion is bringing to our fighting forces. Death and suffering will be the fate of many. Courage and fortitude are and will be the need of all.

We have come together here in this church to find the courage we, too, need in this hour, as well as to remind ourselves and each other of some of the deep realities that underlie all our living. One of these realities is the valiant way in which the fathers of the world are carrying their hearts' sadness. So much is said of the sorrow of the mothers of the world, so little has been said of fathers. Let us stop a moment on this Sunday morning and consider those things that we know are in their hearts. One can readily imagine the deep sense of personal failure and disillusion in the hearts of our American fathers who fought in the First World War and whose sons are fighting today.

There are 244 Members of Congress who have sons and daughters in the armed services, and in our private and informal meetings many of them express the sorrow that they guard in public. They watch the war and try to know the war. Many have had an understanding of war drawn from their experience 26 years ago, but their understanding of war never gave them an understanding of this kind of war, which is a war of steel against flesh.

In some ways war is harder on fathers than it is on mothers. A father places all his dreams in the life of his son. It is for a better life for his son that a father labors, and a son is, for many fathers, all the immortality they expect to have. So it is hard on those fathers who fought in the "war to end war" to have to see their sons go off to fight again.

SUGGESTION TO FATHERS

My suggestion to fathers who have a feeling of compulsion to do something more than the ordinary in helping with the war effort is to take on some of the boys of the neighborhood, get up baseball games for them, and set up a workshop for them where they can be busy making things.

Some mothers don't see the man's point of view. There is no one who can take the place of a father who has gone to war, but at least the young sons of soldier fathers are better off when they have the benefit of a man's counsel.

As for our boys in the service, we should in every way give them strength, courage, and fortitude. Our churches must be vital centers, not of tradition, but of truth. This is what the boys expect of them. And so many soldiers have told me that the form of religion doesn't really matter to them any more; what really matters to them is what the form symbolizes. They have come to recognize that truth exists in many garments, that it may be found in the heart of a Chinese, a Hindu, or an African, as well as in their own kind of people.

We must not fail the boys when they come home. Our soldiers and our young people will have little patience if we do not carry through to the end. Our responsibility is to encourage our boys, to meet their needs, and, when they come home, to make them feel that tomorrow's world will be their world.

Address of Hon. James C. Auchincloss, of New Jersey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. EATON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an address delivered by my distinguished colleague, Mr. AUCHINCLOSS, of New Jersey, on June 20, at the annual luncheon of the Better Business Bureau of Washington.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS is chairman of the Better Business Bureau of New York City and for many years has been a national leader in this most constructive form of public service.

With his varied experience as a successful businessman, his practical knowledge of business needs, his faith in fair and honest principles and practices as the absolutely essential basis of any permanent business prosperity, the views of Mr. AUCHINCLOSS command respect and intelligent consideration within and out of Congress.

It goes without saying that Mr. AUCHINCLOSS brings to his work as a Member of Congress the same tireless industry, faithfulness to duty, and understanding of economic and social problems which have characterized his life-long efforts to establish better business methods throughout the country.

Mr. Baltz, ladies and gentlemen, I consider it a great honor to be asked to speak on this occasion which is a milestone in the life of the Better Business Bureau of Washington. I realize that there are many people far better equipped to address you than I am, but I suppose I was asked because I have been connected with Better Business Bureau work for a great many years and it was felt that I should be asked to address you out of courtesy. As a speaker, I do not rate very high but I always try to bear in mind the advice given me by a friend of mine not long ago when I first ran for public office. He said "Stand up so you can be seen; speak out so you can be heard; and sit down so you can be appreciated." I will certainly endeavor to live up to that advice so I may achieve whatever appreciation may accrue.

Better Business Bureaus are not easy to bring into being; they do not just happen. It requires a great deal of hard work to organize a Better Business Bureau and they cannot be successful unless there is a sincere desire for them on the part of the businessmen of the community they serve. Furthermore, a Better Business Bureau executive who is worth his salt, is very hard to find. He must have a temperament which is fair and he must be endowed with a crusading spirit for what is right and sound. His honesty must be beyond question and his respect for the opinions of others must be real. You are indeed fortunate here in Washington, in having such a director in Mr. Claude Woodward and the outstanding service rendered by the Washington Bureau is eloquent testimony of his ability. I rather suspect, however, that the sterling qualities which make him a first-class Better Business Bureau director have been supported and encouraged by his association with Mrs. Sally Muchmore, the assistant director. I can testify that she is well known to the Better Business Bureau of New York City, as one who has brought a great deal of good common sense and practical knowledge of business to the Better Business Bureau work. It is largely due to these two people that the Washington Bureau has achieved such a high standing among the Better Business Bureaus in the country and I might call your attention to the fact that this is no small praise, as there are 60 odd bureaus in the United States that are all doing excellent work.

The thing that attracted my attention most to Better Business Bureau work, many years ago, was the fact that it was a movement started by businessmen who were determined to clean house and set up high standards for the conduct of their business in order to gain consumer confidence. Unlike many similar movements, this one grew and prospered because it was conceived in sincerity and born with a singleness of purpose which has stayed with it throughout the succeeding years.

Businessmen, by supporting and strengthening the Better Business Bureau in their community, are thus recognizing their own responsibility toward the purchasing public. This by itself is very laudable and entirely praiseworthy and it is strong proof of the integrity of the American businessman. I am one of those who believe that American business is conducted on honest principles or it could not have reached the high standard of efficiency it now enjoys. We could never have become the "arsenal of democracy" if the American businessman were a cheat and a fraud. He is a high type of patriotic citizen and intends to remain one. In connection with this, I was very much interested in the testimony of Mr. C. E. Wilson, former president of General Motors Corporation, before the special committee of the House of Representatives on Post-war Economic Policy and Planning, when he said, "The average contractor and businessman is honest and I would make my rules and regulations on that basis. Not too much on the basis of trying to catch the crooks. Now many of you men down here are lawyers and you get in on the seamy side of things. I think you sometimes make a mistake. There are so many darn honest people in our country." That is a significant statement, coming from the president of a corporation which is perhaps the largest employer of labor in the country and the same spirit is behind the Better Business Bureau movement—honest men in business getting together to protect the public from fraud formed the Better Business Bureau at the start and have been forming and supporting Better Business Bureaus ever since.

Of course it is sound business for a merchant or banker to gain the confidence of the public and undoubtedly this principle plays a part in motivating the supporters of the Better Business Bureau, but public confidence is bred by honest dealing and don't let anyone tell you anything different. That is true in the business life and just as true in the political life of a people and I will venture this statement—the business of politics holds no monopoly on honesty.

A Better Business Bureau should never concern itself with politics; that is outside its function. This may seem a strange statement to some of you, especially when the aid of Better Business Bureaus is solicited in the support of what appears to be constructive legislation. But my experience in bureau affairs has impressed on me the fact that Better Business Bureaus being formed for the benefit of business do not achieve this purpose if they get off that track and meddle around in political matters. Politics is always controversial and such controversy is not the function of the Better Business Bureau.

During this war, Better Business Bureaus have been asked by Government on more than one accasion to aid in the enforcement of Government regulations. I have been consistently opposed to Better Business Bureaus engaging in any such activity, claiming that they were never intended to be an enforcement agency for anyone. It is their function to receive complaints against unfair trade practices, to watch for unsound advertising and when improper practices are discovered, to first call them to the attention of the offender and then if he does not mend his ways, report the offense for prompt action to the constituted authority, who is the enforcing agent and not the Better Business Bureau. I can remember back in the days around 1920, when "bucket shops" were flourishing in New York City and our New York Better Business Bureau was called upon on many occasions by victims who had been robbed of their funds. Our staff would gather the evidence of the fraud and present it to the office of the district attorney and if that office refused or delayed action for one reason or another, the Better Business Bureau would demand its attention under threat of publicizing the facts. As one of the great men in the bureau activities in New York put it, "When the district attorney did nothing, the Better Business Bureau acted as a very efficient burr under the horse's tail." I can well remember on one occasion that this burr was so efficient that an attorney general of the State of New York was forced to return from a vacation in California and attend to his business or take the consequences.

Government authorities of late days have come more and more in contact with the Better-Business Bureau and its work, and it is with distinct pleasure and a thrill of pride that those of us who are so interested in this work learn of the respect and the constructive impression that the principles and ideals of the Better-Business Bureau make on Government officials. Indeed I may say that it comes as a bit of a shock to some of the people in our Government today, who are perhaps imbued with the idea of making over our economic system and in using businessmen as a whipping boy, to learn that businessmen know the difference between right and wrong and through their Better-Business Bureaus maintain high standards of business honesty. Businessmen may well be proud of this part they are playing in the Nation's economy in establishing and insisting upon truth in advertising and high principles in business.

Business, however, has a great responsibility and must not permit this pride to dull its vision. When this war is over, businessmen throughout the country will be called upon to assume a more commanding and perhaps a more aggressive attitude, and I am speaking particularly to the merchants and bankers. I am serving my first term in the Congress, my first experience in public life, but it is perfectly obvious to me that Government does not understand business and business does not understand Government. There may be good and sufficient reasons for this, but I hope and pray that businessmen of the country will assert themselves more definitely in the political life of the country by becoming acquainted with the principles of Government and by sharing the responsibilities of establishing a sound economy, which today they are too apt to feel should be borne entirely by Government. The days to come will present great and complex problems, and I believe there will be a surge of buying and development in this country during the postwar period which will dwarf anything that we have ever known before. Businessmen will have to adapt themselves to these new conditions, and they should be thinking about these things in an articulate manner right now. Try and learn what Members of Congress are thinking about; I can assure you that Congressmen would be interested in knowing what you are thinking about.

Our immediate job, of course, is to win this war and win it quickly. But if we are to preserve what we are fighting for—the preservation of our ideals, our business institutions, and our economic life—our business leaders and not Government must set the pace under the new conditions, with progressive and sound ideas.

I am fully aware of the fact that the business of the country is considering what the post-war era will bring but even greater efforts are needed and I urge that businessmen discuss their ideas and their thoughts with their Representatives in Congress, both in the House and the Senate, so that a lively discussion may be stimulated out of which real comprehensive plans may be made. Government and business must get together.

The Better Business Bureau in this postwar era will have a tremendous opportunity to do a constructive piece of work. Through its experience in the past in guiding businessmen in their dealings with the public, it will be able to help businessmen in their approach to the solution of the great problems which lie ahead. There is one thing that is certain if our country's industry is to progress—the public more than ever must have faith in businessmen. They must have faith in their character and in the merchandise they offer for sale. We must all have faith in each other, faith in our country, and faith in our God so that in the day of victory, we may be a united people and go forward to even greater heights and loftier business standards than ever before.

Solution of Jewish Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein certain correspondence, evidencing my interest in and devotion to the cause of the afflicted Jew throughout the world and zealous efforts to promote racial and religious tolerance here in America.

AMERICAN ZIONIST EMERGENCY COUNCIL,
Washington, May 5, 1944.

Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN: The American Zionist Emergency Council is preparing a volume which is designed to demonstrate the interest of the Members of the Congress of the United States in the permanent solution of Jewish problems in the world through the development of a Jewish National Homeland in Palestine.

On March 17, in a letter to me, you made the following statement:

"The present plight of our Jewish brethren in the occupied countries of Europe where they have undergone such pitiable and indefensible persecution by Hitler and his minions of hate is a great question of human brotherhood. Millions of innocent Jews, many of them aged and infirm, others helpless women and children, are wandering over the face of the European continent tonight, driven from pillar to post, from one country to another—homeless, shelterless, friendless, and without food and nourishment to keep body and soul together.

"We must move promptly to succor and relieve these poor unfortunates. The continued effectuation of the nefarious White Paper will result in the slaughter of additional millions of Jews, not only in Europe, but probably also in Palestine itself where racial hatreds are being fanned to white heat. Now is the time, not only for Jews, but for all true Americans, to rally to the cause of a great ancient people who are now being persecuted and threatened with extinction throughout many parts of the civilized world."

We would be grateful for your permission to publish this statement in our projected anthology. If you wish to change or elaborate upon it in any way, we shall be delighted to have you do so.

We contemplate the publication of this volume in the very near future, and we will doubly appreciate your prompt reply to this request.

With many thanks for your sympathetic understanding and support, permit me to remain,

Very sincerely yours,
RABBI LEON I. FEUER,
Director, Washington Bureau.

AMERICAN ZIONIST EMERGENCY COUNCIL,
New York, N. Y., March 24, 1944.

Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN: I am pleased to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th, which was sent to Rabbi Feuer on the occasion of the meeting held last Tuesday at Madison Square Garden, New York.

Your fine letter contains a complete statement of our purpose and the necessity for keeping Palestine open for Jewish settlement, so as to provide a haven and a home for the millions of suffering Jews of Europe.

On behalf of the American Zionist Emergency Council, I want to thank you for your kind message.

Very respectfully yours,
HARRY L. SHAPIRO,
Director.

AMERICAN JEWISH CONFERENCE,
New York, N. Y., March 17, 1944.

Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PHILBIN: I want to thank you for your letter of March 16, in which you so wholeheartedly give your support to the Wright-Compton resolution. It is extremely gratifying to have your sympathetic statement.

Very sincerely yours,
I. L. KENEN,
Public Relations Director.

AMERICAN PALESTINE COMMITTEE,
Washington D. C., April 17, 1944.

Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
Old House Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN: It gives me great pleasure to welcome you as a member of the American Palestine Committee. I feel confident that through this committee tangible and constructive steps can be taken to alleviate the suffering of the Jewish people and to assist them in rebuilding their national home in Palestine.

We appreciate your cooperation and sponsorship.

Sincerely yours,
ROBERT F. WAGNER.

NEW YORK CITY, Friday, February 11.—News that a congressional steering committee has been set up to aid in the passage of national legislation to outlaw anti-Semitism was announced today by Leonard E. Golditch, secretary of the National Committee to Combat Anti-Semitism.

The announcement was made following a meeting of the sponsors of the national committee at the Waldorf Astoria in New York City.

Among those serving on the congressional steering committee, according to Mr. Golditch, are Congressmen PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Democrat, Massachusetts; P. W. GRIFFITHS, Republican, Ohio; ADOLPH J. SABATH, Democrat, Illinois; GEORGE G. SADOWSKI, Democrat, Michigan; ARTHUR G. KLEIN, Democrat, New York; LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI, Democrat, New York; GEORGE H. BENDER, Republican, Ohio; VITO MARCANTONIO, American Labor Party, New York; SAMUEL A. WEISS, Democrat, Pennsylvania; CHARLES A. BUCKLEY, Democrat, New York; JAMES H. FAY, Democrat, New York; ROBERT GRANT FURLONG, Democrat, Pennsylvania; THOMAS E. SCANLON, Democrat, Pennsylvania; and SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, Democrat, New York.

The meeting agreed to set up regional offices throughout the Nation as a means of strengthening the campaign to outlaw anti-Semitism nationally and in each of the 48 States.

At the same time it was announced by Mr. Golditch that an educational committee has been set up and is now preparing a series of booklets and other printed material on anti-Semitism and the danger it holds to each American family and to the democracy of our country.

In a resolution adopted unanimously at the meeting it was pointed out that in Hitler's address of January 30, marking the eleventh anniversary of the National Socialist regime, he threatened that regardless of the outcome of the war, the cause of the Nazis and Fascists could still triumph through the use and the spread of anti-Semitism. The resolution then goes on to state:

"No words could be plainer, no threat more brazen and more pregnant with danger for the peace and security of every nation and of every people. That his agents and his followers in this country will greatly increase their anti-Jewish activities goes without saying.

"To take quick, powerful, and effective action against anti-Semitism becomes a matter of simple self-preservation for the United States, and for all the United Nations.

"With this in mind, we, members of the National Committee to Combat Anti-Semitism being a cross-section of American life, and nonsectarian in our membership, assembled on the 7th day of February, 1944, at the Waldorf-Astoria in the City of New York, hereby resolve to make every possible effort to have introduced and passed in the Congress of the United States and in the legislatures of the 48 States bills outlawing anti-Semitism and making it a criminal offense.

"The movement to outlaw anti-Semitism is growing among all the United Nations. Jan Masaryk stated that the prospectives of Teheran bring up the necessity for outlawing anti-Semitism in all European countries. The work of our committee will immeasurably contribute to this worthy and necessary goal."

NEW YORK.

PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
Clinton, Mass.:

Will you join with other prominent Americans in appeal to Premier Joseph Stalin and Soviet Government to exert all efforts to force cessation of extermination of thousands of Jews in Hungary and Bulgaria to reaffirm Soviet intention to punish as war criminals all those who carry out Nazi program of annihilation and to offer Hungarian prisoners of war held by Russians in exchange for Jews in Hungary with guaranties that these will not be used in combat units by either side. Exchange can be made auspices International Red Cross or neutral country. Unless immediate action undertaken along these lines annihilation of some hundreds of thousands of innocent people is certain by official German decree. Your support in this appeal will be of great importance. Please phone or wire collect.

GABRIEL WECHSLER,
National Secretary, Emergency Committee to Save Jewish People of Europe.

MAY 16, 1944.

GABRIEL WECHSLER,
National Secretary,
Emergency Committee,
New York, N. Y.:

Will be glad to join with you in every practicable effort to liberate and rescue unfortunate Jews in Europe now threatened with annihilation. We must do everything in our power to assist these most unhappy victims of persecution.

Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN.

Congress and Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, in reading this morning's Washington Post I was impressed by Marquis Childs' article on Congress and Price Control. His sense of fairness in paying just and deserved tribute to certain Members of the House—in both parties—has so impressed me that I am, under unanimous consent, inserting his article for the benefit of the Members.

To Mr. Childs, I wish to extend my congratulations for a fine piece of newspaper work.

WASHINGTON CALLING—CONGRESS AND PRICE CONTROL
(By Marquis Childs)

Fourteen men meeting behind closed doors these past few days have been deciding what you and I will pay for shoes and butter and clothing—everything we eat and wear—in coming months.

They are the Members of House and Senate who in conference have been trying to iron out the differences in the price-control bill as passed by the two bodies. What they finally send down to the White House may have the look of a victory for the consumer.

It will probably be a bill which the President will sign. As of the present writing, both the Bankhead amendment raising the price of cotton goods and the Dirksen amendment to tie O. P. A. administration up in the courts are out.

But it's much too early to do any crowing. In fact, it looks as though by virtue of certain niggling little changes, enforcement of price control will become increasingly difficult. While they would scarcely justify a veto, they will nevertheless open up cracks in the already shaky price-control dam.

Unhappily, too, many of the conferees talked one way in public on the floor and another way in conference. They pressed for the niggling amendments even though they must have known that it would make enforcement of price ceilings doubly difficult.

Granted the pressure was great. Being a Congressman in these times is no easy job. Pressure groups work incessantly to pry this or that special favor out of the people's Representatives.

Remember, too, a Representative's job is the kind that ends every 2 years. That may be one reason some of the price-control conferees have caved in. They're tired and they know they've got to get home and start mending their political fences.

The wonder is that there are so many conscientious men, the men who do the hard slugging work—and it is hard work and often tiresome and unrewarding. The workers must make up for the drones and showoffs who fail to carry their share of the burden.

Men like JOE MARTIN, the minority leader; WADSWORTH, of New York; WOLCOTT, of Michigan; CASE, of South Dakota; and, yes, thorny JOHN TABER, of New York, who sent shivers of apprehension down the spines of so many bureaucrats, typify the Republicans who carry the load. On the Democratic side I would name Speaker SAM RAYBURN, JOHN MCCORMACK, the majority leader; RAMSPECK and VINSON, of Georgia; COCHRAN, of Missouri; and WOODRUM of Virginia.

One encouraging sign is the number of younger men—and women—coming up who have little of the traditionally bitter partisanship of the older generation. Such men as WALTER JUDD, of Minnesota, on the Republican side, and MIKE MONRONEY, of Oklahoma, on the Democratic side, are typical of 50 to 60 juniors who, if they had any authority, would go a long way toward reasonable agreement on the big issues of our day.

They're scattering now to the four corners of America. Most of them will go to the conventions and in between times they'll revisit Main Street to try to find out where they stand.

Under this urgency all legislation, and especially the Price Control Act, has suffered. In a way it's too bad that the issue was not clear cut. If the conference had left in one of the big obstacles, such as the Bankhead amendment, a veto would have followed and the blame could have been properly allocated.

As it is, with the seemingly minor restraints on enforcement, the O. P. A. is likely to be fighting a rear-guard action. If, for example, a modified rent-control agreement allows landlords to seek redress when increases in cost have been "substantial," then most of the owners of the Nation's 14,000,000 rented dwellings will descend on the O. P. A.

Chester Bowles, it seems to me, has done a good job up to the present. He has gone a long way to be reasonable and to get along with Congress. Too far, some of his critics have said.

But I imagine he must have deep concern for the future. He can see the waters of inflation mounting behind the dam and he knows how much more difficult his job has been made.

Experts Serve Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the June 15, 1944, edition of the Lynn Telegram-News, Lynn, Mass. This excellent editorial was written by Mr. Fred Bowler of that paper:

EXPERTS SERVE GOVERNMENT

Those who have taken to task the administration of President Roosevelt for various reasons in past years were given somewhat of a shock recently when the Pabst Brewing Co. announced the winners in its $50,000 contest for plans for post-war employment.

The company offered a first prize of $25,000, a second prize of $10,000, and 15 additional awards of $1,000 each. Manuscripts were submitted to an impartial board of judges who had no way of knowing the identities of the authors.

And what happened?

The two major prizes, and nine out of the $1,000 awards were won by employees of the United States Government, many of them holding responsible positions.

Winner of the grand prize, $25,000, was Herbert Stein, 28, a native of Detroit and a graduate of Williams College in Massachusetts, who is Chief of the Economic Analysis Section of the War Production Board.

Winner of the second prize, $10,000, was Leon H. Keyserling, native of Charleston, S. C., and a graduate of Columbia and Harvard, who is 36 years old and is general counsel for the National Housing Agency.

Here are some of the $1,000 winners:

Grover W. Ensley, a native of Washington, who is a fiscal analyst for the United States State Department.

Mordecai Ezekiel, a native of Richmond, Va., who is economic adviser to Secretary of Agriculture Claude Wickard.

Joseph M. Gillman, a native of the Ukraine, Russia, who is assistant chief of the Munitions Branch of the Bureau of Planning and Statistics.

Leo Grebler, a native of Berlin, Germany, who is director of the Division of Operating Statistics of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Everett E. Hagen, a native of Minnesota, who is an economist with the Division of Research and Statistics, Federal Reserve System.

Albert Gailord Hart, a native of Iowa, who is a consultant for the Division of Tar Research of the United States Treasury Department.

Rolf Nugent, a native of Pennsylvania, who is overseas on special work for the United States Government.

John H. G. Pierson, native of New York, who is chief of the Post-War Labor Problems Division, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor.

Maj. Lyle M. Spencer, native of Wisconsin, who is now with the United States Army in Italy.

By winning 11 out of 17 prizes offered in this contest sponsored by a private business concern, the Government employees have proven what President Roosevelt's supporters have known all along—although his opponents have refused to concede it—that he has brought able men into his Government, the best brains in the country.

Oh, yes, one of the judges in this contest was Beardsley Ruml, treasurer of R. H. Macy Co., and chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. The others were President Clarence Dykstra of the University of Wisconsin; Prof. Wesley C. Mitchell, of Columbia University, and A. F. Whitney, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.

They scrutinized thousands of plans entered in the contest and the results indicate that the United States Government already has available men who can plan for post-war problems effectively.

Un-American Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS
OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article which appeared in Collier's Weekly, issue of June 24, 1944:

DIES DEPARTS

Representative MARTIN DIES, Democrat, of Texas, has announced that he will not try for reelection, after 14 years in Congress, many of them spent as chairman of the Dies committee on subversive activities. Maybe he really wants to go back to private life, maybe he's afraid he couldn't win. We don't know and don't much care.

We are convinced, though, that DIES' committee performed services which added up heavily on the black side of the ledger, in spite of all the times DIES hit some innocent person or group.

This country has freedom of speech and press, at least up to this writing. It also has a goodish number of disloyal or misguided persons who are forever trying to bludgeon or bemuse Americans into changing over to communism, fascism, nazi-ism, funny-moneyism, and some other ism. Most of these persons make a virtue of trickery, deceit, and hitting below the belt. Because of the Bill of Rights, they have every leeway short of treason itself. This is all very well and makes life in the United States that much more interesting than in the strait-jacketed countries.

We wouldn't change this state of affairs if we could. But the bulk of us need a watchdog of the type the Dies committee has been—a group of official vigilantes—to keep exposing the tactics, pretensions, and plots of the would-be destroyers of democracy, and thereby to keep them cut down to their correct size.

For these reasons we think DIES deserves the thanks of the American people as he leaves the congressional stage; and we're in favor of Representative J. PARNELL THOMAS' (Republican, New Jersey) proposal that Congress establish a permanent Dies-type committee.

Detailed Information on Legislation for Veterans and Their Dependents, World Wars Nos. 1 and 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, so much new veterans' legislation has been passed by this Congress that a brief statement of benefits and general outline of procedure for securing assistance is necessary at this time. Many requests for this information are being made to your Congressman and this brief outline is made available to service men and women, veterans and their dependents in answer to these inquiries. It is impossible at this time to analyze all the various phases of our veterans' legislation. In fact much planning and details of operation are still to be outlined by the Veterans' Administration under Senate bill 1767, recently passed by Congress. I shall keep you informed of changes and administrative interpretation of this new legislation. A request to my office, New House Office Building, Washington, D. C., will bring you an immediate reply on questions concerning your individual status as to these special benefits provided in this new legislation.

The following information was prepared by a member of the House World War Veterans' Legislation Committee with the advice and assistance of the Veterans' Administration:

OUTLINE OF BENEFITS FOR SERVICEMEN, VETERANS, AND THEIR DEPENDENTS UNDER EXISTING LAW—COMPENSATION AND PENSION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH

Service-connected disability: Under the veterans regulations promulgated under the act of March 20, 1933, as amended, honorably discharged veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 are entitled to compensation or pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by such service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10 percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month. While the World War No. 2 veterans were entitled to these rates following the act of December 19, 1941, they were placed on complete parity under the veterans regulations by the act of July 13, 1943, Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, with reference to the requirements governing proof of service connection of disability. The latter act also liberalized the regulation concerning the presumption of soundness upon entry into service. Under Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the monthly rates of compensation or pension payable to veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2, including veterans entitled to wartime rates based upon service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-incurred disability, not including special awards and allowances fixed by law, were increased by 15 percent.

In lieu of such pension or compensation, reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, meeting the requirements of the Army regulations pertaining to retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment, are retired by the War Department, certified to the Veterans' Administration, and their retired pay, equal to 75 percent of their base pay, is paid by the Veterans' Administration out of the pension appropriation.

Non-service-connected disability: Under Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the rate of pension for permanent and total non-service-connected disability, applicable to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion, the Philippine Insurrection, and World War No. 1, was increased from $40 to $50 per month, with an increase to $60 per month where such veterans have been rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reach the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. This act also provides that the above pension for non-service-connected disability shall apply to veterans of both World War No. 1 and World War No. 2.

Service-connected death: The rates of compensation or pension for widows, children, and dependent parents of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans based upon death in service, or service-connected death, are as follows:

Widow, no child	$50
Widow, 1 child (with $13 for each additional child)	65
No widow, but 1 child	25
No widow, but 2 children (with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100)	50
Dependent father and mother:
Each	25
Or 1 only	45

The above rates are contained in Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, July 13, 1943, and constitute a material liberalization of the prior rates.

Non-service-connected death: The widow, child, or children, of any deceased veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 are entitled to the following rates of compensation if the veteran at the time of death from non-service-connected cause had a disability incurred in or aggravated by such war service.

Widow but no child	$35
Widow and 1 child (with $5 for each additional child)	45
No widow but 1 child	18
No widow but 2 children (equally divided)	27
No widow but 3 children (equally divided)	35
With $4 for each additional child (the total amount to be equally divided).

Payments are limited to an aggregate of $64 in any one case.

Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, act of May 27, 1944, increased the rates to the above amounts and also included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans, the law previously having applied only to World War No. 1 veterans.

Claims and effective date of awards: Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred to a Veterans' Administration facility, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for adjudication, the applicant should file claim on proper form which will be supplied upon inquiry addressed to any Veterans' Administration facility or regional office, or to the local representative of the American Red Cross or of a veterans' service organization.

Under interagency agreement a person who is to be discharged from military or naval service is in need of further hospital care, prior arrangements are made by the commanding officer to afford him opportunity to file all necessary claims, supply necessary clinical and service data and to send the veteran to the Veterans' Administration facility designated to receive him. (Cf. A. R. 615-360, change No. 4, April 16, 1943.) If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

Upon death in service, the service department notifies the Veterans' Administration, and claim forms are sent immediately to all known dependents.

Groups potentially eligible for pensions: All members of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, members of the Public Health Service or of the Coast and Geodetic Survey when ordered to active service with the Army or Navy or as to United States Public Health Service while serving outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, and as to Coast and Geodetic Survey when assigned during present war to duty on business of War or Navy Departments in areas outside continental United States or in Alaska or coastal areas of the United States as determined by the War and Navy Departments to be of immediate military hazard, are potentially eligible for pensions.

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps was not in the active service; and, while the several Women's Reserve Corps of the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard originally were in the active service, they were by statute precluded from pension eligibility; in lieu thereof, being subject to laws pertaining to employees' compensation. Legislation was subsequently enacted making the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard components eligible potentially for pension benefits—Public Law 110, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved July 1, 1943; Public Law 183, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved November 8, 1943; and Public Law 214, approved December 23, 1943.

Awards to date: Pension payments to veterans of World War No. 2 and their dependents total $37,760,572.78 through March 1944. In addition, retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration to Reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, totaled $1,020,137.33 from July 1, 1942, through March 31, 1944.

Disbursements for the relief of World War No. 1 veterans and their dependents from 1918 through March 1944 for disability and death compensation or pension, service connected and nonservice connected, totaled $5,007,029,954.54. In addition, disbursements for World War No. 1 emergency officers' retirement pay through March 31, 1944, totaled $84,889,697.63. Our older veterans are not being forgotten just because there is a new and larger crop, as these figures prove.

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL CARE, PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES, AND DOMICILIARY CARE

Eligibility is extended to any veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 honorably discharged, having a service-connected disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or one who was discharged for disability and not dishonorably; also one not dishonorably discharged, who is unable to defray his expenses, has tuberculosis or a neuropsychiatric ailment or disability which requires hospital care.

Dependent upon availability of facilities, eligibility includes any veteran of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, and who is in need of such care and is unable to defray the expenses therefor—regardless of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service.

The service groups included are all components of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, the respective Women's Reserves thereof, and United States Public Health Service, and Coast and Geodetic Survey under the conditions stated for pension purposes.

The Veterans' Administration maintains 94 facilities and has contract facilities with a total of 92,019 beds, distributed as follows (as of March 23, 1944):

Tuberculosis	6,212
Neuropsychiatric	29,417
General medical and surgical	25,658
Domiciliary	16,117
Contract—other governmental	4,227
State and private	388
Total	92,019

Diagnostic centers, with expert specialists available, are maintained at Hines, Chicago, Ill.; San Francisco, Calif.; and Mount Alto, Washington, D. C. Cancer clinics: Bronx, N. Y.; Hines, Chicago, Ill.; Mount Alto, Washington, D. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Portland, Oreg.; and Los Angeles, Calif.

The present building program will raise this total to more than 100,000 beds. The Veterans' Administration anticipates an eventual need of 300,000 beds to enable veterans of World War No. 2 and of prior wars to receive hospital and domiciliary care to the same extent as is now provided. However, this estimated maximum should not be needed until long after the war or require the eventual additional construction of more than 100,000 beds, since there will be, under present plans, 100,000 beds in Veterans' Administration facilities, and it is anticipated that it should be possible to obtain the same number from the Army and Navy shortly after the termination of the war.

Claims: Any person who is to be discharged from active service and who is in need of and entitled to hospitalization by the Veterans' Administration, is transferred directly to the Veterans' Administration facility designated to receive him. Claim for all benefits, and necessary clinical and service data accompany him, or are filed by the manager if the veteran is insane or incompetent.

All others should file claim for treatment or hospitalization directly with the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office—one, or more, in each State in the Union except Delaware. The regional office in Colorado is located in Denver.

Sixty-four thousand nine hundred and eighty-two veterans of World War No. 2 have been hospitalized by the Veterans' Administration through April 30, 1944. On April 30, 1944, there were 44,967 World War No. 1 veterans and 12,866 World War No. 2 veterans receiving hospitalization, and 8,477 World War No. 1 veterans and 196 World War No. 2 veterans receiving domiciliary care from the Veterans' Administration.

While domiciliary care cannot be said to be a part of the rehabilitation process, it is a valuable benefit for those who have reached a permanent state of disability and have no other means of support.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved by the President March 24, 1943, provides—

First, that any person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941, and prior to the termination of the present war.

Second, and who was honorably discharged;

Third, and who has a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay;

Fourth, who is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability, shall be entitled to such vocational rehabilitation as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit him for employment consistent with the degree of disablement.

Immediately following the passage of that legislation there was created in the Veterans' Administration a vocational rehabilitation service composed of three divisions, namely, the Vocational Advisement Division, the Training Into Employment Division, and the Research Division. The planning and control functions created by the administration of this act are exercised in the central office of the Veterans' Administration. All operations, including determinations of need for training, vocational advisement, induction into training, supervision, as well as the selection of training facilities, are functions of the Vocational Rehabilitation Division in that facility of the Veterans' Administration having jurisdiction of the territory in which the veteran resides. There are 53 such facilities. These facilities are, generally speaking, bound by State boundary lines. In a few States there is more than one facility. Colorado has one facility at Fort Lyon.

The course of training prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit the veteran for employment may not exceed 4 years and may not extend beyond 6 years after the termination of the present war.

The purpose of rehabilitation is to restore employability lost by virtue of a handicap due to service-connected disability. In performing the functions imposed upon the Administration by Public Law 16, it will be the purpose of the Veterans' Administration to utilize educational institutions and establishments of recognized standing in the training of these disabled veterans into employment and to train each person as near his home as may be possible. In securing employment, a problem which obviously will be very great after the end of the war and perhaps acute after demobilization has been accomplished, every available Federal and State facility will be utilized. Employment of veterans has been accomplished to a considerable extent through the United States Employment Service. It will be the purpose to correlate these activities to the end that those vocationally trained will be graduated into employment opportunities.

While the disabled veteran is in training his pension, unless it equals or exceeds such amounts, will be increased to $30 per month, if single; $90 per month, if married, with $5 additional for each child, and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required.

Claims: Those persons discharged from the service directly to the Veterans' Administration facilities for hospitalization will have their claims filed and processed; and the question of need for and entitlement to vocational rehabilitation may be given consideration as soon as the individual's physical and mental condition make training feasible. Any other person honorably discharged from the service may make claims for vocational rehabilitation in the claim for pension which may be filed at the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office.

INSURANCE

National service life insurance: National service life insurance was provided under the act of October 8, 1940, Public Law No. 801, Seventy-sixth Congress, and liberalizing amendments thereto were enacted during the Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth Congresses. A number of other liberalizing proposals are pending in the present Congress and the Veterans' Administration has submitted certain proposed changes found to be justified by studies conducted. Application may be made for not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 without physical examination prior to the expiration of 120 days from entrance into active service. Thereafter, any such person in the active military or naval service may apply if the application be accompanied by acceptable evidence of good health.

Applications: Application forms are supplied the service departments, and may be obtained from the commanding officer or designated insurance officer. The applicant may elect to pay premiums in cash, or by allotment of pay. Policies are not issued during the war, but insurance certificate is mailed to the address designated by applicant.

The insurance is against death only, but includes waiver of premiums during total disability existing for more than 6 months, and commencing prior to insured's sixtieth birthday. The policy is a 5-year level premium term policy with rate based upon the American experience table of mortality and 3 percent interest—the Government assuming the extra hazard of the military and naval service and the administrative expense. The insurance is payable only to a widow (widower), child (including a stepchild or illegitimate child, if designated as beneficiary by the insured), parent (including person in loco parentis), brother and sister of the insured; and is payable only in monthly installments. The insured may change the beneficiary designation at any time.

After the policy has been in effect for at least 1 year, while in force it may be converted to an ordinary life, 20-payment life or 30-payment life policy upon application to the Veterans' Administration without medical examination.

In cases where the person in service died or became totally disabled, or was captured or isolated by the enemy prior to April 20, 1942, and had less than $5,000 insurance in effect, the law provides that gratuitous insurance to an aggregate of $5,000 shall be deemed in effect. Claims for such gratuitous insurance should be filed as soon as possible, because of limitations. In most of these death cases only a widow, child, or dependent parent can claim such insurance.

As of March 30, 1944, over 14,303,291 applications had been received, representing a total amount of nearly $105,596,766,000 of insurance. The average policy was approximately $7,382.69; the average coverage per life approximately $8,926.74.

The insurance is payable in the event of the death of the insured while the policy is in force to a beneficiary or beneficiaries, which may be designated by the insured, only within the relationship of widow or widower, child, parent, brother, or sister. The proceeds of the policy are payable as an annuity in 240 equal monthly installments of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance to any beneficiary who is under 30 years of age at the time of the death of the insured; otherwise, in continuous monthly installments throughout the lifetime of the beneficiary, with a guaranty of the payment of 120 monthly installments to the surviving relatives of the insured who are within the permitted class of beneficiaries. The amount of the monthly installment under the latter mode of payment is dependent upon the age of the beneficiary at date of death of insured. For example, if the beneficiary is then 40 years old, monthly installment is $4.50 for each $1,000 of insurance; if 50, $5.39; if 60, $6.81; if 70, $8.51.

The beneficiary would receive under a policy of $5,000 or $10,000, for example, monthly payments, beginning at the stated ages, in the following amounts: $27.55–$55.10, $22.50–$45, $26.95–$53.90, $34.05–$68.10, and $42.55–$85.10.

Claims: All claims for insurance benefits should be addressed to the Veterans Administration, Washington, D. C., but necessary forms may be secured from the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

United States Government life (converted) insurance: This insurance can be applied for only by those who served in World War No. 1. No one may have more than $10,000 national service life insurance and Government (converted) insurance combined.

Insurance premiums are guaranteed by Government under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended: Any person in the active service having a commercial life policy or policies meeting the requirements of said law, article IV, may, upon application to the Veterans' Administration on form supplied the Army and Navy, secure guaranty of premiums, on amount of insurance not in excess of $10,000, while he is in the service during the present war. The insurance premiums so guaranteed by the Government constitute a lien against the policy and must be paid by the company out of any settlement thereof. In the event of the insured's discharge from service, he has a period of 2 years within which to pay the premiums with interest so guaranteed or otherwise such indebtedness constitutes a loan on the policy with interest and if the amount of such indebtedness exceeds the cash surrender value, the policy is automatically canceled and the Government pays the insurer the difference between such cash surrender value and the indebtedness. Forms for making application for such insurance protection are supplied to the War and Navy Departments and may be secured in person or from his commanding officer or other designated official.

As of March 31, 1944, 72,204 applications with insurance totaling $178,189,853.21 have been approved and premiums guaranteed.

INSURANCE UNDER OTHER LAWS

Old-age and survivors insurance is administered by the Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; unemployment benefits by Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; retirement by Railroad Retirement Board and Civil Service Commission. Credit for active military or naval service is allowed for civil-service retirement and railroad retirement purposes.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Mustering-out pay is provided by the act of February 3, 1944, Public Law 225, Seventy-eighth Congress, and is administered by the War and Navy Departments. The amounts are from $100 to $300.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES

Administered by the War and Navy Departments for dependents of those in the service. Your Congressman can supply many details about this subject and help get delayed allotments straightened out for dependents of servicemen.

DOMICILIARY CARE

United States Soldiers' Home, under jurisdiction of the War Department; Naval Home, under jurisdiction of the Navy Department. This is in addition to that provided by the Veterans' Administration.

GUARDIANSHIP

Supervision is maintained, in cooperation with the State courts, over payments of any benefits made on account of insane or minor beneficiaries to insure proper application of such benefits.

RETIREMENT PAY

Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard: For officers and enlisted personnel of the Regular Establishment, and reserve components of Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

TAXES

Bureau of Internal Revenue: All veteran benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration are exempt from all taxation. Special consideration is shown in the income-tax laws for those in the service.

BURIAL ALLOWANCE

Up to the amount of $100 may be paid for disability incurred in line of duty or in receipt of pension or compensation, as to any veteran discharged from the armed forces for disability incurred in line of duty or in receipt of pension for service-connected disability.

A United States flag to drape the casket, subsequently to be turned over to the next of kin, may be furnished as to any veteran, discharged honorably after active service during any war or after serving at least one enlistment or by reason of disability incurred in line of duty. Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, as to his minor children or adult unmarried daughters. The expenses incident to transporting the body of one who has died while in active service, or of a veteran who has died in a Veterans' Administration facility, to the place of burial, are, within limitations, borne by the Government. Headstone or marker—stone or marble—will be furnished for the unmarked grave of any honorably discharged veteran or as to anyone who died while in the active service.

Various benefits, rights, and privileges are also provided as to certain veterans, their dependents, and their organizations under State laws, as per the résumé thereof, as published by the House Committee on Pensions, entitled "State Veterans' Laws."

CIVIL, SPANISH, AND OTHER WARS

Pensions on the basis of age, degree of inability to earn a living, and/or length of service for (1) Civil War veterans, in the amount of $75 per month, or $100 if in need of a regular attendant, (2) Indian War veterans, in amounts ranging from $20 to $60 per month, or $100, if in need of an attendant, and (3) veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion, in amounts ranging from $12 to $75 per month, plus varying amounts if in need of a regular attendant, with total not to exceed $100 but only $20 while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by the United States or a political subdivision thereof if the veteran has no dependents, provided that as to those in a soldiers' home continually since on or before July 15, 1943, the pension not to exceed $50 shall be continued.

Pensions at lower rates than above are available to veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion, based upon service of 70 days or more but less than 90 days.

Pension under the Economy Act of March 20, 1933, and the veterans' regulations promulgated thereunder, as amended, of $50 per month for veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, Boxer Rebellion, or World War No. 1, with 90 days or more of honorable service, or, if less than 90 days, if discharged for disability incurred in line of duty, who suffer with permanent total disability, regardless of service connection, if not due to misconduct. Only $5 per month is paid to single men, without dependents, while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by a Government agency.

EDUCATION

Congress provided in 1944 that any veteran who served on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and whose education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of his entrance into the service, or who desires a refresher or retraining course, and who served 90 days or more, is entitled to education at public expense. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice up to $500 per year for tuition and books and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if single and $75 if married, not to exceed 4 years. Any person who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service is assumed to have had his education interrupted. Veterans must meet the regular entrance and scholarship requirements.

FARM, HOME, AND SMALL BUSINESS OWNERSHIP

The Federal Government, through the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, will guarantee up to 50 percent and as high as $2,000 of any approved loan secured by a veteran from a private or Government source for purchase or operation of a farm, home, or small business. Loans will be interest-free the first year and interest will not exceed 4 percent per annum. Applications for this benefit must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs within 2 years after discharge by those who served in the armed forces on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to termination of this war.

JOBS

Congress provided, in 1944, in addition to the foregoing education, farm, home, and small business opportunities, that every veteran of World War No. 2 shall be helped to find a job. The United States Employment Service and the Veterans' Placement Service Board cooperate to fill this responsibility. Veterans are to be registered and every effort made to assist them to find jobs. This provision includes veterans of all wars. Information on how to get the benefits of this provision can be obtained by the veteran from his own local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

Return to the job after discharge is under jurisdiction of Selective Service; placing in other jobs is under War Manpower Commission; veterans' preference is administered by United States Civil Service Commission and various departments and agencies; job training, rehabilitation (nonservice disability) is administered by Federal Security Agency.

Certain preferences as to Federal civil service, as to physical and age prerequisites, examinations, ratings, appointments, retentions, and reinstatement of Federal employment are extended to qualified service-connected disabled veterans, the wives of unemployable service-connected or 50-year-aged pensioned veterans, the widows of veterans, and other war veterans and regulars, supplemented by extensive United States Employment Service, and Veterans Employment Service, in every State, for war veterans. Any World War No. 2 veteran who applies therefor, within 40 days after discharge, is entitled to reinstatement to the Federal position held at time of entering service, or to one of equal grade and pay, or to his previous private employment, where at all practicable for employer, enforceable by order of court, if necessary.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Congress provided, in 1944, that for the first 2 years after a veteran's discharge he will be entitled to unemployment compensation for 52 weeks if he cannot find a job or the Employment Service cannot find one for him. This allowance is $20 per week, less that part of the wages payable to him for such week which is in excess of $3. Provisions for unemployment compensation, farm, home, and business ownership and education are part of the so-called G. I. bill of rights, one of many veterans' bills prepared in 1943–44 by the World War Veterans' Committee.

Labor Speaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following speech delivered by me at 11:30 a. m., June 18, 1944, on radio station WBZA, Hotel Bradford, Boston, Mass., entitled "Labor Speaks":

Labor is speaking this very minute not only through the millions of its members in the armed forces at every battle station around the world but through the millions who are producing the weapons needed for victory.

In this earth-shaking struggle between the people and the forces of reaction the cause of humanity is winning through.

Four long and bitter years have passed since the evacuation of Dunkerque—4 years during which freemen struggled desperately and at times hopelessly for mere survival. Four years during which the light of civilization flickered low before the storms of tyranny. In spite of the Luftwaffe and the panzer divisions, the concentration camps with their tortures and mass murders, in spite of Hitler, Goering, Goebbels, Himmler, Tojo, and those who collaborated with this terror, the spirit of man held fast. Now, at last, the day of vindication approaches.

But the spirit of man could not have survived the brutal assault of fascism without power to answer power. The margin of survival was narrow. I doubt if many people in our country even now realize how close we came to disaster. Be that as it may, the crisis is past. Great efforts lie before us, but we know that we have the spiritual faith and the material resources needed for the victory.

At Dunkerque we had too little and too late. How that grim and pitiful scene has changed. Today we have unchallenged sea and air power. The United States, Britain, and Russia have the best-equipped armies in the world. We waited long but we waited until we were ready and now we move forward to bring the world criminals to justice. What accomplished this miracle? I say, without hesitation, that this great part of the coming victory belongs to the will and the skill of American labor. From a Nation that was pathetically unprepared, we have built the greatest Navy and the most effective Air Force in the world. And to our allies we have given large quantities of the tools of war. No less an authority than Premier Stalin of Russia, has acknowledged his debt to American production. Out of our fields and factories, across long stretches of submarine-infested waters to ice-bound Murmansk and the burning Persian Gulf we sent the materials which stayed the Russian retreat and enabled the Red armies to break the back of Nazi aggression. Even as I speak, we know that American arms are being sent to the underground in France and to Marshal Tito's forces in Yugoslavia. And in due time, this lifeblood of supplies will give vigor to our Chinese allies.

This is labor's contribution to victory. But labor knows that the problems of the peace to follow may be no less acute than the immediate demands of war. The Congress of Industrial Organizations is preparing to meet this challenge with fair, intelligent, and straightforward action. The city of Washington is crowded with lobbies, pressure groups seeking sordid, selfish gains. In this disturbing picture of greed, it is refreshing to be able to single out the C. I. O. For this organization is basing its program, not on the special needs of labor alone, but on the broad and firm foundation of the national welfare.

This is Americanism in the best sense of the word. It allows for legitimate self-interest, but it is also concerned with community responsibility, for the true welfare of the individual depends upon the health and happiness of his neighbors. Only in this cooperative spirit can we meet and master the problems which face the Nation, not only during the trials of war, but in the social and economic readjustments which must follow.

The Congress of Industrial Organizations is interested in promoting the welfare of all people who work for a living. It seeks a fair share for labor from the harvest of production. It seeks economic insurance for those workers whose security is imperiled by age, disability, or enforced lay-offs. Of more immediate importance, it is improving the conditions under which labor works. The safety and sanctity of his home, the education of his children, the health and happiness of the worker himself, all these values it promotes, all for the unity and continued progress of American democracy.

But as our soldiers and sailors fight and die that we may live, there are special lobbies in Washington who seek to destroy on the home front what our men are winning on the battle fronts.

The current debate on price control is but a mere sample. Amendment after amendment is being added to the act. If retained, these crippling amendments would open up the flood-gates to inflation. The wages of American labor could not possibly keep pace with the rising cost of living. This is an issue of grave concern to every American worker. I am happy to say that the Congress of Industrial Organizations is fighting this home-front sabotage with all the sincerity and energy it commands. But to win this fight for stability, the C. I. O. must have the active support of every wage earner in the country. The time has come for political action. Let the Congress of the United States know your mandate. Fight with the democratic weapons of your voice, your pen, and your ballot * * * to make certain that the security of your purchasing power is not undermined. Millions of our men, far off on foreign battlefronts, are too busy for this. They must depend on you to safeguard the economic welfare of their families home. Fight for a Price Control Act which will protect you from the threat of rising prices. Do it now * * * before it is too late. And remember that this is a present and continuing fight. You have a part to play in this fight against inflation. Whenever you buy, make certain that you never pay more than ceiling prices for any commodity. This is it. This is your battle on the home front.

The C. I. O. has organized for political action. In a democracy, political action means that every citizen must make it his business to know what is being done in Washington. Political action means that you cannot expect others to do this for you. Effective democracy means that you must make your economic rights known, while the legislation is being formulated.

Labor has made the greatest gains in history during this administration. In the future, these gains must be secured and extended. From some quarters we hear the cry that increased power demands increased responsibility. That is profoundly true. I have every confidence, however, that labor is aware of its responsibility to the Nation. At the same time I wonder if other groups with greater power and greater wealth are as acutely aware of their responsibilities to the American workingman and workingwoman.

Even now, these special interests seek to turn the American soldier against the American worker. This must not happen. The individual American soldier and the individual American worker are winning this war because they form an unbeatable team. They must stand together as citizens to build a constructive peace.

As of this fateful moment, fascism is the common enemy. Fascism took the great powers released by science and sought, by these means, to enslave all for the benefit of a few. The aroused conscience of mankind will defeat fascism on the battlefield. But will it defeat the more subtle forces of exploitation that bore from within? This is the challenge to constant vigilance for all who labor. Let us not be afraid of words. The world is going through a period of social and economic revolution. This is the inevitable ferment at work in every nation of this world. We have found the answer to the problem of production. How we must achieve a more equitable distribution. In our time and our country, modified by our American outlook, we must find this answer. It will not come from those who would turn back the clock to a period in our history that has gone forever. It will come from the true voice of democracy, from the millions who labor.

In his message to Congress this year, the President said: "This Republic had its beginning and grew to its present strength, under the protection of certain inalienable political rights, among them the rights of free speech, free press, free worship, trial by jury, freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. They were our rights to life and liberty.

"As our Nation has grown in size and stature, however, as our industrial economy expanded, these political rights proved inadequate to assure us equality in the pursuit of happiness.

"We have come to a clear realization of the fact that true individual freedom cannot exist without economic security and independence. Necessitous men are not free men. People who are hungry and out of a job are the stuff of which dictatorships are made."

American labor is winning the fight to give our men the tools to win. In the readjustments of peace, let American labor go forward with courage and dignity to establish a standard of living higher than we have ever known. By alert citizenship and group action, labor can do more than any other group to establish a commonwealth of free men, busy men, secure men that will be the fulfillment of the American ideal.

As we witness the courage and the sacrifice of our men at the front we must—all of us—feel a solemn obligation to carry on, here at home, for them. With this shining example before us, let us resolve to work together as comrades in American citizenship, to eliminate poverty and ignorance, that all may share in the fruits of work, well done.

Excerpts From Speeches Delivered During the Seventy-eighth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include various excerpts from the speeches I have made on important legislative subjects during the past 18 months of the Seventy-eighth Congress.

The people of my district are entitled to know how their Representative stood on the important issues we have considered.

PRICE CONTROL OR INFLATION

May 7, 1943

Price control of living costs has been adopted by every member of the United Nations as a vital part of the war effort. * * * In practically every instance their controls are more rigid and severe because their scarcities are greater. * * * We now have price control. * * * We must make it work by retaining all its good points and eliminating its evils. * * * Due to the uncontrolled prices in World War No. 1 we laid the basis for the crash of 1921 and the postponed depression of 1929. * * * Do we want to see this condition again? Yet this is what we face unless we win the battle against inflation.

THE TRUTH ABOUT PRICE CONTROL

The people of America are entitled to know the truth about a function of Government which affects the standard of living of 132,000,000 people. In order to check the rising spiral in the cost of living and prevent the disastrous repetition that occurred during and after World War No. 1, Congress on January 30, 1942, passed the Emergency Price Control Act. * * * War is economic waste. It always causes scarcity. Scarcity usually means high prices and high prices mean inflation. After inflation comes deflation—the collapse of business we call depression. It was to prevent this vicious cycle that Congress passed the Price Control Act in 1942. * * * I do not claim the O. P. A. has been perfect. They have made mistakes and will make more, but the benefits far outweigh the evils. * * * In World War No. 1, sugar rose from 5 cents to 27 cents per pound; butter went from 30 cents to 78 cents per pound. * * * In terms of averages, retail food prices advanced over 126 percent. * * * World War No. 2 has been going for 53 months and we have had price control for only 24 months of that time. Yet the rise in the cost of living has been only 25 percent according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics—less than half the rise that took place in World War No. 1. * * * We believe the millions of American people on fixed income should be protected against the war profiteers. We believe that this war that our sons and daughters are winning with their maimed and broken bodies, should not create another batch of blood millionaires. We believe the dependent families of these boys and girls are entitled to protection against war profiteers, so their meager allowances will cover the cost of the necessities of life. The O. P. A. is our principal defense against inflation.

SOLICITUDE FOR THE VETERAN OF ALL WARS IS OUR PATRIOTIC DUTY

May 16, 1944

Since my first day in Congress, I have supported all the legislation brought before the house for consideration which had as its purpose the veterans' welfare. I yield to no man a higher regard or greater admiration for those men and women who have left their civilian paths and entered the armed forces of our country. The resources of America which they are preserving, in many instances with their maimed and broken bodies, should be mobilized in such a manner that their rehabilitation and readjustment into civilian life can be assured. * * * The able-bodied must be provided jobs. The sick and disabled must be provided with adequate hospitalization. Where vocational or academic education is desired, it must be made available. Where homes or farms are needs, provisions for long-term, low-interest-rate loans must be made. * * * Many of these men and women will not return. * * * To their dependents we owe not only a financial obligation, we must try to discharge, but a debt of gratitude which a thankful people can never repay.

SERVICEMEN'S DEPENDENTS DESERVE ADEQUATE ALLOWANCE

October 18, 1943

Testimony given by recognized statistical departments such as the Cost of Living Division, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor, prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that the entire scale of dependency benefits should be revised upward to furnish the families of the members of our armed forces a decent maintenance allowance. There will, of course, be the cry from some of the Members of economy, but I take the position today as in the past—human rights are more sacred than property rights. To those who raise the cry of "It will cost too much," I give this answer: No nation can afford the ungrateful parsimonious policy of forcing an indecent and insufficient standard of living on the dependents of its fighting heroes.

ELEVEN MILLION VOTERS—SHALL WE ALLOW THOSE WHO FIGHT FOR DEMOCRACY TO VOTE FOR DEMOCRACY?

December 18, 1943

Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my commendation and some words of appreciation to many others from home and abroad, for the great fight that the gentleman from Texas, Mr. WOALEY, is making on behalf of the servicemen's right to vote. Many of us who believe in extending the rights and privileges of suffrage to our men and women in uniform are deeply grateful for his leadership. Many of the States' requirements are so severe that for all practical purposes absentee voting is impossible. These factors and many others which space does not permit me to inscribe will prevent the members of our Armed Forces from voting if the matter is left to the separate action of the 48 States. As I see it, several imperatives exist:

(a) A uniform Federal ballot approved by Federal law.

(b) Full cooperation of our Federal military facilities and personnel in the (1) transportation and distribution of ballots, (2) operation of the polls, and (3) collection and returning of the cast ballots to their respective States.

Here the Federal cooperation ceases and the States distribute to their respective election boards the sealed ballots. Thus you have joint action of the Federal and State authorities. The spirit of democratic suffrage has been maintained. State rights would be protected and at the same time we as a grateful Nation could set an example of democracy in action, an example of democracy, zealous of the rights of 11,000,000 service men and women to cast their votes even in times of war.

DISCHARGE COMPENSATION FOR WORLD WAR NO. 2 VETERANS ($100 PER MONTH FOR 12 MONTHS)

December 13, 1943

Mr. Speaker, I have given a great deal of thought to the moral responsibility of the Representatives in Congress toward the veterans of this global war which we are now engaged in. I feel that we have a duty and a responsibility to introduce and pass before the end of this war proper legislation to provide adequate protection and to a certain extent at least compensate the members of our armed forces during the period immediately following demobilization day.

My bill, H. R. 3735, was introduced on November 24, 1943. * * * The bill provides for a flat sum of $100 per month extended compensation after discharge. * * * The important thing is that this principle of extended or discharge compensation be enacted into law before the end of this war. The adoption of this principle will be a great force in improving the morale of our troops and removing the fear and uneasiness from their minds, when they think of the uncertainty of their financial and economic status during the post-war demobilization period.

REAL FREE ENTERPRISE—FREEDOM OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY

April 7, 1944

I happen to be a sincere believer in real free enterprise—the kind of free enterprise which has been the backbone of our Nation until recently. Our democracy was founded on the rights of an individual to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. In order to insure those inherent rights we guaranteed to our people either specifically or by implication, three great principles without which our Nation cannot endure: religious freedom, political freedom, and economic freedom. * * * I believe sincerely in these three principles. I believe that we are swiftly losing the third freedom—the right to economic freedom, which embraces the principle of free enterprise.

Is free enterprise as now practiced really free? * * * Are we to be told again that free enterprise, as it now functions, will lead the people into full employment? * * * The free enterprise of big business was in control, without Government interference, preceding the crash of 1929 to 1932. Have the champions of free enterprise changed their methods of operation or solved the cause of periodic depressions? Unfortunately for the American people, the answer to the last question is an emphatic "No." * * *

We must insist on full operation of our plant facilities, in order that full employment may bring the blessings of full production to our people. We must decentralize the monopolistic corporate economic empires within our business system. * * * We must restore the economic opportunity that is inherent in real free enterprise and give the independent businessman a chance to operate successfully again in our society. * * *

May God give us the clarity of vision to demand the restoration of real free enterprise of our fathers, and protect us from the fraudulent brand of free enterprise as advocated by the great corporate monopolies of big business.

IN THE MIDST OF WAR—PREPARE FOR A JUST AND LASTING PEACE

The United Nations must take the initiative in forming an international organization to function as a parliamentary, judicial, and executive body on global questions. * * * It is my opinion that a world nuclear organization should be formed before victory, if possible, and that the present unity which exists primarily because of military pressure, should be utilized before the reason for it is weakened by victory. * * * The peoples of the world are entitled to ask their leaders to embody in their plans for an international organization three great principles in order that we may have global peace. The principles I suggest are: International security, international justice, and international welfare of peoples. If these principles are embodied in the formulation of an international order, we can have a permanent and lasting peace. If they are ignored, in part or together, world peace will be impossible.

We fight for the freedom and dignity of the individual soul, without which spiritual strength and growth is denied and without which true worship of God is impossible. We fight for the recognition of the brotherhood of all men everywhere, even those who are now our enemies and unless the brotherhood of man is established universally, we can only pay lip tribute to the fatherhood of God. We fight for a better world than we've had before—a world "wherein dwelleth righteousness"; where an environment can be established in a physical and material way that will encourage spiritual growth among the children of men. These are the things we fight for, whether consciously or unknowingly.

In my opinion only a goal which includes these great spiritual aims justifies the travail which humanity is presently enduring. It is only through securing such a world for the men and women in our armed forces to come back to, that we can justify the sacrifices of those who fail to return.

UNITY FOR VICTORY

April 2, 1943

A democracy is comprised of many different groups of people with apparently separate interests. * * * No important group or interest in America can be isolated or segregated from another group entirely. There is always present an overlapping, mingling, or duplication of common interests which prevent segregation. * * * The members of the capital management groups, those who are in the labor group, and last, but not least, the members of our armed forces, must not be divided by any injudicious act of ours. We as advisors and protectors of the welfare of the Nation must not unwittingly aid the clever divide-and-conquer plans of our enemies. * * * The welfare of our Nation as a democratic society depends on our intelligent opposition to the Axis effort to segregate these groups into antagonistic, destructive units.

LABOR SHOULD NOT BE PUNISHED

June 2, 1943

Obviously the war can be won only through the harmonious efforts of every section of American society. We cannot at this time afford to drive a divisive wedge into our united efforts. * * * Let us consider the 8,000,000-plus of our young men and women who are members of the armed forces. They come from every level of American life—the rich, the poor, the capitalist, and the laborer—all making their sacrifices to preserve America as it was when they entered the service. And now let us consider the American people that constitute one of the most important parts of our civilian life as it pertains to war production; I speak of the 12,000,000 members of organized labor. What is their record? I say that their record is finest of any labor group in the world. They have given of their membership into the armed forces over 2,000,000 members. But most important of all, through their efforts we have achieved the greatest production of matériel of war the world has ever known. Our free labor has outproduced the slave labor of the Axis. Let us act wisely therefore and not allow our justified feeling of resentment against a few wildcat strikes to rush us into a legislative act which will punish and penalize over 12,000,000 loyal members of organized labor.

CIVIL LIBERTIES OF OUR CITIZENS

May 18 and February 10, 1943

In this time of war hysteria it is the solemn duty of every representative of the people to defend the civil liberties of our citizens. It is a time when the three branches of government should be maintained inviolate. We have given up many of our civil privileges as a necessity to the war effort, but we should be on guard for the first attack on the Bill of Rights, even if that attack is instituted and authorized by a congressional resolution. * * * In conclusion, may I say that we who love the democratic way of life and would die to preserve the civil liberties of the individual, upon which this Nation was founded, should be more alert now than ever before to guard against those forces within our midst who, under the guise of Americanism, are following the Axis propaganda line of divide and conquer.

RACISM—THE FOE OF DEMOCRACY

October 19 and November 16, 1943

Mr. Speaker, the theory of totalitarian philosophy is not bounded or limited by geographical boundaries. * * * Wherever twisted minds are found, there also is found the ground wherein the seeds of totalitarian philosophy will grow. * * * We frequently find men and women practicing, in many cases without knowing it, one of the most vicious tenets of totalitarianism. The practice I speak of is that of racial discrimination and its accompanying trait, minority group persecution. * * * It is my opinion, gentlemen, that democracy is justified in passing laws which will stamp out in every way possible this abominable doctrine of racism. We are a Nation composed of many races. Our existence as a Nation depends upon the unifying force of racial equality and opportunity before the law. Our national life depends upon the willingness of all those races to fight and, if necessary, die for its preservation. Any attempt to incite racial hatred or strife is a dagger in the heart of democracy and a threat against your liberties and mine.

The Grandest Job of Our Century

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a commencement address delivered by Mr. David E. Lilienthal, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, at the College of the City of New York, on June 17 last. The subject of the address was The Grandest Job of Our Century. It is an able and challenging presentation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is a strange and fearful hour in history—this spring of 1944. In the very week in which you are graduated death and destruction have reached a pitch of fury such as men have never before witnessed; the whole earth is convulsed in turmoil and unbelievable suffering. And yet it is a time not of despair but of great expectations. In the face of unparalleled destruction and grief, in spite of agonies of anxiety and sorrow and hardship, the prevailing spirit among Americans and the peoples of many other parts of the world is not despair but hopefulness. Our thoughts are upon tomorrow in the very darkest hour of this night.

This is not merely a pathetic attempt to escape from the grim realities. Indeed the reality—and many people sense it—is this: ahead can lie the most fruitful era of creation the world has yet known. Beyond the war there opens before us an historic opportunity—it is but an "opportunity," not an inevitable wave of the future—an opportunity without parallel for the building of new life and a new and firmer foundation beneath our feet.

By an age of building I do not mean only the putting together again of what war has torn apart, not just rebuilding what the guns and bombs have destroyed. We are rather standing at the gateway of an age of expansion, of the flowering of creative forces of the modern imagination and the new skills and knowledge of modern man.

This giant task of creation may be the most bold and stirring adventure of the human spirit since the circumnavigation of the globe. It can release a flood of pent-up genius in the works of building, in the skills of management, in the fine arts, and in the development of the free spirit beyond our imagining.

History is filled with monumental paradox. But this is the greatest paradox of all—that the splendor of a creative age should follow close upon a nightmare of destruction. It is a pardox that can give added meaning to the war, fresh meaning to the death in the lonely skies and distant seas of those young men who might otherwise be here with you tonight. The prospect that prodigious creation may follow gigantic destruction, that the satisfaction that men feel in building will displace the futility of tearing down—is one to give us heart, to add fire to our will to fight, quicken our resolve to win, so that we can then devote ourselves completely to this, the grand job of our century.

When I speak of an era of creation and building I speak not of an ideal world lying somewhere in the remote future, peopled by a different kind of human beings than we actually are, and living under a social system devised in the imagination. Nor am I speaking in the language of prophecy or prediction. I am describing an imminent opportunity, something that can be done, beginning on that tomorrow when the war has been won, in the America of here and now. The great job can be done with tools of knowledge and organization already in our hands.

The understanding and the skill that you have received as students in this college, and that thousands of other young men and women like you have acquired on other campuses, become part of that reservoir of knowledge that gives us, now, in our time, the power to act, to create, to mold the very face of things.

The skills of organization and technology do exist. But it is not foregone, not automatic nor inevitable that they will be used for an age of creation. We must have the will to embark on the adventure, the resolution to begin, to begin from where we are, not waiting until the day of some ideal society for the bold setting-out. We as a people need the will and the faith—but more, a sense that this is the historic hour, that this is the time to turn the first shovel.

What stands in the way of this golden prospect? Not lack of knowledge. We know how. We know how to organize to do almost anything. Take a trip through one of the new war plants covering 50 acres, built in a few months; through laboratories and new Army hospitals. Observe how quickly we can train tens of thousands of men to be technicians of every kind. Lack of knowledge does not stand in the way, nor lack of physical resources if scientifically developed. Do we lack initiative and daring and high spirits? Are we held back by the bonds of tradition or caste? Of course not. Does conflict between groups within America prevent our entering an era of great building? Definitely not; we can indeed boast that nowhere on earth in any period of human history has there been a vast nation less cursed with deep class divisions. The knowledge of technology and of organization, the resources and the imaginative spirit are all here.

But there is a danger. It is not an inconsiderable one. The danger is that we may permit ourselves to be diverted from the creative opportunities by disputes over economic and political theories and dogmas. The danger is that we will allow our energies and our driving vitality to be consumed in violent controversy over meaningless slogans and catch-phrases, by name calling over vague abstractions—undefined phrases such as "free enterprise," "collectivism," "reactionary," or "radical."

My fear is that preoccupation with words may divert us from the flesh-and-blood realities, from the real things that we could agree should be done and could be done to strengthen the basis of democratic life for all of us in America.

When I speak of the opportunity to build America I am not talking about such slogans or abstractions, but of real things that we can see and understand. I speak of the very foundation stones of life itself, upon which all else rests. The current preoccupation with labels, with words that flow so smoothly out of American dogmatists as they inundate us here at home, and do not even spare our nonplussed allies abroad—words about words, and words upon words—these will only add to our confusion and our divisions. The words will inevitably mean different things in the mind of each man who uses them and listens to them. Men will always dispute over economic and political abstractions.

But real things cut through the fog of dogma.

A program for America's building that deals with those real things can be understood and can be acted upon.

An American development program for your generation, for the period from now until 1975, a program for America's building, can be stated in terms of real things—land, factories, streams, electricity, forests, jobs, minerals.

THE LAND

America's soil needs badly to be strengthened, the topsoil preserved, the fertility restored, in an intensive 20- to 30-year enterprise. A new beginning has been made in the past decade—but only a beginning.

This vast undertaking will vitalize the private business of farming and add to the attractiveness of farming as a family way of life. It will mean new opportunities and new jobs in factories making soil chemicals, agricultural machinery, electric pumps, tractors, materials for millions of farm buildings and barns and rural schools.

THE RIVERS AND STREAMS

America's vast rivers need grievously to be put under control and made to work for, not against, the people.

Our methods of managing almost all of our rivers, after all these years of trying, is still in the ox-team period, compared with American progress in nearly every other technical field.

To develop our rivers by modern methods is by no means beyond our capacities, but it will be the largest engineering project of all time. It will save thousands of communities and farms and private businesses from periodic invasion by floodwaters. Enterprise will be nourished along the new water highways. The modernized rivers will provide an inexhaustible source of electrical energy out of waters now wasted and destructive. Irrigation with stored waters will cause to flourish millions of acres that now are fertile but dead. Lakes will be formed that will create spots of beauty for outdoor recreation.

The development of America's rivers on a huge scale will raise up a profession of monumental builders such as the world has never seen.

Out of such a huge development of America's incomparable rivers would come countless new private undertakings—the building of barges and towboats, the erection of electric furnaces and hundred other kinds of old and new enterprise to use the added power, the building of hotels and hostels along the new man-made lakes, the expansion of existing business no longer threatened by flood destruction, the building of new highways and railroads to keep up with the resulting expansion.

THE FORESTS AND MINERALS

America's forests need to be restored and refreshed, after the drain of a century, by the most extensive reforestation undertaking in human history, and by the spread of scientific forestry methods, in an intensive educational effort the country over. Our present forest supplies need to be converted to countless new products made possible by the discoveries of science.

America's minerals need to become the basis of the greatest exploratory and research program ever undertaken, on a quarter-century schedule, to promote the most intensive and prudent and wealth-creating utilization of these fundamental resources.

These programs for forests and minerals would mean increased need for technicians and administrators of many kinds that would strain the universities and private laboratories and training centers; it would mean hundreds and thousands of new industrial processes, new and exciting jobs and opportunities in existing and new private industries and in public service.

These are real things to be developed and built upon—the land, the waters, the minerals, the forests. Here in sight of the towers of the greatest city in America it is so easy for us to forget that the foundation of these skyscrapers is not the rock of Manhattan but the soil of America, her forests and streams and minerals. But it is quite as easy to forget this fundamental fact in Omaha in sight of the Great Plains, or in Chattanooga, or Denver. There is something about being in a city, any city, that makes one feel self-sufficient, cut off from the real underpinning of our life.

I trust I have made it clear to you that the American development I am describing is not what is usually labelled a "public works" program. Public works would be involved, of course, for bridges and highways and new postoffices and schools and sewer systems would be necessary if America took the step toward expansion that such a program would entail. But that would be incidental.

Nor is this a proposal to provide unemployment relief, a "shot in the arm" of public employment to tide over a period when private employment or investment is tending to stagnate. If we fail to strengthen and develop the foundations of all private undertakings by some such program as this, we will certainly need more and more frequent doses of all kinds of economic benzedrine. The program I speak of relates not to such devices, whatever their merits, but to the very source of productiveness itself.

Here is another illustration of the way the dogmatist delights in abstract phrases that only confuse—neatly segregating public works from private enterprise as if they were not both parts of the same living tissue of community existence, interacting and wholly interdependent. The building of a new automobile factory, privately owned, develops a need for new highways, publicly built. New highways—public works so-called—create the opportunity and the need for new automobile factories, oil refineries, tire factories, filling stations, and so on. The arbitrary labels that identify highways as public works and automobile making as private enterprise are convenient; but they are no more than that. The labels have nothing to do with the fundamental unity of physical development of things.

A dogmatist, a worshiper of words, may be defined as a man who has his feet firmly planted in midair. But factories and new jobs and new products, more fertile soil, and improved nutrition—the things people want, the things such a building program for your generation will produce—these realities rest not in midair on words and dogmas, but upon the realities of the earth, upon the resources of Nature, upon the technical and organizing skills of men and women.

The expansion in our standard of living in America that can take place between 1945 and 1975 can be accomplished with no fundamental change in our institutions of government or of property. To do this particular job the Constitution of the United States needs no amendment, nor does the scope of functions of Government require basic revision.

Nor is dictation and coercion of the citizen by private organizations or by government the price of such a mammoth building enterprise. On the contrary, a further development of characteristic American methods of voluntary cooperation would be essential. There is a very simple reason for this: Unless there is public understanding and public confidence in what is being done, there would not be public participation—voluntary and understanding participation by the businessman, the labor leader and worker in the factories, the farmer on the land, the teacher and preacher and librarian and physician and local official. The undertaking is too broad, its threads too closely interwoven to be possible of accomplishment except by voluntary methods. And, unless the method of the program's fulfillment be one that encourages participation—in short, voluntary methods—then freedom and opportunity for individual development would have lost rather than gained ground; and the physical achievements would be of dubious value.

The part of the United States where I live and work—the Valley of the Tennessee River—offers some evidence of what a comprehensive program of economic development can produce, in benefits to the people. In that valley the people and their institutions—among them the resource development corporation known as T. V. A.—have in a decade completely changed the face of the region. The standard of living has materially increased for nearly all of 5,000,000 citizens. The productiveness of the area has grown manyfold; faster than has that of the country as a whole in that decade. Opportunities for interesting work for the young men and women have increased. There are many new factories and jobs and professional work that did not exist before. Standards of health and education have gone upward. There is a resurgence of confidence, a chesty feeling, a dynamic burgeoning of human energy, a dreaming of future plans and further development that has been described by observers, among them Thomas Mann, as a manifestation of the American pioneer spirit at its best.

The Tennessee River has been put to work by engineering structures, made to serve as a reliable river channel, as a source of electric power that has multiplied the region's energy resources by 10 times in a decade. The soil, so lacking in fertility only a decade ago, is fast being restored by farmers and their associations; that soil and farm electricity have become the basis of attractive and prosperous living. Out of the modern tools they now have in their hands the people are fashioning a new valley.

Millions of visitors from every region of America have come to the Tennessee Valley to see for themselves these dramatic changes and to observe the T. V. A.'s methods. Not only from other American valleys, but from all over the world have come observers in a steady stream—men from China and Brazil, from India and Italy, Egypt, Bolivia, Ontario, New Zealand. These visitors, their imaginations stirred and spirits hopeful, sense that what has taken place in that once remote American valley could be made to happen, too, in their valleys, in almost any of a thousand valleys the world over.

What does all this mean to you?

What can you do about it?

You have received years of training. You are looking forward, after the war at least, to putting your training to useful creative work. What can you do to bring about this picture of an America of expanding opportunity?

Today the fighting and winning of the war is everyone's first concern. But there is something you can do, and do now, that will be useful in this grand job of the century.

Know this country's resources; know your region's resources, the real things upon which your life is built. Keep in mind how America is really put together, what really makes it tick.

Get the interesting habit of looking at a river, for example, as a force in the life of your region rather than a piece of scenery or a place merely to go boating; the relation of that river to factories and farms. Begin to look at the land not as dirt or farms, not as merely what separates one railroad station from another, but as a vital force that determines the livelihood of your city and your own future. Think of your country not only in terms of statistics and economic principles and political policies, but as farmers, woodsmen, chemists, steel workers, lumber and lumber mills, mines and miners. Think about steel-rolling mills and wheat and cattle, and the men and the communities that produce them, the relation of those men and their children to your chosen field of work and your region, their place in this period of development I have described. Think of floods not merely as something reported each spring on the fourth page of the New York Times. Think of people drowned, communities disrupted, railroads stopped. Think of floods as waste, waste that dams could save. Think of what such saving of lives and property means to the people of New York City and Cleveland and Springfield, Ill., and a thousand other centers of commerce.

The kind of American development I have been talking about will depend upon all of us thinking and uttering almost lovingly words that speak of pine and cedar, of streams and rivers, of aircraft factories and steel billets, of red clay and black loam, and fields of wheat, wave after wave, of barges and of electric lines, of coal and copper ore, of construction workers and miners and farmers and doctors and lawyers and teachers—of things and of people.

You are beginning your active careers at a time of great sorrow and destruction, and also a period of great opportunity. The kind of opportunity for choice of life work and of service that will present itself to each one of you, will depend to a large degree not upon what happens right here in the United States—upon whether in the coming years we are a static nation, resting on our laurels, holding fearfully to what we have; or a land that forever renews its youth by magnificent dreams, noble plans, and great deeds.

The South Must Choose Its Own Way

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, in Southern States steps are being taken by political leaders which indicate a coolness in the South toward some of the trends lately evident in our national administration. There are those who question or condemn these activities. I neither question nor condemn them. The South has a perfect right to seek good government and to explore the methods by which it may be obtained.

If Texas, Mississippi, Louisiana, and South Carolina, and the States which may join them, are able to convince this Nation that the South is not necessarily a voiceless, helpless appendage of the Democratic Party, I shall personally be very proud of them. And there may be no better way of so convincing the Nation than the course presently advocated in these States for independent and, if necessary, drastic action in the coming election.

Yes; I am a Democrat. But first, I am an American and a southerner. And we in the South like to think that as Americans we, too, are entitled to our way of life, to our traditions; even entitled to old-fashioned democracy since we happen to prefer that kind to state socialism.

There are some in our party, and they are high in its councils, who want to rewrite our way of life in the South. There are others who see in the South only a block of votes which at 4-year intervals can be counted almost solidly Democratic, and which can be comfortably forgotten between these intervals.

Neither group understands the South or seeks very diligently to understand it. The South does not ask to be segregated, nor does it want to sit in the front row of the new world order. The South wants to develop its resources, to take advantage of long semidormant assets. The South wants equitable freight rates. It wants agricultural prices which will begin to counterbalance the long, long years of tariff discriminations against southern products. The South wants to develop its waterways, its shipping, and its ports, some of which are even now being frozen out in anticipation of the reduced shipping of the post-war period. The South asks no greater recognition than that to which any large area of this Nation is entitled, but that much it does ask, and it is my hope that it will learn to demand its just recognition.

The South is American to the core. No intellectually honest person questions that fact. It carved its homes from the great New World wilderness, fought for this Nation's freedom, developed a culture and a way of life, then waged and lost a tragic war for the things in which it believed. But the South does not live in a departed age. It does not look back to the romance and glory of other days. It looks ahead. It builds on the future, the future of the South and of the United States. Love of country and love for the things for which it stands are bred into our people. We have no "isms" down there but Americanism.

So, my friends, let me assure you that statesmanship in the South is not dead. The movement for political and economic recognition which you have noted is not a work of irresponsibility. If there is concern about the stirrings of political independence in the South, let it be charged to a quest for assurance that we in the South may continue to enjoy democratic processes as we know them.

Illinois Farming in Wartime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by me on the subject Illinois Farming in Wartime.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Illinois farmers, like those in the rest of the country, met unprecedented wartime demands with record-breaking production. The huge output of the Nation's farms made the millions of men and women in our armed forces the best fed and clothed in the world, enabled the United States to send huge food shipments to its allies, and at the same time gave the civilian population during 1941, 1942, and 1943 the best diet level they ever had enjoyed in any 3-year period.

To date during the war period prices of most farm products have been favorable, and farm income is the highest on record. Farm purchasing power also gained, as national price-control efforts held the line on most things farmers buy. In contrast to the rise in mortgage debt that marked farm prosperity in the First World War, farmers in the Second World War used part of their improved incomes to reduce their long-term debt substantially.

Farmers achieved their tremendous war production with far less permanent damage to the soil than that which marked the smaller wartime effort of 1917 and 1918. The agricultural effort of the Second World War was more closely geared to the total national economy than in the earlier struggle. Production goals for various products were established in the light of available manpower, materials, machinery, and land as well as military and civilian requirements. Agriculture's claims to essentials of production were presented in the national councils. The War Food Administration gave general direction and assistance to wartime production, processing, and distribution of essential farm products. National farm programs which had helped farmers pull out of the slump of the early thirties proved flexible enough to aid in stimulating wartime production and distribution. Through existing representative committees farmers themselves had a large voice in the creation and administration of wartime farm policies.

Illinois is an important agricultural State. On its 213,439 farms totaling 31,032,572 acres, it has 968,103 rural people or 12.3 percent of the State's population. Illinois ranks fourth among all the States in value of total agricultural output, which was $1,146,000,000 in 1943. It ranked first in production of soybeans, second in corn and hogs, fourth in chickens and sixth in eggs.

In 1943 agricultural production in the United States was 28 percent above the prewar average for 1935–39 and 45 percent above the average of the 2 years of America's participation in the First World War, 1917–18. In terms of percentage, this is how Illinois farmers' 1943 production of important products compared with the 1935–39 average:

Hogs	130
Cattle and calves	123
Corn	122
Soybeans	227
Milk	108
Eggs	142
Chickens	129
Oats	95
Butterfat	109
Wheat	56
Sheep and lambs	104
Hay	94

Requirements for armed forces, lend-lease and other exports have taken an increasing proportion of United States food production: 6 percent in 1941, 15 percent in 1942, 21 percent in 1943 and an estimated 25 percent in 1944.

In addition to meeting record war needs, American farmers have produced enough to feed civilians during this war better than in any other period in our history. Per capita civilian consumption of principal foods indicated for 1944 compares with pre-war and last year as follows:

Commodity or group	Pounds in 1944	Percent of 1935–39 average	Percent of 1943
Meats	145	115	106
Eggs	44	118	103
Fluid milk and cream	396	116	98
Fats and oils	46	96	100
Fresh citrus fruits	65	133	109
Fresh vegetables	242	103	104
Sugar	81	84	104
Wheat (flour)	158	102	100

Cash receipts from the sale of farm products in 1943 reached the all-time record of $19,252,173,000 in the United States and $1,146,626,000 in Illinois. These amounts for the United States were 140 percent above the 1935–39 pre-war average, 303 percent above the 1932 low and 58 percent above the 1917–18 average in the First World War. For Illinois, the farm income figure in 1943 was 139 percent above 1935–39, and 348 percent above 1932.

Farm prices in the United States and in Illinois have been generally favorable. At the same time the line has been held reasonably well on the prices of things farmers buy. The result has been a high percent of parity for most commodities, which in general are being produced in far greater volume than during the pre-war years.

Prices received by farmers for specified commodities, United States and Illinois, 1943, and 1943 as a percentage of 1932, 1917–18 average and 1935–39 average, and average parity price, 1943

Commodities	United States average					Illinois average
	1943	Percent of 1935–39 average	Percent of 1932	Percent of 1917–18	Percent of parity	1943	Percent of 1935–39 average	Percent of 1932	Percent of 1917–18
All agricultural products	(1910–14=100) 192	179	282	101		(1910–14=100) 185	167	319	96

During the First World War and immediately afterward, farm mortgage debt mounted to an all-time record, resulting in foreclosures and other distress afterward. During the present war, on the other hand, farm mortgage debt has steadily declined. In 1943 the total for the United States was reduced to $6,100,000,000, $4,700,000,000 less than the 1923 peak and $64,000,000 below the 1917–18 average. In Illinois farm mortgage debt in 1943 was $373,981,000, which was $336,890,000 less than the 1924 high point and $14,036,000 less than 1917–18.

Similarly, farm foreclosures and other forced sales for the United States in 1943 were 77 percent below the average of the 1920's and 92 percent below the record number in 1932. In Illinois farm foreclosures and forced sales during 1943 were 87 percent below the 1925–29 average and an estimated 95 percent less than in the State's worst year, 1932.

While long-term farm debt has been reduced, short-term loans for war production have been expanded both to individual farmers and to farmer cooperatives.

Production credit associations supervised by the Farm Credit Administration last year made 230,735 loans to farmers totaling $501,211,688 in the United States and 10,886 loans amounting to $26,600,755 in Illinois.

F. C. A. loans to farmer cooperatives last year totaled $404,998,320 for the United States.

In addition, funds of the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation in the F. C. A. system were used to make 108,620 loans to farmers amounting to $64,597,006 for the United States and 1,132 loans totaling $618,810 to the farmers of Illinois.

Prepayments in advance of maturity on long-term farm mortgage indebtedness in 1943 amounted to $242,448,000 for the United States.

Aided by the Soil Conservation Service, complete farm plans to make the best possible use of every acre had been worked out by the end of 1943 for more than 315,000 farmers covering 105,000,000 acres in the country as a whole and for approximately 7,000 farms covering 1,143,000 acres in Illinois. On most of this land intensive soil and water conservation practices are carried out through soil-conservation districts.

Appropriate conservation practices increase crop yields by 20 percent or more on the average. According to recent reports from 412 typical Illinois farmers, soil conservation farming has resulted in an average increase of 29 percent in average annual yield per acre of all major crops, 33.4 percent for corn, 36 percent for barley, 18.4 percent for oats, 21 percent for wheat, 96.9 percent for soybeans, and 31.3 percent increase in animal unit months per acre of pasture.

Preliminary figures show that the 1943 agricultural conservation program conducted by the elected farmer committeemen of A. A. A. included 403,000,000 acres, or 88 percent of the Nation's cropland and for Illinois 21,281,000 acres or 85 percent of the State's cropland. This program resulted in the following important conservation practices for 1943:

Agricultural conservation program practices	United States	Illinois
Application of materials: [1]
20 percent superphosphate or equivalent.	1,854,877 tons on 1,259,627 farms	81,308 tons on 26,656 farms.
Limestone or equivalent	18,783,858 tons on 968,637 farms	3,126,359 tons on 79,283 farms.
Reseeding or partial seeding depleted pastures.	14,732,368 pounds on 1,410,840 acres of 93,809 farms.	675,155 pounds on 66,604 acres of 4,148 farms.
Plowing-under green manure crops:
Legumes and nonlegumes	22,558,993 acres on 1,669,51 farms	1,070,460 acres on 53,394 farms.
Annual lespedeza	930,267 acres on 101,221 farms	31,954 acres on 2,477 farms.
Total	23,946,962 acres on 1,815,397 farms	1,102,414 acres on 55,871 farms.
Harvesting hayseed and legume seed	3,105,300 acres on 308,098 farms	345,382 acres on 22,382 farms.

[1] There may be some duplication in the numbers of farms, since a material may be applied in more than 1 form and if so is counted as a separate practice.

Electric power on farms played a significant part in our record war production. From the time the Rural Electrification Administration was created in 1935 until the end of 1943, more than $480,000,000 in loans were made to provide electric power to American farmers, and $22,000,000 for the State of Illinois. Most of these loans were made to farmer cooperatives.

R. E. A. loans have been used to construct about 400,000 miles of distribution lines serving 1,104,183 rural consumers in the country as a whole and 20,000 miles of distribution lines serving 50,000 consumers in Illinois.

At the end of 1943 borrowers were more than $15,000,000 ahead of schedule in paying their loans for the United States and $1,252,000 for Illinois.

During the period 1935 through 1943 the proportion of farms having electric service jumped from 10.4 percent to 40.4 percent for the United States and from 12.3 percent to 52.9 percent for Illinois.

Many small farmers who in the past had scarcely been able to subsist are now contributing substantially to war production with the aid of the Farm Security Administration.

Rehabilitation loans totaling $809,882,606 have been made by F. S. A. to aid small farmers in the United States, and loans totalling $16,439,701 have been made in Illinois. Altogether, rehabilitation loans have been made to 961,129 farmers in the United States and to 15,995 Illinois farmers who were unable to receive adequate credit from other sources.

Farmers in the United States have repaid 86.7 percent and Illinois farmers 81.3 percent of the principal due on these loans.

In addition, 33,559 farmers in the United States and 636 farmers in Illinois have been enabled to purchase farms through F. S. A. farm-ownership loans. Farmers in the United States are 48 percent, and Illinois farmers 42 percent, ahead of schedule in their payments of these loans.

In connection with their loans, F. S. A. borrowers have helped in working out complete farm and home plans which have both increased their income and boosted war-food production.

The following table shows how farmers on F. S. A.'s rehabilitation program have contributed to the increased output of vital war-food products:

NOTE.—Pounds are live weight.

Crop loans in the early part of the past decade were made principally for the purpose of supplying farmers with ready cash for products not immediately needed in marketing channels. The ever-normal granary thus accumulated was available to meet rapidly expanding needs at the start of the war. Reserves of feed grains were of particular importance in making possible the rapid increase in meat and milk production. After the war began, the loan policy was continued as a method of price support and an aid to orderly marketing.

As farm workers flocked into the armed services and jobs in war industries, manpower became one of the most pressing problems of farm production. Supplementing a series of steps in national policy, culminating in existing selective service exemptions for many essential farmers and farm workers, agencies of the Department of Agriculture, including the Federal-State extension service, administered or helped administer programs for recruiting, transporting, and placing farm labor. During 1943, 4,299,563 placements of farm labor were made through Federal-State agencies throughout the country, involving about 2,100,000 individual workers; 73,998 such placements were made in Illinois. About 14,000 of the workers placed throughout the country were transported interstate by the War Food Administration Office of Labor, and 66,000 were farm workers brought by W. F. A. from other countries. Five hundred and ninety-two of the foreign workers were on Illinois farms in 1943. About 100,000 farm workers were being brought by W. F. A. from other countries in 1944. Illinois was allotted 950, all of whom were on farms in the State by early summer.

Crop loan and purchase machinery will be available for use after the war. Congress has placed a floor under farm prices, at 90 percent of parity for 2 years from the January 1 after hostilities cease.

When war broke out in Europe, a program of Government purchase of farm products was well established as a marketing aid and means of surplus disposal. The machinery was adapted to carry out a program of consolidated wartime purchase of farm products for military and lend-lease requirements as well as small remaining domestic requirements, such as the school-lunch program. Some of the national purchase figures for farm products important in Illinois follow:

Years of research by Department scientists lay behind much of the expanded war production. Ten years ago, for example, hybrid corn was very little known or used. In 1943 it had practically taken over the Corn Belt; in Illinois, for instance, it occupied 93 percent of the corn acreage. The use of hybrid corn increased our production by some 600,000,000 bushels in a single year over the production that would have been possible with open-pollinated varieties.

When the war came the Agricultural Research Administration concentrated on immediate wartime problems. Thanks to the work of its scientists, penicillin can be produced in large enough quantities to meet all the needs of our soldiers, and the extraordinary new insecticide DDT is being used by our armed forces all over the world to combat deadly insect pests.

The Northern Regional Research Laboratory at Peoria, one of the Research Administration's many scientific centers, has made notable contributions to the war. The work on penicillin production was done at this laboratory. It developed the butylene glycol process for making butadiene, used to produce synthetic rubber. Its methods for analyzing the oil content of soybeans have saved the Government and taxpayers large sums of money in the Government-supported soybean program. This laboratory also coordinated the program for producing alcohol from wheat, to save badly needed corn. It developed methods, now in commercial production, for making glucose sirup and high-quality protein from wheat. Among other developments were a cork substitute made from peanut shells and a material made of corncobs and peanut shells for the blast-cleaning of aircraft engines.

C. I. O. Political Action Committee

REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, there is evidence in the files of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities which clearly shows that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is, in fact, the political arm of the New Deal administration and that the activities of the organization are directed from the White House by the New Deal political strategists, David K. Niles and Jonathan Daniels. But what is more important, Mr. Speaker, there is evidence to show that the Farm Security Administration, an agency of the Federal Government, is being used as a political weapon by the New Deal and the P. A. C. to defeat certain Members of this body and the Senate.

The House committee evidence includes, among other things, records from the telephone company, showing long-distance telephone calls between prominent C. I. O. political action leaders to the White House and to Government agents in States where political upsets recently took place.

The assistant director of the political action committee, C. B. Baldwin, a few months ago resigned as head of the Farm Security Administration to direct the C. I. O.'s campaign for the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt and for the defeat of Members of Congress to whom they were opposed. Mr. Baldwin, who headed the Farm Security for a long while is now using that organization for political purposes. The evidence shows that Mr. Baldwin has been in direct communication with the officials of the F. S. A. throughout the country and at the height of certain primary campaigns where distinguished Members of this body were defeated, Mr. Baldwin was in daily telephonic communication with the regional directors of the Farm Security Administration.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee, in its campaign for vengeance against those Members of Congress who refused to be led by them is working in collusion with many high officials of this Government, and there is ample evidence to prove it. Most of us have become hardened to New Deal scandals. But I, for one, confess myself shocked and astounded at this latest manifestation of contempt for the laws intended to keep political campaigns clean. Here is a Communist-dominated group, wielding a $4,000,000 slush fund aimed at the political death of every Congressman who will not take its orders, stretching its tentacles into the White House itself, constantly in communication with the President's closest intimates, undoubtedly with his full knowledge and approval. It would not have been credible under former administrations, either Democratic or Republican, but it agrees with the pattern adopted by this regime, which has for its purpose the destruction of constitutional government.

Speaking as one member of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, I purpose to see that the Congress and the people have the full facts based upon this amazing evidence which has just been obtained by our committee investigators.

Address by Marshall Field Before the Capital Press Club

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate into the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered last evening before the Capital Press Club by the Honorable Marshall Field 3d, of the city of Chicago.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEGRO PRESS AND THE ISSUES OF DEMOCRACY

I am glad to be here tonight, glad that Mr. Smith asked me to be your speaker. As the publisher of two papers which seek to tell the whole truth to all the people, I would be remiss indeed if I did not take the opportunity to come here and meet the correspondents who tell the Washington side of the Negro story to the Negro press and public.

It is undeniably true that a great deal of news of interest to the whole country, as well as to Negroes, originates here in Washington. I want to congratulate the Negro correspondents who cover that news on the Capital Press Club.

The past year has seen three outstanding events of interest to all Americans, which originated with the Negro press and its correspondents. During this year a Negro correspondent representing the Negro Publishers' Association and the Atlanta Daily World was accredited to the White House. Likewise during the past year, the President of the United States for the first time sat down with an organized body of Negro publishers who presented a series of war aims as they saw them. Also during this past year, news accounts of Negro ground troops in combat prepared by one-the-scene Negro correspondents appeared for the first time. More than a dozen Negro correspondents are now with Negro troops overseas. As more and more Negro troops are committed to combat, as they must be, we shall see more and more of this story told to the American public. These stories should not be told to the Negro public alone. Stories of the Twenty-fourth Infantry Regiment, and the Ninety-third Division, and the Ninety-ninth Fighter Squadron, and the Three Hundred and Thirty-second Fighter Group, which distinguished itself within the last fortnight, show that courage and sacrifice are equally the property of all Americans. It is right and proper that the story of these Negro combat units and of all other Negro units should be told to the Negro public by Negro correspondents through Negro newspapers. But that is not enough. These stories are and should be of interest to all Americans regardless of race or origin. It is highly important that these stories should be told to all Americans through all news channels.

Suppose we begin by drawing up a balance sheet of Negro contributions to this war. In the defense period and the early phases of the war, our domestic problem was mainly one of mobilizing our productive capacity and our manpower to meet the enemy challenge. During this period one-tenth of our manpower reserve was shamefully neglected. Thanks to long-standing discriminations in education and employment opportunities, this segment was less highly trained and experienced than America's workers in general. Many important steps were taken through the National Youth Administration and other training and recruitment agencies to make up this training deficiency. But it was not enough, and employers generally were reluctant to hire up to the limit of the skills, experience, and grade of the Negro manpower available. But as the manpower situation became tighter, employers gradually overcame their reluctance and in 1942 and 1943 the employment of Negroes increased 15 times as fast as white employment. By July in 1943, 1,300,000 Negro workers were employed in war industries, a number which represented about 7 percent of all war workers. The number has increased somewhat since then. Chairman Ross of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice told the Labor Committee of the House the other day that demobilization would involve the conversion of 1,500,000 Negro workers from production for war to production for peace.

In certain industries the employment of Negroes has been exceptionally large. In shipbuilding, the number of Negro workers in March of this year exceeded the total of all shipbuilding workers in 1940. But in other industries which have also experienced large scale and rapid expansion the employment of Negroes has been very small. And generally speaking, the employment of Negroes in skilled and semiskilled positions, and in supervisory positions has lagged behind the skills and experience of the workers available. The same thing is true of the employment of Negro women.

In speaking of our organization for war, let us not omit the contribution of Negro farmers. Although the Negro population is no longer predominantly rural a very large number of Negroes are still living on farms.

Six hundred and seventy-two thousand farmers, 98 percent of all Negro farmers, live in the Southern States. They make up a fourth of the farm operators in the South and more than half the farm laborers in that area. While one can only estimate their contributions, it is plain that their labor and to some extent their products are an important part of the South's food production for war. In 1943, in addition to nearly all the country's peanut and long-staple cotton needs, the South produced one-third of the Nation's beef requirements, one-fifth of the milk, one-fourth of the eggs, one-third of the chickens, and one-fifth of the hogs. It strikes me that this is a Negro contribution to the war which has been largely ignored by the Negro as well as the white press.

And now how about the armed forces? In this war we have repeated the pattern of race relations which prevailed in previous wars. It has never been properly explained to the public that Negroes have participated in every major war this country has fought. In the Revolution, which gave this country its freedom; in the War of 1812, when we defended that freedom and our rights on the high seas; in the Civil War when we extended the right of freedom more widely and preserved the Union; in the Spanish-American War and in both World Wars, Negroes were present and fought valiantly. In the earlier wars Negroes fought side by side with whites. But in all these wars at first we were reluctant to let Negroes fight. While our manpower needs became more and more acute, we debated the qualities of Negroes as fighters. Finally we trained Negroes to fight and waited to see how they performed. They performed well and our writers and leaders sighed with relief and said, "Thank God that's settled." But in suceeding wars that debate began again.

This war has been no exception. The Selective Service Act forbade discrimination in the draft. Nevertheless, Negroes were at first inducted more slowly than whites. Today Negroes make up 10.4 percent of all selective service registrants of military age, while Negroes are 9 percent of all men in the Army. Although the Army has stated that it expects to remedy this deficiency before the year is up, it has not been achieved yet. Present plans call for an Army composed of 6,245,720 whites and 709,280 Negroes. As of February 29 this year the War Department announced there were 664,066 Negroes in the Army. At about the same date there were approximately 100,000 Negroes in the Navy, 10,000 in the Marines, and 4,000 in the Coast Guard. Nearly 5,000 of the Negroes in the Army were commissioned officers.

Fifty percent of our Negro troops are serving overseas, according to a letter from the Secretary of War to Representative LUDLOW. And of the Negro soldiers overseas, 35 percent are in combat and combat support units. As all of us here know, very small numbers of these troops have as yet seen combat. While this is also true of white soldiers overseas I think we all subscribe to the statement of war aims made by the Negro publishers to the President. Among other things they said:

"This is our country, to share with all other Americans. We have purchased our stake in this, our native land, with our blood and toil during more than 300 years. We have a right and duty to share its blessings, its sacrifices, and its sufferings."

Those sacrifices include the ones made in Normandy since June 6, in the South Pacific where the Ninety-third Division has been fighting the Japanese for the past 2 months, and elsewhere in the world since Pearl Harbor. Let us all remember that only a small portion of a modern Army gets into hand to hand combat with the enemy. At a beachhead such as Anzio, Negro supply troops unloaded ships under fire and were as much in the front line as though they had been exchanging hand grenades with the Nazis. I think it should be a matter for solemn pride that early reports from the beachheads show that Negro soldiers, sailors, and Coast Guard men participated in most phases of the Allied landing in northern France. Early Signal Corps radiophotographs showed Negro soldiers mopping up Nazi snipers in a French town. Others showed Negro medical corpsmen evacuating wounded men in France and bringing them ashore in England. Another showed a Negro gun crew in action on an invasion craft.

Behind the invasion team are the men who prepared the blow we struck on June 6. We know Negroes helped make the goods and build the boats that carried our forces of liberation. Who readied the planes that flew 27,000 sorties in 3 days? Who guarded the fields they took off from? Who loaded the 4,000 ships the British Prime Minister spoke of? Negroes want to know, and I believe the whole American public wants to know.

In drawing up this balance sheet let us not forget that every officers' candidate school has had at least one mixed class in which Negroes were completely integrated. Let us also remember the technical training which is being received by Negro soldiers. It is going to be up to us civilians when our soldiers have destroyed the Nazis and the Japanese militarists to see that those skills are not wasted. And last, but in no sense least, let us remember that the Army has been able to take some tens of thousands of young Negro men, whom our civilian social system had failed to equip with the fundamental skills of literacy, and in the short space of 8 weeks has been able to give them these skills. I suppose it will come as a shock to our domestic adherents of race supremacy to hear that Negro boys have performed fully as well as white boys in these literacy classes.

To me this balance of Negro contributions in industry and the armed forces adds up something like this. Negroes have made substantial contributions in both phases of the war program. They could have made even more substantial and more spectacular contributions had it not been for the exclusion of Negroes from many aspects of American life in the years before the war. And in the military side of the war, Negroes are ready for more substantial and more spectacular contributions than they have been permitted to make.

I want to touch on a very sore point in connection with Negroes in uniform. The discriminations and indignities to which Negro soldiers and sailors have been subjected not only rankle deeply in the hearts of all Negro Americans but are a source of shame and concern to many white Americans. I do not know, frankly, whether we should castigate the Army more or civilian Americans more. Negro soldiers have found they could get only limited transportation from camp to town; when they got there could find only limited recreation, housing, and entertainment facilities. If they got into difficulties—as who might not under those circumstances—Negro soldiers have too often found that wearing a uniform was no protection against police brutality. These things cannot be corrected by civilian or military authorities alone. Joint action is required, but it will not come until these facts are made known to white Americans as well as Negro Americans, and a plan of action is presented to them.

Americans generally don't know these things. Why not? The American people's knowledge about our organization for war and the contributions all Americans are making toward it comes from news sources—the press, radio, and news reels and from films, books, and magazines. The Negro as a soldier and a war worker seldom appears in these channels. Many white Americans have no idea even of the number of Negroes in the armed forces, let alone what their role has been. The bulk of news stories in the daily press about Negroes is not connected with the war. Even now Negro crime stories are more frequent than Negro soldier stories. There are exceptions to this newspaper treatment. I wonder how many of you noticed the episode from "Terry and the Pirates," in which Terry was flying from China to India. On the way he passed by the point at which Negro combat engineers are building the Ledo road and fighting off Japanese patrols. Milton Caniff's drawing showed the Negro engineers. There was no comment, and no tag line, but it was plain to everyone that these were Negro troops. This is the sort of thing that is needed to break down the Negro stereotype.

A number of nationally circulated magazines have carried stories about Negroes recently, some with pictures. But none has attempted an over-all assessment of Negro contributions to the war; and few have dealt with Negroes as war workers.

After the Ninety-ninth Fighter Group brought down 12 Focke-Wulfs in 1 day the news reels carried the story. Up to this time there had been no combat or serious soldier shots in the news reels since the beginning of the war.

On the radio, with the exception of a few special feature programs and the current "New World A'Comin'," most Negro programs have been religious or musical features with little or no news comment.

This being the case, there is little wonder that the National Opinion Research Center at Denver recently found in a Nation-wide poll that most white people held the view that Negroes were not contributing much to the war effort. So much lack of information leads beyond ignorance to hostility. From "do not contribute" it is only a step to "cannot contribute" and from there it is only a step to "should not contribute." It is not guess work that these opinions are held by many white people. The same poll showed it.

Where the Negro media are concerned it is a different story. Through the Washington correspondents, Government war news which originates in Washington has been very throughly covered. But, while Washington is an important source of news, it is not the only one. Many production and employment stories are local. They have not always been covered.

Through individual and pool correspondents, the activities of Negroes in the armed forces have had, on the whole, a thorough coverage. There are still many types of stories which have not been handled. Who is covering the Negro side of the invasion? So far, we have only scattered stories and pictures in the Negro as well as in the white press.

There is now a newsreel devoted to Negro subjects and there are a good many well-established Negro magazines. Radio programs directed primarily to Negro audiences have mainly a religious and musical content. The shortage of Negro news on the radio is not made up in Negro news programs.

In other words, Negro news is segregated just as much as any other aspect of Negro life. The news channels which reach white Americans contain practically no reference to Negro contributions to the war. No matter how good a job the Negro media do they cannot fill this gap unaided, since Negroes read both white and Negro papers, but white Americans read only white papers.

The segregation of Negro news lends weight to Gunnar Myrdal's judgment that "To get publicity is of the highest strategic importance to the Negro people." We all know that the race problem is a problem of the mind. Publicity and information alone will not lead us to a solution of the American dilemma, but they are the necessary first steps to a solution.

The days are past when we think the mind with preferences and prejudices is unassailable. We have spent too much time in approaching the minds of white and Negro Americans with appeals to tolerance and good will. These approaches are needed, but they are not enough. Prejudice feeds on misinformation. The protective veil of ignorance is abetted by the segregation of Negro news. Let us make a fresh approach to the problem by putting an end to segregation in the news columns of our daily press. The first point of attack should be Negro contributions to the war.

Perhaps some special channels will have to be devised. The recently formed American Council on Race Relations may be able to handle part of this problem. But only an informed and aroused public opinion which sees the danger to our democracy in the waste of manpower and the bitterness which accompanies discrimination can begin to approach a solution. In this the Negro press and correspondents play a part but not the whole part. What is the proper role of the Negro press in the solution of the American dilemma?

Let us look at the Negro press itself. Perhaps we can find an answer there. To my mind the greatest of all Negro editors was Frederick Douglass. This man, who was born a slave and was taught to read and write secretly by the wife of one of his owners, was one of the leaders in arousing public sentiment against American slavery, not only in this country but in the British Isles. At the same time he was a Negro leader of great judgment and clarity of thought who understood fully the need for a national solution of the race problem of his time. Against a good deal of opposition he spoke out strongly for an avoidance of sectionalism on the slavery issue. When Garrison wanted to take a stand against dealing with slave holders—a solution which would have amounted to promoting northern secession—Douglass spoke out against him. Without ever ceasing to protest by word and deed, Douglass counseled against the John Brown uprising. And Douglass never lost sight of the final objective—full participation by men of all races in local and national life. He was the first editor to suggest the use of Negro troops in combat during the Civil War, and he urged it not only to whites but to Negroes. He wrote: "Men of color, to arms! * * * Slowly and reluctantly that appeal is begining to be heeded. Stop not now to complain that it was not heeded sooner. That it should not, may or may not have been best. This is not the time to discuss that question. Leave it to the future. When the war is over, the country saved, peace established, and the black man's rights secured, as they will be, history with an impartial hand will dispose of that and sundry questions."

And again he says: "There are weak and cowardly men in all nations. We have them amongst us. They tell you this is the 'white man's war'; that you will be no better off after than before this war'; that the getting of you into the Army is to sacrifice you on the first opportunity.' Believe them not; cowards themselves, they do not wish to have their cowardice shamed by your brave example. Leave them to their timidity or to whatever motive may hold them back. * * *

"The case is before you. This is our golden opportunity. Let us accept it and forever wipe out the dark reproaches unsparingly hurled against us by our enemies. Let us win for ourselves the gratitude of our country and the blessing of our posterity through all time."

The time and circumstances of Douglass' appeal do not limit its significance to slavery days or to men of any particular race. In Douglass' time this country was engaged in a war over a national versus a sectional solution of a vital social problem. One part of that vital problem involved the freedom of an important part of America's people.

Today we are engaged in a war in which the freedom of all men is at stake—men of all races and all nations. Negroes have a natural and legitimate interest in the fate of oppressed peoples everywhere—the people of occupied Europe and Asia are under the yoke of the Nazi and Japanese militarists with their theories of racial and national supremacy.

In this situation it seems to me the Negro press and writers might examine more closely the principles which guided Frederick Douglass. The Negro press has rightly been concerned with the Negro's stake in democracy at home and in Negroes' right to participate fully in the struggle to preserve it. But Negroes share with all Americans a stake in the problem of world-wide democratic order. Douglass urged the Negroes of his time to participate fully in the struggle for democracy, to join in all the humanitarian movements of their time, to work for a broad national solution of the race problem, and to work with men of both races who loved liberty.

If the Negro press is to lead opinion, its columns should not stop short at urging Negro participation in America's war job; or in discussing the fate of the peoples of the Caribbean, of India, and the colonial problems of Africa and the East Indies. Wherever the struggle for freedom goes on—the struggle for political and economic rights and opportunities, whether at home or abroad, black or white, on the farm or in the factory—that struggle should have news value for the readers of the Negro press.

In short, the Negro press has all the rights of a minority protest press. But it has the responsibilities that go with those rights. In the narrowest sense those responsibilities require that the Negro press should follow the ordinary canons of good journalism—to tell the whole story accurately. In the widest sense those responsibilities require that the Negro press should inform its reading public about the issues of democracy abroad as well as at home. The masses of people everywhere are engaged in a struggle to broaden the base of economic opportunity and political rights and to secure the fundamental freedoms of free speech and worship. This is the true meaning of democracy. The fight to win it abroad cannot be separated from the fight to win it at home. Let the white press tell its readers more about the fight at home; let the Negro press tell its readers more about the fight to win it abroad.

These are interests we have in common. Protest is not the exclusive property of the minority press. In an earlier day when the founders of this country were fighting for the freedoms they later wrote into the Constitution, Tom Paine helped to crystallize some of the democratic issues of his day. Tom Paine and Frederick Douglass had this in common: They fought with words as weapons for the democratic liberties the American creed declares are the right of all men everywhere.

Benefits for Veterans of World Wars Nos. 1 and 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to tell the House of the laws passed in the Seventy-eighth Congress and benefits derived therefrom, and also to review the benefits presently offered the veterans and dependents of World Wars Nos. 1 and 2 and their cost.

The Mustering-Out Payment Act of 1944, approved February 3, 1944, Public Law No. 225, Seventy-eighth Congress, provides, under certain conditions and limitations, mustering-out payment of $300 for persons who, having performed active service for 60 days or more, have served outside the continental limits of the United States or Alaska; $200 for persons who, having performed active service for 60 days or more, have served no part thereof outside the continental limits of the United States or Alaska; and $100 for persons who have performed active service for less than 60 days.

The act of March 1, 1944, Public Law No. 242, Seventy-eighth Congress, increased the service pension rate for veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, based upon total disability or age 65, from $60 to $75 per month; liberalized the delimiting marriage date governing eligibility of widows of deceased veterans of that group for service-pension purposes by changing the delimiting marriage date from September 1, 1922, to January 1, 1938; and provided for increased pension to widows of this group by granting $40 per month to a widow when the age of 65 years is attained or $50 per month if the widow or former widow was the wife of the veteran during the period of his service in the war.

The act of March 3, 1944, Public Law No. 245, Seventy-eighth Congress, amended the service pension laws pertaining to veterans and widows of deceased veterans of the Indian wars. It increased the rate for total disability or age 65 years to $60 per month and authorized the rate of $100 per month where the veteran is in need of regular aid and attendance of another person. The act also liberalized the delimiting marriage date of March 3, 1917, by including additional widows married after that date if 60 years of age and if married to the veteran 10 or more years prior to his death, with the requirement of continuous cohabitation with the veteran from date of marriage to date of death, and increased service pension from $30 to $40 per month is provided for the widow upon attainment of age 70 years and $50 per month is provided for the widow who was the wife of the veteran during the period of his service in an Indian war.

The act of May 11, 1944, Public Law No. 300, Seventy-eighth Congress, provided for volunteers, National Guard men, and selectees pension benefits based upon disability resulting from injury or disease incurred in line of duty while reporting under orders of the local draft board and prior to acceptance or rejection from service. This act provides benefits similar to those which were provided for World War No. 1 cases.

The act of May 24, 1944, authorized the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to provide seeing-eye dogs trained for the aid of blind veterans who are entitled to disability compensation under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration and to provide such veterans with mechanical and electronic equipment for aiding them to overcome their handicap of blindness.

The act of May 27, 1944, Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, increased by 15 percent the service-connected disability rates of compensation or pension payable to veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 and veterans entitled to wartime rates based on service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-connected disabilities; increased the rates for widows and children under Public Law No. 484, Seventy-third Congress, as amended, which provides compensation to the widow and children where any World War No. 1 veteran dies of non-service-connected cause, but at time of death had a service-connected disability; and included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans for benefits under the said Public Law No. 484, as amended.

The act of May 27, 1944, Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, increased the pension payable for non-service-connected disability of permanent and total degree applicable to veterans of World War No. 1 and the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, from $40 to $50 per month, and increased the rate to $60 per month where such veterans shall have been rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reached the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. The act also made the benefits above described available to World War No. 2 veterans.

The act of May 27, 1944, Public Law No. 314, Seventy-eighth Congress, provides for the payment of pension or compensation to certain persons receiving retired pay by permitting waiver of so much of the retired pay and allowances as is equal in amount to the pension or compensation to which the retired person is otherwise entitled. Inasmuch as pension and compensation are exempt from income tax and retired pay other than that for disability incurred in line of duty is not so exempt, the effect of this act is to permit exemption of so much of the retired pay as is waived in order to receive pension or compensation.

The act of June 22, 1944, the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, commonly referred to as the G. I. bill of rights, provides Federal Government aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans. This act I will explain more in detail. Generally speaking, it contains a number of administrative provisions to facilitate the administration of veterans' affairs and to protect the rights of veterans to benefits provided for them. The major benefits afforded by the act are—

(1) Educational aid by way of payment of the cost of education and maintenance allowance of $50 per month for a veteran without dependents and $75 per month if the veteran has a dependent or dependents.

(2) Loans for the purchase or construction of homes, farms, and business property, and which provides for the guaranty by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of not to exceed 50 percent of a loan or loans for such purposes, with the provision that the aggregate amount guaranteed shall not exceed $2,000.

(3) Aid in the employment of veterans by the creation of a veterans' placement service board, with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs as chairman, to carry out the intent and purpose of the Congress that there shall be an effective job-counseling and employment-placement service for veterans. The board is to determine all matters of policy relating to the administration of the Veterans' Employment Service of the United States Employment Service. The operating entity will be the United States Employment Service.

(4) Readjustment allowances for former members of the armed forces who are unemployed under which unemployment allowances of $20 per week are allowed for a maximum period of 52 weeks.

BENEFITS PRESENTLY AFFORDED VETERANS AND DEPENDENTS OF DECEASED VETERANS OF WORLD WARS NOS. 1 AND 2

The following statement briefly sets forth the benefits provided for World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans and their dependents, as to types and amounts, eligibility requirements and procedure to be followed in securing them. The statement reveals the benefits made available by the Seventy-eighth Congress.

There is attached a table showing the disbursements made for the relief of World War No. 2 veterans and their dependents from December 1941 through March 31, 1944; World War No. 2 veterans hospitalized or domiciled, showing admissions to hospitals for domiciliary care from December 1941 through April 30, 1944, and those remaining at the end of April 1944; and a table showing the disbursements for relief of World War No. 1 veterans and their dependents from 1918 to March 31, 1944, and through March 1944. There is also attached summary of activities of the Veterans' Administration, November 30, 1941, February 29, 1944, March 31, 1944, and April 30, 1944.

The so-called G. I. bill of rights, S. 1767—Seventy-eighth Congress, an act "To provide Federal Government aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans," has become law by approval of the measure by the President, June 22, 1944. Because of the special interest in that legislation a brief statement explaining its provisions is included under a separate heading.

COMPENSATION AND PENSION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH

Service-connected disability. Under the Veterans Regulations promulgated by the President under the act of March 20, 1933, as amended, honorable discharged veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 are entitled to compensation or pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by such service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10 percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month. While the World War No. 2 veterans were entitled to these rates following the act of December 19, 1941, they were placed on complete parity under the Veterans Regulations by the act of July 13, 1943, Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, with reference to the requirements governing proof of service connection of disability. The latter act also liberalized the regulation concerning the presumption of soundness upon entry into service. Under Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the monthly rates of compensation or pension payable to veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2, including veterans entitled to wartime rates based upon service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-incurred disability, not including special awards and allowances fixed by law, were increased by 15 percent.

In lieu of such pension or compensation, Reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, meeting the requirements of the Army Regulations pertaining to retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment, are retired by the War Department, certified to the Veterans' Administration, and their retired pay equal to 75 percent of their base pay is paid by the Veterans' Administration out of the pension appropriation.

Non-service-connected disability: Under Public Law Numbered 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the rate of pension for permanent and total non-service-connected disability, applicable to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion, the Philippine Insurrection, and World War No. 1, was increased from $40 to $50 per month with an increase to $60 per month where such veterans have been rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reach the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. This act also provides that the above pension for non-service-connected disability shall apply to veterans of both World War No. 1 and World War No. 2.

Service-connected death: The rates of compensation or pension for widows, children, and dependent parents of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans based upon death in service, or service-connected death, are as follows:

Widow, no child	$50
Widow, 1 child (with $13 for each additional child)	65
No widow, but 1 child	25
No widow, but 2 children (with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100)	33
Dependent father and mother:
Each	25
Or 1 only	45

The above rates are contained in Public Law No. 144, Seventy eighth Congress, July 13, 1943, and constitute a material liberalization of the prior rates.

Non-service-connected death: The widow, child, or children of any deceased veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 are entitled to the following rates of compensation if the veteran at the time of death from a non-service-connected cause had a disability incurred in or aggravated by such war service.

Widow but no child	$35
Widow with 1 child (with $5 for each additional child)	45
No widow but 1 child	18
No widow but 2 children (equally divided)	27
No widow but 3 children (equally divided)	36

With $4 for each additional child (the total amount to be equally divided).

Payments are limited to an aggregate of $64 in any one case.

Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, act of May 27, 1944, increased the rates to the above amounts and also included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans, the law previously having applied only to World War No. 1 veterans.

Claims and effective date of awards: Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred to a Veterans' Administration facility, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for adjudication, the applicant should file claim on proper form which will be supplied upon inquiry addressed to any Veterans' Administration facility or regional office, or to the local representative of the American Red Cross or of a veterans' service organization.

Under interagency agreement, when a person who is to be discharged from military or naval service is in need of further hospital care, prior arrangements are made by the commanding officer to afford him opportunity to file all necessary claims, supply necessary clinical and service data, and to send the veteran to the Veterans' Administration facility designed to receive him. (Cf. AR 615-360, change No. 4, April 16, 1943.) If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

Upon death in service, the service department notifies the Veterans' Administration, and claims forms are sent immediately to all known dependents.

Groups potentially eligible for pensions: All members of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, members of the Public Health Service or of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, when ordered to active service with the Army or Navy or as to United States Public Health Service while serving outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, and as to Coast and Geodetic Survey when assigned during present war to duty on business of War or Navy Departments in areas outside continental United States or in Alaska or coastal areas of the United States as determined by the War and Navy Departments to be of immediate military hazard, are potentially eligible for pensions.

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps was not in the active service; and, while the several Women's Reserve Corps of the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard originally were in the active service, they were by statute precluded from pension eligibility; in lieu thereof, being subject to laws pertaining to employees' compensation. Legislation was subsequently enacted making the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard components eligible potentially for pension benefits (Public Law 110, 78th Cong., approved July 1, 1943; Public Law 183, 78th Cong., approved November 8, 1943; and Public Law 214, approved December 23, 1943).

Awards to date: As indicated on the attached table No. 1, pension payments to veterans of World War No. 2 and their dependents total $37,760,572.78 through March 1944. In addition, retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration to Reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, totaled $1,020,137.33 from July 1, 1942, through March 31, 1944.

Disbursements for the relief of World War No. 1 veterans and their dependents from 1918 through March 1944 for disability and death compensation or pension, service-connected and non-service-connected, totaled $5,007,029,954.54. In addition, disbursements for World War No. 1 emergency officers' retirement pay through March 31, 1944, totaled $84,889,697.63.

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL CARE, PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES, AND DOMICILIARY CARE

Eligibility is extended to any veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 honorably discharged, having a service-connected disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or one who was discharged for disability and not dishonorably; also one not dishonorably discharged who is unable to defray his expenses, has tuberculosis or a neuropsychiatric ailment or disability which requires hospital care.

Dependent upon availability of facilities, eligibility includes any veteran of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, and who is in need of such care and is unable to defray the expenses therefor—regardless of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service.

The service groups included are all components of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, the respective Women's Reserve thereof, and United States Public Health Service and Coast and Geodetic Survey under the conditions stated for pension purposes.

The Veterans' Administration maintains 94 facilities, and has contract facilities with a total of 92,019 beds distributed as follows (as of March 23, 1944):

Tuberculosis	6,212
Neuropsychiatric	39,417
General medical and surgical	25,658
Domiciliary	16,117
Contract—other governmental	4,227
State and private	338
Total	92,019

Diagnostic centers, with expert specialists available, are maintained at Hines, Chicago, Ill.; San Francisco, Calif.; and Mount Alto, Washington, D. C. Cancer clinics: Bronx, N. Y.; Hines, Chicago, Ill.; Mount Alto, Washington, D. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Portland, Oreg.; and Los Angeles, Calif.

The present building program will raise this total to more than 100,000 beds. The Veterans' Administration anticipates an eventual need of 300,000 beds to enable veterans of World War No. 2 and of prior wars to receive hospital and domiciliary care to the same extent as is now provided. However, this estimated maximum should not be needed until long after the war or require the eventual additional construction of more than 100,000 beds, since there will be, under present plans, 100,000 beds in Veterans' Administration facilities, and it is anticipated that it should be possible to obtain the same number from the Army and Navy shortly after the termination of the war.

Claims: Any person who is to be discharged from active service and who is in need of and entitled to hospitalization by the Veterans' Administration is transferred directly to the Veterans' Administration facility designated to receive him. Claim for all benefits and necessary clinical and service data accompany him, or are filed by the manager if the veteran is insane or incompetent.

All others should file claim for treatment or hospitalization directly with the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office—one, or more, in each State in the Union except Delaware.

As shown by table No. 1, 64,982 veterans of World War No. 2 have been hospitalized by the Veterans' Administration through April 30, 1944. On April 30, 1944, there were 44,967 World War No. 1 veterans and 12,866 World War No. 2 veterans receiving hospitalization, and 8,477 World War No. 1 veterans and 196 World War No. 2 veterans receiving domiciliary care from the Veterans' Administration. (Table No. 2.)

While domiciliary care cannot be said to be a part of the rehabilitation process, it is a valuable benefit for those who have reached a permanent state of disability and have no other means of support.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved by the President March 24, 1943, provides (1) that any person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941, and prior to the termination of the present war; (2) and who was honorably discharged; (3) and who has a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay; (4) who is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability, shall be entitled to such vocational rehabilitation as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit him for employment consistent with the degree of disablement.

Immediately following the passage of that legislation, there was created in the Veterans' Administration a vocational rehabilitation service composed of three divisions, namely, the Vocational Advisement Division, the Training Into Employment Division, and the Research Division. The planning and control functions created by the administration of this act are exercised in the central office of the Veterans' Administration. All operations, including determinations of need for training, vocational advisement, induction into training, supervision, as well as the selection of training facilities, are functions of the Vocational Rehabilitation Division in that facility of the Veterans' Administration having jurisdiction of the territory in which the veteran resides. There are 53 such facilities. These facilities are, generally speaking, bound by State boundary lines. In a few States there is more than one facility. The course of training prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit the veteran for employment may not exceed 4 years and may not extend beyond 6 years after the termination of the present war.

"The purpose of rehabilitation is to restore employability lost by virtue of a handicap due to service-incurred disability." In performing the functions imposed upon the Administration by Public Law 16, it will be the purpose of the Veterans' Administration to utilize educational institutions and establishments of recognized standing in the training of these disabled veterans into employment and to train each person as near his home as may be possible. In securing employment, a problem which obviously will be very great after the end of the war and perhaps acute after demobilization has been accomplished, every available Federal and State facility will be utilized. Employment of veterans has been accomplished to a considerable extent through the United States Employment Service. It will be the purpose to correlate these activities to the end that those vocationally trained will be graduated into employment opportunities.

While the disabled veteran is in training his pension, unless it equals or exceeds such amounts, will be increased to $80 per month, if single; $90 per month, if married, with $5 additional for each child, and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required.

Claims: Those persons discharged from the service directly to the Veterans' Administration facilities for hospitalization will have their claims filed and processed; and the question of need for and entitlement to vocational rehabilitation may be given consideration as soon as the individual's physical and mental condition make training feasible. Any other person honorably discharged from the service may make claims for vocational rehabilitation in the claim for pension which may be filed at the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office.

INSURANCE

National service life insurance: National service life insurance was provided under the act of October 8, 1940, Public Law No. 801, Seventy-sixth Congress, and liberalizing amendments thereto were enacted during the Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth Congresses. A number of other liberalizing proposals are pending in the present Congress, and the Veterans' Administration has submitted certain proposed changes found to be justified by studies conducted. Application may be made for not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, without physical examination prior to the expiration of 120 days from entrance into active service. Thereafter any such person in the active military or naval service may apply if the application be accompanied by acceptable evidence of good health.

Applications: Application forms are supplied the service departments, and may be obtained from the commanding officer or designated insurance officer. The applicant may elect to pay premiums in cash or by allotment of pay. Policies are not issued during the war, but insurance certificate is mailed to the address designated by applicant.

The insurance is against death only, but includes waiver of premiums during total disability existing for more than 6 months, and commencing prior to insured's sixtieth birthday. The policy is a 5-year level premium term policy with rate based upon the American experience table of mortality and 3 percent interest—the Government assuming the extra hazard of the military and naval service and the administrative expense. The insurance is payable only to a widow (widower), child (including a stepchild or illegitimate child, if designated as beneficiary by the insured), parent (including person in loco parentis), brother, and sister of the insured, and is payable only in monthly installments. The insured may change the beneficiary designation at any time.

After the policy has been in effect for at least 1 year, while in force it may be converted to an ordinary life, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life policy upon application to the Veterans' Administration without medical examination.

In cases where the person in service died or became totally disabled, or was captured or isolated by the enemy prior to April 20, 1942, and had less than $5,000 insurance in effect, the law provides that gratuitous insurance to an aggregate of $5,000 shall be deemed in effect. Claims for such gratuitous insurance should be filed as soon as possible, because of limitations. In most of these death cases only a widow, child, or dependent parent can claim such insurance.

As of March 30, 1944, over 14,303,291 applications had been received, representing a total amount of nearly $105,596,766,000 of insurance. The average policy was approximately $7,382.69; the average coverage per life approximately $8,926.74.

The insurance is payable in the event of the death of the insured while the policy is in force to a beneficiary or beneficiaries, which may be designated by the insured, only within the relationship of widow or widower, child, parent, brother, or sister. The proceeds of the policy are payable as an annuity in 240 equal monthly installments of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance to any beneficiary who is under 30 years of age at the time of the death of the insured; otherwise, in continuous monthly installments throughout the lifetime of the beneficiary, with a guaranty of the payment of 120 monthly installments to the surviving relatives of the insured who are within the permitted class of beneficiaries. The amount of the monthly installment under the latter mode of payment is dependent upon the age of the beneficiary at date of death of insured. For example, if the beneficiary is then 40 years old, monthly installment is $4.50 for each $1,000 of insurance; if 50, $5.39; if 60, $6.81; if 70, $8.51.

The beneficiary would receive under a policy of $5,000 or $10,000, for example, monthly payments, beginning at the stated ages, in the following amounts: $27.55—$55.10, $22.50—$45, $26.95—$53.90, $34.05—$68.10, and $42.55—$85.10.

Claims: All claims for insurance benefits should be addressed to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., but necessary forms may be secured from the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

United States Government life, converted, insurance: This insurance can be applied for only by those who served in World War No. 1. No one may have more than $10,000 national service life insurance and Government, converted, insurance combined.

Insurance premiums are guaranteed by Government under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended: Any person in the active service having a commercial life policy or policies meeting the requirements of said law, article IV, may, upon application to the Veterans' Administration on form supplied the Army and Navy, secure guaranty of premiums, on amount of insurance not in excess of $10,000, while he is in the service during the present war. The insurance premiums so guaranteed by the Government constitute a lien against the policy and must be paid by the company out of any settlement thereof. In the event of the insured's discharge from service, he has a period of 2 years within which to pay the premiums with interest so guaranteed, or otherwise such indebtedness constitutes a loan on the policy, with interest, and if the amount of such indebtedness exceeds the cash surrender value, the policy is automatically canceled and the Government pays the insurer the difference between such cash surrender value and the indebtedness. Forms for making application for such insurance protection are supplied to the War and Navy Departments, and may be secured in person or from his commanding officer or other designated official.

As of March 31, 1944, 72,204 applications with insurance totaling $178,189,853.21 have been approved and premiums guaranteed.

GUARDIANSHIP

Supervision is maintained, in cooperation with the State courts, over payments of any benefits made on account of insane or minor beneficiaries to insure proper application of such benefits.

G. I. BILL OF RIGHTS

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, which I had the pleasure of seeing the President sign this morning, became law at that moment.

Some of the measures heretofore explained constituted a part of the program of post-war adjustments necessary to bridge the gap between discharge or release from active service and reestablishment in civilian pursuits. Other necessary steps in post-war adjustment requiring legislation were to provide for those persons whose education or training was interrupted by entrance into active service, employment assistance and Federal aid in the nature of unemployment allowances. Numerous bills were introduced and received the consideration of the Congress looking toward the necessary provisions for the post-war or post-discharge period. The better features of all of these bills have been embodied in the G. I. bill of rights. Without attempting to set out a comprehensive itemization of the many rights and benefits afforded by this act it may be of interest to note the more important benefits afforded by the six separate titles of the act.

Generally speaking, to be eligible for the benefits provided, the person must have served in the armed forces for a period of at least 90 days unless sooner discharged for a disability incurred in service in line of duty, and such service must have been during the period beginning September 16, 1940, and ending with the termination of the war. While benefits are provided immediately for those who have been discharged or released from the service under prescribed conditions, the general scheme of the legislation contemplates the affording of readjustment benefits, particularly during the more difficult post-war period. General provision is therefore afforded that the benefits may be claimed and secured within 2 years after discharge or release from the active service or the end of the war, whichever be the later, with an over-all limitation which will permit the serving of one enlistment after the end of the war, and yet permit the person so serving to receive the maximum benefit extended within the prescribed period subsequent to his later discharge.

Subject to the above, the following direct and indirect benefits for veterans of World War No. 2 and certain benefits of similar nature to veterans of prior wars are afforded:

TITLE I. HOSPITALIZATION, CLAIMS, AND PROCEDURES

1. Adequate organization of the Veterans' Administration to administer all veterans' benefits except employment.

2. Adequate hospital facilities for the care and treatment of veterans for non-service disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

3. The right to have explained to him before discharge or release from active service all rights and benefits to which he may be entitled as a veteran, and an opportunity, if he so desires, to file a claim therefor.

4. The right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefits in the use of such appliances.

5. Adequate safeguards as against forced statements against interest.

6. Adequate contact facilities in Army and Navy discharge centers, including those furnished by the services, by the American Red Cross, by national veterans' organizations, and by the Veterans' Administration.

7. Prompt transfer of the essential records of service departments to the Veterans' Administration and prompt adjudication of claims for benefits.

8. The right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service, (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (b) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (c) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (b) and (c) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

TITLE II. EDUCATION OF VETERANS

1. One year, or the equivalent thereof in continuous part-time study, of education or training (a) at any school or institution of his own choice; (b) in any subject or subjects desired for which he is fitted.

2. Not to exceed 3 additional years of education and training dependent upon (a) length of service; (b) satisfactory progress in studies or training; (c) the condition that the person was not over 25 years of age at the time of entrance into service, or if over such age, that his education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of entrance into service.

3. Payment of all tuition and other fees, cost of books, supplies, equipment, and other necessary expenses not to exceed a maximum of $500 per school year.

4. Subsistence allowance while pursuing education or training in the amount of $50 per month if without dependents, or $75 per month with a dependent or dependents.

5. Part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance, but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

6. The right to have released to him books and equipment furnished if he satisfactorily complete his course of education or training.

The right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities is extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

TITLE III. LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOMES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

1. Loans for the purposes stated or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000; (a) loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions; (b) the proceeds of the proposed loan must be used for one or more of the purposes specified and the circumstances must meet the specifications prescribed; (c) interest rate must not exceed 4 percent per annum; (d) the loan must be practicable and suitable to the veteran's circumstances; (e) the loan must be repaid within 20 years; (f) the Government must have the right of subrogation to the extent of any guaranty paid; (g) the liability under the guaranty must decrease or increase with the decrease or increase of the amount of unpaid obligation; (h) the agreement must permit the Government to protect itself in case of default through the right to bid on foreclosure proceedings or to refinance.

2. In the event a principal loan is made or guaranteed or insured by a Federal agency, a loan for all or part of the balance of the purchase price or cost may be guaranteed (a) if it does not exceed $2,000; (b) if it does not exceed 20 percent of the cost or purchase price; (c) if the interest rate does not exceed by more than 1 percent the interest rate on the principal loan; (d) if the conditions otherwise meet those prescribed under (1) above.

3. Any veteran eligible under title III shall also be eligible for the benefits of the Bankhead-Jones Farm-Tenant Act, as amended, to the same extent as if he were a farm tenant. Eligibility must be determined (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs; (b) by the Secretary of Agriculture.

TITLE IV. EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS

1. The right to registration for employment with, and for placement in employment by, the Veterans' Employment Service through (a) the United States Employment Service, (b) any State employment agency cooperating with the United States Employment Service.

NOTE (a). This right applies to any veteran of any war discharged or released from active service under conditions other than dishonorable.

NOTE (b). While the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is made responsible for veterans' employment, this is not a function of the Veterans' Administration, but is retained in the United States Employment Service.

TITLE V. READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES FOR FORMER MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES WHO ARE UNEMPLOYED

1. Unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed, subject to the following conditions:

First. The week of unemployment must have begun (a) after the first Sunday of the third calendar month after the effective date of the act; (b) not later than 2 years after discharge or release from active service or the termination of the war, whichever be the later date.

Second. The person is not receiving subsistence allowance for education or training under title II of the act, or increased pension for vocational training under Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress.

Third. To be eligible, the person must (a) reside in the United States; (b) be completely unemployed—or if partially employed, at wages less than $23 per week; (c) be registered with, and reporting to, a public employment office; (d) be able to work and available for suitable work.

Fourth. Any person will be disqualified from receiving an allowance if (a) he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause, or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; (b) he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work or to accept suitable work offered; (c) he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; (d) he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage; (e) added penalties apply to successive disqualifying offenses.

Fifth. Within the 52 weeks' limit the total eligibility is determined by allowing 8 weeks of allowances for each of the first 3 months of service, and 4 weeks of allowances for each month or major fraction thereof of service thereafter.

Sixth. The allowance of $20 per week will be reduced by any Federal or State unemployment or disability compensation—other than pension, compensation, or retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration—received by the veteran for the same period of time.

2. Any person self-employed for profit in an independent establishment, trade, business, profession, or other vocation is eligible for readjustment allowances (a) if net earnings are less than $100 for the previous calendar month; (b) the amount of allowance to be the difference between the net earnings and $100 per month; (c) the conditions as to eligibility otherwise as provided in title V, except the qualifications and disqualifications.

3. Severe penalties are provided for fraud and misrepresentation in connection with claims for readjustment allowances.

4. Readjustment allowance claims are to be serviced by State agencies or as to railway employees, by the Railroad Retirement Board.

5. Right of appeal from any such agency to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is preserved.

TITLE VI. GENERAL ADMINISTRATIVE AND PENAL PROVISIONS

1. By definition, "veterans" include those who reside within the continental United States, the several States, Territories and possessions, and the District of Columbia.

2. A discharge or release from active service under conditions other than dishonorable is made a prerequisite to entitlement to benefits under Public Law No. 2, as amended, as well as this act. This will apply to (a) pensions, (b) compensation, (c) hospitalization, (d) domiciliary care, (e) vocational training, (f) benefits provided by this act.

Declaration of intent is made that benefits received under this act shall be deducted from any benefit afforded by subsequent legislation, if any, in the nature of adjusted pay or adjusted compensation for service.

VETERANS' BENEFITS UNDER OTHER LAWS

Mustering-out pay: Mustering-out pay is provided by the act of February 3, 1944, Public Law 225, Seventy-eighth Congress, and is administered by the War and Navy Departments. The amounts are from $100 to $300.

Allotments and allowances: Administered by the War and Navy Departments.

Domiciliary care: United States Soldiers' Home, under jurisdiction of the War Department; Naval Home, under jurisdiction of the Navy Department. This is in addition to that provided by the Veterans' Administration.

Employment: Return to the job after discharge, under jurisdiction of Selective Service; placing in other jobs, War Manpower Commission; veterans' preference, administered by United States Civil Service Commission and various departments and agencies; job training, rehabilitation (nonservice disability), administered by Federal Security Agency.

The Veterans' Administration cooperates fully in all these functions.

Insurance: Old-age and survivors, administered by the Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; unemployment benefits, Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; retirement, Railroad Retirement Board and Civil Service Commission.

Retirement pay: Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. For officers and enlisted personnel of the Regular Establishment, and Reserve components of Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

Taxes: Bureau of Internal Revenue. All veteran benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration are exempt from all taxation.

It is my belief that certain laws that have been passed for the benefit of the veterans will have to be amended and improved. I earnestly hope that our legislation will prove to be of great benefit to them. They deserve our unswerving loyalty and help.

I am listing acts which assist service men and women and World War veterans:

Public Law No. 10, March 17, 1943: Amends Veterans' Regulation No. 10, as amended, to grant hospitalization, domiciliary care, and burial benefits in certain World War No. 2 cases.

Public Law No. 13, March 23, 1943: Amends section 301, World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, to authorize renewal of expiring 5-year level premium term policies of those in active military or naval service and certain others outside the continental limits of the United States, and for other purposes.

Public Law No. 16, March 24, 1943: Amends title I of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, March 20, 1933, and the veterans' regulations to provide for rehabilitation of disabled veterans, and for other purposes.

Public Law No. 17, March 24, 1943: To amend and clarify certain provisions of law relating to functions of the War Shipping Administration and for other purposes.

Public Law No. 23, April 8, 1943: Relates to the selective-service deferment on occupational grounds of persons employed by the Federal Government.

Latin America Resentful

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief article entitled "Latin America Resentful," written by Bainbridge Colby, former Secretary of State, and eminent constitutional lawyer.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LATIN AMERICA RESENTFUL—"GOOD NEIGHBOR" POLICY ASSAILED

(By Bainbridge Colby, former Secretary of State and eminent constitutional lawyer)

The distinguished Brazilian educator, Prof. Hernane Tavares, asserted the other day that the relations between the United States and Latin America have been steadily deteriorating, and the fact has been carefully kept out of the press of the United States. The statement was made at a meeting of the International Educational Assembly at Hood College, in Frederick, Md. Dr. Tavares is a professor "on leave" of the University of São Paulo, who has been acting as a special adviser to the Coordinator of International Affairs in Washington.

The deterioration which he notes is due, in his opinion, to political and economic causes, as well as the offensive personal conduct of many representatives of this country, now engaged in "improving" South American life, pursuant to our much-touted good-neighbor policy.

Our "good neighbors," alas, show little disposition to thank us. On the contrary, they seem resentful of our interferences in their economic and industrial life, and have a definite fear of our meddling in their politics.

As to what he had in mind in his reference to "personal conduct," our Brazilian visitor leaves us in no doubt. He says the United States Government agencies have been "pouring officials by the thousands into Latin American countries with the most disastrous effect"; their conduct, he says, has been "unorthodox"; they "spend too much money" and many "become rowdy and drunk in the best casinos."

These officials, he adds, were "not carefully selected" and "know nothing of the background of Brazil and how to act in the presence of Brazilians."

There has been no attempt by the administration to reply to these startling charges.

When similar assertions were made in our periodical press and in the Senate a few months ago, by Senator HUGH BUTLER, of Nebraska, as the result of his investigations involving 20,000 miles of travel in the countries of Central and South America and a visit to each of the 20 Latin American republics, a disposition was encountered to pass over the facts with weak disclaimers and no attempt at refutation.

Perhaps Mr. Tavares had this in mind when he was interrupted by the chairman to remind him the newspapermen were present and asked if he wanted his remarks to appear on the record. To which Dr. Tavares replied, "I am so disturbed with conditions as I saw them in Brazil, that bringing the facts into the open may help."

As Senator BUTLER said, concerning this apparent desire to conceal what we have done in South America:

"The entire record of the undertakings and promises in Latin America needs to be brought from under the cloak of secrecy, and publicly ventilated and debated."

It seems that there is no substantial dispute that we are spending $6,000,000,000 in connection with our good neighbor policy. This is six times the national budgets of the 20 Central and South American countries.

This spending has been entrusted to a dozen or more New Deal agencies, operating more than 12,000 projects of 1,000 different types.

Myriads of functionaries have been put on the public pay roll, as for instance an estimated 675 who are attached to the Embassy of the United States in the city of Mexico alone.

Some of the projects are incredibly ridiculous, as for instance, stocking rivers and lakes with game fish; guide books on the South American Indian, their folk lore and recreations; surveys of Latin American music, etc.

Senator BUTLER says he is appalled and astonished at what he learned of our so-called good-neighbor policy.

He says it has become a hemispheric handout, which is neither good nor neighborly, and asks us to remember that the people of South America are a proud people—proud of what they have achieved in the past, and what they are seeking to accomplish in the present.

"They naturally," says the Senator, "desire to be the architects of their own future.

"We treat them, however, as if they were mendicants; attempt to seduce them with boondoggles; and make it plain that, whether they like it or not, we aim to do them over in our own image."

Post-War Highway Legislation

REMARKS
OF
HON. J. W. ROBINSON
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, several Members of the House have made inquiries in recent days regarding the status of post-war highway legislation.

The executive committee of the American Association of State Highway Officials, meeting this week in Chicago, has addressed a similar inquiry to me through Mr. Samuel C. Hadden, the president of the association.

Mr. Hadden points out that time is running against the State highway departments, the blueprinting of post-war road construction projects cannot go forward, and State-wide improvement programs cannot be formulated until the Congress determines what the Federal-aid policy shall be in that period. It will take about a year to perform the necessary engineering and legal work after Congress has acted. Just as important, advance notice should be given to the 45 State legislatures convening January 1, 1945, of the intent of Congress in relation to future appropriations which must be matched by the States.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Roads Committee, of which I am chairman, are fully aware of the urgency of this legislation. I wish to assure the interested Members of this body, and the State highway officials as well, that we realize the need for prompt action. We have no desire that the Congress shall make this provision either "too little or too late" on so important a phase of post-war planning.

The Roads Committee has reported out a bill, which is pending before the House. The bill, H. R. 4915, was approved unanimously by members of the Roads Committee, following public hearings extending over more than 6 weeks, in which more than 100 qualified witnesses appeared from nearly all the States in the Union.

Let me add, for the information of those who are interested in the background of this legislation, that the question of post-war highway Federal aid has been under consideration for more than a year and a quarter. It was first raised in January 1943 by the American Association of State Highway Officials in a splendid presentation before the Roads Committee. The subject has received long and careful consideration.

In view of the urgency of the legislation, and considering the long delays which necessarily have been involved in the drafting of a suitable bill, it had been my hope that H. R. 4915, carrying unanimous committee approval, would reach the floor of the House for consideration prior to our recess.

Unfortunately, it appears, this was not possible, due to the crowded calendar. I have been in consultation with the leaders of the House, and have agreed with them that under the present circumstances it will be necessary to postpone consideration of the bill.

I have their definite assurance, however, that the bill can be taken up quickly after this body has reassembled following the recess. The delay in its consideration should not, therefore, be more than a matter of a few weeks.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding these remarks, I wish to read the telegram which I have received from Mr. Hadden, so that his inquiry, as well as the assurances I have just given, may be made a part of the record:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 20, 1944.

Hon. J. W. ROBINSON,
New House Office Building:

The executive committee, American Association of State Highway Officials, has asked me to inquire regarding progress being made this week on H. R. 4915 for post-war highway legislation. As you know, it is necessary for Congress to establish post-war Federal-aid highway policy before States, counties, and cities can proceed toward solution of complex legal, financial, and engineering problems which must be met in advance to assure sound post-war road program. All States are deeply concerned and time is running against us. Prompt action by Congress is urgent so that this vital phase of post-war planning will not be too little and too late.

SAMUEL C. HADDEN,
President, American Association of State Highway Officials.

The Domestic Political Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, June 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio broadcast by Frank Kingdon over Station WMCA on June 20, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Apart from the progress of the invasion of France and the Japanese islands of the Pacific, Washington tonight is its normal political self, with general political interest running unusually high because of the near approach of the Republican National Convention. The Congress is working under high pressure to get caught up on its work so that it may adjourn for a month to allow its Members to attend the national conventions of the two parties and meanwhile to patch up their political fences in their home districts. Bills are being put together and rephrased hastily, and then passed with a minimum of debate. Matters which cannot be quickly whipped into shape are being postponed. The main intention is to get to the recess. This is understandable enough, but it hardly encourages hope that adequate measures will be enacted to meet the developing situations resulting from the progress of the war. Bernard Baruch, for example, last week urged the country to "Hurry, hurry, hurry" in its preparations for a reconversion program, that is, a plan to get us back to peacetime production as quickly as possible after the war. The Senate's special Post-War Economic Policy and Planning Committee put out last week its proposals for such a program. But the next step will have to wait while the solons take time out to get their party machines going. We shall be lucky if this does not cost us dear. One encouraging action, however, was taken today when the Senate overrode a southern bloc and voted $500,000 to finance operation of the President's Fair Employment Practice Committee for the fiscal year beginning July 1. This Committee is charged with correcting one of the most basic undemocratic practices that still remain to stain our national life, and its continuance means that we are giving more than lip service to the great idea for which we are fighting. Political interest here has centered mainly in the fact that Governor Dewey is now to all intents and purposes an avowed candidate for the Presidential nomination. His lieutenants have opened headquarters in Chicago, and have frankly said that he will accept the nomination which they prophesy will come to him on the first ballot. The general opinion in well-informed circles here is that their hopes are well founded, and that only a major blunder on the part of his campaign managers can prevent his nomination before the first roll call is completed. Some of the older members of the party are not enthusiastic about it, but the great momentum that was given his drive in the days when he was the stop-Willkie candidate seems to have carried him so far that his opponents in the party are helpless.

This estimate is further borne out by a survey completed tonight by the International News Service. It is based on the opinions of scores of Republican leaders across the Nation, delegates to the Republican Convention, and Members of Congress. It results in the prediction that Dewey will come to the first roll-call with 698 votes, Bricker with 156, Stassen with 36, and the rest scattered with 135 uncommitted. This tabulation gives Dewey 168 votes more than the 530 necessary for nomination, so that, even though there will be the usual preconvention shifts and fluctuations, he has a wide margin of safety. His public avowal of his candidacy is further emphasized by the apparently authorized report in congressional circles that he has approved a Republican foreign policy plank which pledges American collaboration in efforts to keep the post-war peace. The plank has been drafted by a committee headed by Senator VANDENBERG, and practically reproduces the declaration made at the Mackinac Conference. It pledges American support of a post-war world organization, but contains a strong declaration that there shall be no international police force, and that no nation shall be required to give up its sovereignty; Dewey has gone over it and approved it. I do not have the text, but the substance does not differ greatly from that of the President's proposal. This may mean that foreign policy will largely be eliminated from the campaign this fall. This is what Secretary Hull wants. He has injected himself into the preparations for the Democratic National Convention which will meet next month by insisting that all discussion of post-war security shall be on a strictly non-partisan basis. He has already discussed this approach with Governor Kerr of Oklahoma, who will deliver the keynote address. He is strong for the idea that the Democratic platform shall lay down its policy in such a way as to prevent a partisan division which might jeopardize an international organization for peace. We can sympathize with his desre and yet realize the danger of this approach. All the soft words in the world cannot erase the truth that the leaders of the Republican Party approach the question of world organization with much less enthusiasm than the President and Secretary Hull. Senator TAFT has declared his willingness to accept a weakened version of the League of Nations. Senator VANDENBERG clings with all the tenacity of Henry Cabot Lodge and William Borah to the blessed word, sovereignty. Governor Dewey has so little enthusiasm for an international association that he has been able to restrain himself altogether from discussing it. One does not have to be partisan to detect the difference between the reluctant approach of such men and the passion of Secretary Hull and the President for the idea.

This is not an idle or factitious distinction to draw. It is fundamental. In 1920, Warren Harding said all the right words. He stood on a plank not much different from that of the present Republican proposal, but, in his heart he did not want an association of nations, and, in the showdown, we did not get one. It is high politics to take our acceptance of an international organization out of the bitterness of the campaign, but it will prove to be tragic shortsightedness if this results in defeating the idea itself. There is a difference between the two parties in their approach to our foreign policy, and we shall not serve the Nation well by obscuring this distinction by pussyfooting on the issue, or by an artificial truce that weakens the national will to enter an international agreement. There always remains the question of where Colonel McCormick and the Chicago Tribune will stand. If the Republican plank can be so interpreted that they can accept it, then we need no further proof that it is a fake gesture toward international collaboration. This is an acid test. If Colonel McCormick supports Dewey, it can mean only one thing, that, in spite of his phrases and the good intentions of Mr. Hull, we are confronted with a choice between a candidate who is honestly for an association of nations and one who is not. I am sure that when I put it as strongly as this, I am not being more emphatic than Colonel McCormick himself would be. This is not an issue to be evaded or slurred over. The lives of the sons of the men now fighting are at stake. If we do not now with full hearts and determined wills establish a firm organization for international peace, we may count ourselves as failures in the most crucial test of our generation, and we may truthfully label ourselves as the authors of the next world war. I am for a nonpolitical solution of this question if we can find one, but I am not for a phony clouding of our choice in a decision that holds the fate of the future of the world in it. The stakes are too large. How large they are is emphasized by the news that Vice President WALLACE has arrived in Chunking. He comes to the capital of our great Oriental ally as the official of highest rank from an allied country who has traveled there. He is on the other side of the world, but he is not very far from us. He is merely symbolizing a world outlook that is as comprehensive as the mechanical ties that bind us intimately now and for ever with Asia. There is something peculiarly right about the fact that his plane was loaded with agricultural seeds—43 varieties of grass seed and 19 kinds of animal forage seeds. That kind of freight is rightly American, and fits with excellent fitness into the character and philosophy of WALLACE himself. In the midst of a war for mankind's survival, when planes are flying over oceans and continents carrying death-dealing bombs and incendiaries, an American has come to China in a plane carrying seeds of life. Here is the ambassador of the new world. This is the preoccupation of free men—the inescapable urge that even war cannot suffocate. This is the answer to the riddle of our own achievements. We have invented machines beyond anything our fathers dreamed, but what is the meaning of them? The answer is the man at the controls. Put a Nazi there and he delights in the power of the machine to destroy; he sows death. Put a free man there and he delights in the power of the machine to spread life; he sows the seeds of new and richer crops. A man has come to China bearing seeds. That is America's message to the world. It is a message from that America which can save the world.

Address by Walter White on His Recent Trip Abroad

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address recently delivered by Walter White, in which he made an interesting report on his recent trip to Great Britain, north Africa, Italy, and the middle eastern war fronts.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I did not understand who it was that had made the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it was a radio speech.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understood the Senator from Kansas to say it was a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; it was a speech which was made by Walter White.

Mr. CAPPER. It was an address delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System by Walter White, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He has recently returned from a trip to Great Britain, north Africa, and the war fronts. In his address he told the story of his trip. It was very interesting.

Mr. RUSSELL. Did he travel in a Government plane?

Mr. CAPPER. No; I believe not. I do not know how he traveled. He was abroad for several weeks.

Mr. RUSSELL. I believe that he must have traveled in a Government plane.

Mr. CAPPER. The address makes very interesting reading.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have no disposition to object to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator. I merely wished to find out how the author of the address had managed to secure transportation to the various war fronts.

Mr. CAPPER. I believe that his address contains information which will be very helpful to Senators.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have no doubt that the address is illuminating, but I was curious to know how its author had procured transportation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It has been my good fortune during the past 3½ months to travel more than 20,000 miles and to talk with many officers, soldiers, and civilians of our own and other countries in Great Britain, north Africa, Italy, and the Middle East. I have seen the European theater of operations as it prepares for invasion of the Continent. My capacity to observe and absorb has been taxed almost beyond belief by the immensity of production of American factories of war materials, their transportation through submarine-infested waters, and their efficient distribution in preparation for D-day. As Americans one cannot help but be proud of the job done which belies much of the carping criticism here at home.

It has been permitted me also to see the north African theater of operations over which the war has passed. I have seen the desperate fighting in the hills around Cassino, in Italy, where our troops have been momentarily checked by the enemy. And I have seen a little of the fabulous Middle East, where the fighting is not with planes and guns, but intrigue over the prizes of oil and human destinies.

Many disturbing rumors had come from these war theaters and from the Pacific, which I hope later to visit, of friction between white and Negro American soldiers. Both as a war correspondent and as secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, I was charged with the responsibility of investigating these rumors and recommending corrective action where the rumors were found to be true. Here is what I found:

The majority of American soldiers abroad have been decent Americans interested in but one objective—winning the war as speedily as possible and returning home. A surprisingly large percentage of them—both officers and enlisted personnel—are concerned over the bad name being given to the United States by the friction some of their number have caused. A gratifyingly large percentage manifest deep concern about the world problem of race and the necessity of working out a solution to it. Many of these are from the South. But, unfortunately, a highly aggressive and vocal minority has sought to transplant patterns of racial behavior like that of the most backward States of the South to the countries where they have been sent as soldiers to fight a war against Nazi racial theories.

Some of them have sought to poison the minds of British, Italian, north African, and other peoples against Negro Americans. They have told such stories as these, that Negroes are inferior, illiterate, diseased, and savage. Some of them have even used physical violence to prevent the association of Negro soldiers with British, Italian, and other people. They have objected to the use of places of public accommodation such as pubs and restaurants by Negro soldiers.

Such behavior has puzzled and antagonized many of the people of these countries. They have found it difficult to understand why some American soldiers should be so violent in their hatred of other American soldiers, especially when all of them are fighting in a common cause. They have resented the action of visitors presuming to dictate to them who they should or should not invite into their homes or associate with. Many of our allies are puzzled too by the American pattern of segregation. Repeatedly I was asked why the United States, fighting a war for freedom, should send abroad two armies—one white and one Negro.

It is particularly unfortunate for America that brawls and other disturbances created by Americans of this type should overshadow the decent behavior and attitude of the far larger percentage of Americans who did not create scenes. As one American officer phrased it, "Two men having a friendly drink together is not news; while one man objecting to another having a drink in the same pub is news." Col. Carlos P. Romulo, one of the great heroes of the battle for the Philippines, recently wrote of similar repercussions in the Pacific: "When race riots broke out in Detroit and Harlem, Tokyo for days thereafter gave the Orient a lurid picture of racial war being waged in the United States. Such rioting plays beautifully into the hands of Jap propagandists because they use it to prove what they hav been telling the orientals—that the white people have nothing but hatred for the yellow and brown."

It is difficult to appraise how far-reaching is the combined effect of the episodes overseas of racial friction and what is going on here at home. The news we have received abroad during the past 4 months has been almost universally depressing. It has been of certain Members of Congress pouring forth hate-filled tirades against the Commander in Chief of our Nation and against racial and religious minorities, as vicious and intemperate in content and tone as any sent out by Goebbels from Berlin. It has been of politics being played on the soldiers' vote bill, and of blatant boasts of filibusters against the anti-poll tax bill. It has been of amazing statements by Governors, Congressmen, and professional hate-mongers against the United States Supreme Court because it outlawed disfranchisement by means of a so-called "white" Democratic primary. It has been of predictions of post-war strife against recial and religious minorities in the United States.

Many American soldiers with whom I talked—both white and Negro—are gravely concerned both by the conduct of some of their fellow soldiers abroad and by the news from back home. Many of them are becoming aware of the need for more information. But when they try to get objective information, they are not permitted to do so. Recently a Congressman who is chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, threatened a fight against the War Department if it distributes a factual, non-propaganda pamphlet on "The Races of Mankind" written by two of America's most distinguished anthropologists, Professors Ruth Benedict and Gent Weltfish. The War Department revoked its plan to distribute the pamphlet.

Fortunately, there are brighter aspects of the picture. In the European theater of operations Gens. Dwight Eisenhower and John C. H. Lee, supreme Allied commander and deputy theater commander, respectively, have issued unequivocal directives and have taken other steps to eliminate the causes of this kind of trouble. They have acted on specific recommendations made to them after exhaustive investigation, and are considering further steps to be taken. Among the latter is the remedying of the condition when I was in England where the overwhelming majority of the Negro troops there were assigned to service units. The importance of this may be seen by contrasting the situation in England with that in an active theater of operations like Italy. Among the units now fighting in Italy is the Negro Ninety-ninth Pursuit Squadron which has made an enviable record in dive bombing enemy targets. Three other Negro squadrons recently arrived on the Italian front are beginning to demonstrate their effectiveness. One of the most courageous feats now being performed on any battle front is the running of supplies into the Anzio beachhead by quartermaster and trucking units, about 70 percent of them being Negroes, according to Ernie Pyle. The record being made by these Negro soldiers has earned for them respect as fighters. It is also interesting to note that as men approach actual battle and face the dangers of combat, they tend to discard many of the prejudices and pre-conceived notions they formerly held.

It is startling to find upon returning from war zones that there are still many Americans who believe that the war in Europe is virtually over, and that victory is certain. I found no such illusions overseas. We face a resourceful and fanatical enemy, both in Europe and in the Pacific. The division in our ranks and the fomenting of racial or other antagonisms are postponing the day of victory. They are creating doubt among our allies as to our sincerity when we assert that we are fighting a war for freedom for all peoples. Whoever causes the war to last 1 single day longer than necessary is as much a traitor to our country as one who sinks a troop ship or reveals military secrets to the enemy. If for no other reason than to win the war as soon as is humanly possible and to save the lives of American men—perhaps among them the life of your son—it is imperative that any person, whatever his race, who causes trouble should be stopped. That will be done only if the people of America and their Government stop evading or temporizing with this fundamental question whose solution is imperative if we are ever to have a world of peace.

Insurance or Doles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and persuasive editorial entitled "Insurance or Doles," which appeared in the Washington Post today.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INSURANCE OR DOLES

Senator GEORGE'S post-war committee has gone on record in opposition to administration proposals aimed at establishing uniform standards of unemployment compensation during the post-war adjustment period by means of Federal supplements to inadequate State benefit payments. The committee recommends instead a limited extension of coverage to new-exempt workers, including Government employees. It merely urges the States to liberalize the provisions of their unemployment insurance systems, and, as an incentive to that end, suggests that the solvency of State unemployment funds should be guaranteed through Federal loans.

In our opinion such half-hearted measures would have negligible effect. Those States with reserves so limited as to be speedily exhausted by serious local unemployment are not likely to be lured into liberalizing their systems by offers of aid when calamity threatens. Moreover, the existence of separate State unemployment insurance systems creates special financial problems that would not exist if the insurance coverage were Nation-wide and insurance reserves were pooled. Even the administration proposal advanced by O. W. M. Director Byrnes is a temporary makeshift. It is, however, a compromise program which would achieve some of the advantages of federalization without encountering as strong political opposition as the opposition aroused by demands for outright federalization.

The George post-war committee report on employment contains cogent arguments in support of the very proposals it has just rejected. For instance, the report emphasizes the magnitude of the post-war employment problem. It stresses the labor dislocations resulting from the war and the difficult adjustments that will be required to provide jobs for demobilized servicemen and dismissed war workers. The committee emphatically recognizes that the solution of these problems constitutes a national, not a local or State, responsibility. It says that the severity of the transition period and the ability of industy following that period to absorb 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 more workers than it has ever absorbed before will depend very largely on governmental policy and this committee is primarily concerned with shaping that policy. In short, the inescapable implication is that the post-war unemployment problem is a responsibility of the whole Nation acting through the Federal Government.

The labor market is a national market. Hence even if State insurance systems were in all respects satisfactory as to amount and duration of benefits, migratory workers would often be deprived of benefits. As matters now stand, workers may lose out not only by moving from State to State but by shifting fom covered or insured to uncovered employment. They forfeit benefits also when they move from States where standards are comparatively high to those where the insurance benefits are meager. The result is that desired mobility of the labor market is not achieved. Our economy, as Mr. Willkie says, is interdependent. Consequently it becomes an indefensible anomaly to set up independent insurance systems that are conspicuous for their lack of uniformity of benefits. In our opinion, therefore, reliance upon State systems of unemployment insurance to tide demobilized workers over the difficult postwar transition period is doomed to failure.

Director Byrnes has expressed opposition to revival of W. P. A. or payment of dismissal wages to be charged against contracts. Yet doles in some form, paid for by the Federal Government, are the alternatives which we shall almost certainly be forced to embrace in the absence of a uniform, adequate system of unemployment insurance benefits financed in part by the Federal Government.

Relation of Taxes to Post-War Employment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial, which appeared in the Des Moines Sunday Register of June 11, 1944:

RELATION OF TAXES TO POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT

We think this subject is tremendously important. We also have a feeling that it is desirable to clear up two or three fuzzy things about American thinking, or lack of thinking, before getting directly into it.

First, the nature of America's experience in developing the resources of the continent gave the businessman and the business mind for a long while unchallenged leadership. One effect was to make the enterprisers of the country (the job providers) so sure that what was good for them was good for everybody that they just took it for granted and figured that everybody else should do likewise. They saw no need of explaining why, and lost the knack of it.

And the country sort of grew up, and the economy got more complex, and when the interests of other big groups began to be pressed quite legitimately, and when it became evident that what most enterprisers thought would be swell for them immediately might not always be to the long-run good of the whole people, a large part of a bewildered public got the notion that anything that the business crowd contended for was properly suspect and probably wrong.

This was an absurd swing of the pendulum.

A second fuzzy idea that needs disposing of is the one about the uselessness of economists in solving broad economic problems. Unfortunately, businessmen did most to discredit trained economic thinking. You, Mr. Reader, know how the slurs ran: "Economists are all impractical theorists" and "No two economists agree on anything, so the thing to do is to ignore them, or at most to treat them as pestiferous flies."

The fact is that reputable economists do agree on some mighty fundamental things, and can give the sensible reasons for them, and their knowledge needs very much to be spread and used. In the matter of tax policy, specifically.

The third thing that is important for everybody to get unequivocally into his head is the fact that, while a century hence America may decide to turn socialist or something like that, we are certainly going to stick to our system of capitalist democracy for a good long time. We aren't going to accept a situation in which the Government is the only or even the principal employer. We are certainly going to depend primarily on private enterprise, more or less regulated in certain fields but not superseded, to do the great bulk of our job providing.

And, since everyone with his wits about him now recognizes that our major problem after the war is going to be the providing of enough steady and adequately paid jobs to prevent our fighters from "selling apples on the streets" and to absorb our war workers, we've simply got to face up to the question of how to accomplish this.

Of course, we recognize that reasonably full employment in peacetime occupations will be essential not only for humane reasons but also to avert an economic and consequently a social tailspin. Only through millions and millions of new civilian jobs provided by corporate and individual enterprisers can we hope to push out the purchasing power necessary to avoid another great depression.

Here is where tax policy comes in. Here is where broad economic thinking, including that of the overwhelming majority of economists, both conservative and liberal, comes in. Here is where we have to recognize that, as long as we stick to our type of society, resting upon a somewhat regulated but not superseded private enterprise, some of the basic points made on behalf of private enterprise are indubitably sound.

Obviously, if as a Nation we expect and demand that enterprisers provide enough peacetime jobs to keep our economy going, we've got to make it possible for them to do it. The conditions that are determined by national legislative policy must be, if not perfect, at least workably sound.

Now, to create enough jobs through private enterprise there must be either large expansion of present businesses or the starting of many new businesses. As a practical matter, there must be both. And, while other factors, such as uncertainty about the degree of regulation, have their importance, tax policy comes closer to being the key to everything than does anything else.

For what, at bottom, America demands, is that enterprisers be enterprising. We want people who have savings, big or little, to invest those savings in businesses where the savings go to work providing jobs which provide salaries and wages, which provide distributed purchasing power, which provides demand for more goods, which provides opportunity for more investment, and so on.

National tax policy which discourages investment in the expanding of present businesses or the creation of new is just plain silly. Taxes that make the risking of savings in business enterprise not worth while are suicidal.

At present there is no such thing as a national tax policy. All we have is a lot of taxes. The net effect is to discourage exactly what in the immediate post-war period we have the most urgent need to encourage. In other words, if we aren't to make a mess of our post-war job hopes, we simply must have a national tax plan. (Don't jump, Brother Enterpriser; for a basic "plan" of taxation is precisely your need.)

The first principle of tax policy and preparation for post-war job-making, must be to encourage business investment. The first application of that principle must be to end the most powerful deterrent of risking savings in business, which is double taxation of business earnings.

Bear in mind that risk means risk. There must be incentive to make people take it. Unless there is a pretty fair opportunity for an investor to make something substantial, he won't put his savings where, unless the business succeeds handsomely, they evaporate.

If, for illustration, a corporate business in which you, Mr. Reader, invest your savings pays half its gross earnings in taxes, and if then you individually pay a big chunk of the dividends you get, as personal income tax, you are being subjected to such heavy double taxation on the earnings from your risk-taking investment that you are likely to see no point in putting your savings to that use.

Not being a dunce, you will reflect that, if you are to get no more from a risk-taking investment that pans out beautifully, but in which you might have lost your shirt, than you would get if you had put your money in Government bonds or a savings bank account where the risk was zero, why should you be interested in putting your money where it would help make the jobs would give workers purchasing power that would serve the Nation's interest for the long and hard pull?

If savings have a duty to move into job-creating enterprise, the Nation has a duty to make it possible for savings thus to flow.

This is not any case of babying Wall Street, or the rich corporations, or even business in general. It is a case of using ordinary horse sense toward the accomplishment of our major post-war economic objective.

We shan't get anywhere by applying the whip to the flanks of the job-making nag, and yelling "giddy-ap!" while at the same time pulling back on the bit and in effect yelling "whoa!"

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, various communities in the congressional district I have the honor to represent are taking a very active part in promoting the post-war construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. All political parties in the State of Wisconsin for many years have written planks supporting this project in their party platform.

I can conceive of no good reason why this project should not now receive immediate authorization so that work can be commenced as soon as the necessities of war permit the allocation of material and men. This subject has been discussed for over 25 years. The House Committee on Rivers and Harbors has conducted extensive hearings and has reported legislation authorizing this important work.

The Common Council of the City of Sheboygan, Wis., on April 17, 1944, unanimously adopted a resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to immediately pass authorizing legislation. I am pleased to incorporate this legislation as part of these remarks:

Whereas the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway will have tremendous effect upon the progress of almost all communities surrounding the Great Lakes; and

Whereas much of this landlocked area is actually decreasing in population which is partially resulting from the disadvantage of high costs of shipping to the different coastal cities; and

Whereas the authorization of the St. Lawrence seaway by the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States will be as a starting gun for vast activity, especially in all the Great Lakes ports, which ports will prepare for that day when ocean navigation will spread to all parts of each of the Great Lakes; and

Whereas, this great project should be authorized in readiness for the war's end as insurance against a post-war slump and unemployment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Common Council of the City of Sheboygan, That the common council respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to immediately take steps to authorize the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway as an early post-war project; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to each House of the Congress of the United States and to each Member thereof.

Campaign Correspondence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR THE DEFENSE OF DEMOCRACY
THROUGH EDUCATION,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1944.

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. MORRISON: I wish to express to you the appreciation of the teaching profession as represented by the National Education Association and our Commission for the splendid work you have done in the advancement of legislation for Federal aid for schools in the House of Representatives. We particularly appreciate your filing of Discharge Motion No. 12 for which teachers all over the country are working.

We are also indebted to you for the cooperation you have given to our representatives who have been working at the Capitol.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD DUSHANE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I am writing you this letter to ask you for your vote and your support in my reelection to Congress September 12, 1944.

As a Member of Congress I have tried to serve each and every citizen of the Sixth District. No job was too small nor none too large for me to tackle. No letter or telegram was ever received that was not promptly and efficiently answered. No request was too large or too small for me to try to fulfill.

I have supported President Roosevelt and the armed forces on every war measure that was brought before Congress for the successful prosecution of this war.

Much of the soldiers' legislation was introduced by me while at the same time I vigorously supported all soldiers' legislation.

At all times I have voted the way I thought the vast majority of my district wanted me to so vote. Frankly I am proud of my record and believe that my worst critic will have to admit that I have done a good job.

It may be that I will not have the opportunity to see you personally and talk with you before the election, so that is why I am writing you this personal letter asking for your vote and support in order that we will win another great victory on September 12, 1944.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

JIMMY MORRISON, M. C.

P. S. If I can be of any service to you as your Congressman please write me either at Hammond, La., or at Washington, D. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FELLOW OFFICIAL: I am taking the liberty of addressing you in this manner because both of us have one thing in common and that is that we hold public office and were elected by the people.

As you know, I am running for reelection to Congress. I have tried to do everything within my power to aid my district and feel that you will agree that I have done a conscientious job. Even my worst critic admits that I have done a good job as Congressman. I will certainly appreciate it if you could see fit to support my candidacy. I sincerely hope that I will be able to contact you personally, but prior to that opportunity I decided to write you this letter asking for your support.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. MORRISON, M. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: As you no doubt know I am a candidate for reelection. Naturally I am proud of the record I have made in Congress and believe that I can do an even better job in the next 2 years. Anyway that will be my aim.

From my inception in Louisiana politics down to the present time, I have been most keenly aware of the negligent manner in which the school bus drivers of Louisiana have been treated. I have always been fully cognizant that the school bus drivers have been underpaid, never given certain rights which their position entitled them to, and overlooked by all politicians of every political creed.

You, who are responsible for the safety of our children in going to and coming from school, in whom we place such a confidence and trust with reference to the physical well-being of our loved little ones, are entitled to those means with which to earn a decent livelihood for yourself and your family.

In Washington I have fought long and hard against the O. P. A. for more liberal gas allowances for the Louisiana school-bus drivers, for priorities, additional tires, parts, etc. I have always insisted that you use your busses in whatever manner you see fit when not carrying school children. The betterment of the position of the bus drivers of Louisiana is so important in my viewpoint that I have included the same as an important part of all my future plans.

I pledge unhesitatingly to do everything within my power, to continue to help you to remedy the evils that beset you at this time, and to improve your working and living conditions. Your support and that of your friends will help me to help you.

Cordially yours,

JAMES H. MORRISON, M. C.

P. S. If I can be of any service or assistance in my capacity as your Congressman to you at any time, please do not hesitate to call upon me either in Hammond, La., or Washington, D. C.

Statement by James A. Farley, Chairman of Democratic State Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS F. BURCHILL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. BURCHILL of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I should like to include therein a statement by the Honorable James A. Farley, former chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee, upon his resignation from that post in which he had served since 1928.

The statement follows:

In 1928 I was elected secretary of the Democratic State committee. In 1930 I was elected chairman, and I have served continuously in that office.

During all the years I have served as chairman I have tried, insofar as possible, to give all the time and attention necessary to perform my duties in a satisfactory manner and to aid in every way I could in the election of Democratic nominees. In State and National campaigns during all those years I devoted all my time from early morning until late at night on behalf of the party's nominees. That is the duty of any chairman.

We will soon be involved in another national campaign and one of great importance. My business duties and obligations are such that I could not possibly give the time necessary, and which I believe is necessary to properly conduct that work, and for that reason I am resigning as chairman of the Democratic State committee.

I do this reluctantly and with a feeling of deep regret because it means the severance of a close, personal relationship with the county chairmen, the vice chairmen, the State committee members, and the party workers—a relationship which has been an exceptionally happy one for 16 years. I doubt if any man in my position has ever enjoyed the friendship of the leaders and the party workers as I have during these 16 years, and it is not easy for me to break away, but I have no choice in the matter.

The Democratic State committee should be in a position to select my successor so that he may be able to perfect the plans which of necessity must be put into operation on behalf of Democratic nominees in the November election. The party and the nominees are entitled to the whole-hearted and complete support from him, and he should have ample time to work out the organization according to his own viewpoint.

I am going away on a business trip which will take me away from New York for several weeks and I have instructed Albert L. Ward, secretary of the State committee, to call a meeting at the National Democratic Club in New York City, on July 11, for the selection of my successor.

During the 35 years I have been active as a Democratic worker, a county chairman, and an officer of the State committee, it has been my privilege to support Democratic nominees who have been elected and have given splendid service. My association with all of them was enjoyable and in the days which are ahead I should look back to those years with pleasant memories.

Whatever success I may have had in the performance of my duties as chairman of the State committee has been due entirely to the assistance I have had from the leaders and the precinct workers—men and women—down through the years. A splendid relationship has always existed among us and they have made it possible for me to carry on. I shall always be grateful for their loyalty, their cooperation, and their friendship.

The Congressional Pages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COSTELLO
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, a week ago the Congressional Pages School graduated 10 young men from the high school. These young men have served the Members of this Congress faithfully and well throughout the past year, and have proven a great aid in lightening the many burdens of the membership of the House. These fine young men with their pleasant dispositions, sincerity, and industriousness, and their constant willingness to assist in every way possible, have materially eased our tasks and have made our work here the more enjoyable because of their splendid cooperation. To them as they depart from high school, we bid them Godspeed on their journey through life and pray for them every success.

Just as these younger citizens have learned to serve here in the halls of Congress, we find four of them entering the direct service of the country with our armed forces. Two have already joined the services: Gerrie P. Putnam, from El Paso, Tex., who is now a Navy Air Corps student at Duke University; and Randlett T. Lawrence, from Monthalia, Tex., who has joined the marines. Two others will soon enter upon their military careers: Donald R. Kaufman, from Dallas, Tex., who will become a member of the Army; and Dorsey Joe Bartlett, from Clarksburg, W. Va., who will become a member of the marines in the immediate future.

Indicative of the viewpoint of these graduates toward the problems of life which now confront them, I am pleased to submit a brief discourse by Dorsey Joe Bartlett, who for the past 3 years has had direct supervision of the pages assigned to the Republican side of the House. The discourse is as follows:

THEY WILL CARRY THE TORCH FORWARD

You hear a great deal of talk today about the future of America. People concerned, some actually worried, about the coming generation. This isn't the first time, and I am sure that it won't be the last, that many minds have dwelt with this question. The concern will be an asset to our youth; the worry, I am certain, will prove needless. I base this conviction on a very interesting and representative group about whom I would like to tell you—the congressional pages in the United States House of Representatives. I have been very close to these 48 boys, even closer to the 14 under my direct supervision in the last 3 years, before and since Pearl Harbor.

From a Georgia cotton plantation, from a Midwest oil town, from a West Virginia mountain home (like myself), and from the great metropolis, these boys come forth to serve Congress. Eleven- to sixteen-year-old lads leaving the watchful eyes and loving care of their mothers to independently face life and its problems in the "hub" of the world. No mother there to see that they arise in time for 7 o'clock classes, or spend their time and money wisely, or wash behind their ears, or behave themselves properly. Yes; they have the greatest opportunity—but for failure as well as for success. Their answer to the challenge of temptation is best shown in their past records. Many successful businessmen, ministers, Members of Congress, war heroes, fine loyal American citizens, first faced life when a young lad as a Congressional page. This example is by no means an exception for the American youth. Anything adverse is the exception. Too often do we base our judgment of all on one of these rare exceptions, which usually can be traced to a fault other than that of the child's. Our youth has what it takes.

In my mind there is no doubt as to the future of the Nation. The citizens of tomorrow will carry the torch forward with the light of free institutions and traditions shining over a peaceful and prosperous America.

Veterans' Legislation, Seventy-eighth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a résumé of the legislation reported by the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation and enacted into law during the Seventy-eighth Congress, including the so-called G. I. bill, which was signed by the President today, and became Public Law No. 346; and also including my widows and orphans bill, which passed the House unanimously and is now pending in the Finance Committee of the Senate.

PUBLIC LAWS, SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, EMANATING FROM THE COMMITTEE ON WORLD WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

H. R. 1749: Became Public Law No. 10 on March 17, 1943. (To amend Veterans Regulation No. 10, as amended, to grant hospitalization, domiciliary care, and burial benefits to veterans of World War No. 2.)

H. R. 2023: Became Public Law No. 13 on March 23, 1943. (To amend section 301, World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, to authorize renewal of expiring 5-year level premium term policies of those in active military or naval service and certain others outside the continental limits of the United States.)

S. 786. Became Public Law No. 16 on March 24, 1943. (To amend title I of Public Law No. 2, 73rd Cong., Mar. 20, 1933, and the veterans regulations to provide for rehabilitation of disabled veterans of World War No. 2.)

H. R. 2703. Became Public Law No. 144 on July 13, 1943. (To provide more adequate and uniform administrative provisions in veterans' laws pertaining to compensation, pension, and retirement pay payable by the Veterans' Administration, and for other purposes.)

S. 964. Because Public Law No. 170 on October 25, 1943. (To provide for furnishing transportation in Government-owned automotive vehicles for employees of the Veterans' Administration at field stations in the absence of adequate public or private transportation.)

H. R. 800. Became Public Law No. 187 on November 22, 1943. (To provide for the issuance of a flag to the nearest relatives of certain persons who die in service in the land or naval forces of the United States.)

S. 693. Became Public Law No. 300 on May —, 1944. (Granting service connection for disabilities incurred prior to induction or enrollment for veterans of World War II.)

H R 3176. Became Public Law No. 308 on May 23, 1944. (Providing artificial limbs or other appliances to retired officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, and to certain civilian employees of the military and naval forces of the Regular Establishment.)

H. R. 4519: Became Public Law No. 309 on May 24, 1944. (To authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to furnish seeing-eye dogs for blind veterans.)

H. R. 3356: Became Public Law No. 312 on May 27, 1944. (To increase the service-connected disability rates of compensation or pension of veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 and veterans entitled to wartime rates based on service on or after September 16, 1940, for service connected disabilities, and to increase the rates for widows and children under Public Law 484, 73d Cong., as amended, and to include widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans for benefits under the latter act.)

H. R. 3377: Became Public Law No. 313 on May 27, 1944. (To increase the rate of pension for World War veterans from $40 to $50 per month, to $60 per month in certain specified cases.)

S. 1767: To provide Federal Government aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans. Became Public Law No. 346 on June 22, 1944.

H. R. 1744: Granting compensation to the widows and children of deceased veterans of World War No. 1 without the requirement that the veteran at the time of his death must have had a disability shown to have been incurred in or aggravated by such service. This bill passed the House on May 19, 1944, without a dissenting vote, and was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, where it is now pending.

Labor Speaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from the Fitchburg Sentinel and letters to the editor of the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram:

[From the Fitchburg (Mass.) Sentinel of July 17, 1943]

PHILBIN ANSWERS NO-STRIKE BILL CHARGE BY C. I. O.—SAYS ABSENCE IN HOUSE ON DAY OF VOTE CAUSED BY DEATH IN FAMILY

In reply to a charge made at meeting of C. I. O. unions in this city that he had supported the Smith-Connally antistrike bill and had been absent from the House of Representatives when the final vote on the measure was taken Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN today sent a letter to Thomas Binall, temporary chairman of the tri-city council denying that he had supported the measure and explaining that his absence from the House when the vote on the bill came up was due to a death in his family.

The letter to Mr. Binall in part is as follows: "Since I do not believe you would intentionally misrepresent my position, but since your press account is in fact, a flagrant misrepresentation of my position, I wish to advise you that I repeatedly voted against the Smith-Connally antistrike bill.

"I voted against the rule permitting its consideration by the House. I voted against the bill itself, and I voted against the conference report.

"At the time the bill passed over the Presidential veto, I was unavoidably absent from my duties because of a death in family. Had I been present I would have voted to sustain the Presidential veto.

"I cannot believe, therefore, that any responsible labor leader would have knowingly participated in such a palpable misrepresentation of my position. In fairness, I ask you promptly to retract and correct the misstatements you have conveyed to your membership and to the public, and also give me the source of your false information so that I may take proper steps to protect myself against further publication of these misstatements."

The action to which Mr. PHILBIN takes exception was taken in this city Wednesday night at a meeting of C. I. O. unions from Leominster, Gardner, and Fitchburg held for the purpose of organizing a tri-city C. I. O. council.

After the Smith-Connally measure had been characterized as a "blow to national unity and to the unquestioned loyalty and patriotism of American labor" the council went on record as in support of President Roosevelt and then voted to write Senator LODGE and Representative PHILBIN in regard to their support of the bill and to cite PHILBIN's absence from the House when the vote was taken.

To the EDITOR, WORCESTER TELEGRAM, Worcester, Mass.:

As an active member of C. I. O. who is enthusiastically supporting PHILIP J. PHILBIN for Congress, I read with interest and no little amusement the letter of Mr. Thomas H. Binnall, chairman of the Tri-City C. I. O. Council, Gardner, which contained a number of sweeping generalities concerning Congressman PHILBIN's record of votes on various measures passed upon by the Seventy-eighth session of Congress. Mr. Binnall's charges that PHILBIN is anti-labor is refuted by the record. Mr. Binnall infers that the Clinton representative "voted badly or was absent on 10 crucial bills before Congress," while giving the impression that these same measures were bills having direct bearing upon organized labor, as such, and were of little or no interest to the rest of the country.

Unfortunately, Mr. Binnall was not specific, because the record is otherwise, as to just what bills Mr. PHILBIN voted against when they came to a vote in the House. For that reason, we must turn to the Massachusetts C. I. O. News, May 5, 1944, for the bills Mr. Binnall had in mind. This paper contains a listing of 22 measures to come before Congress and the voting record of each Congressman is marked "good" or "bad" depending on how the C. I. O. felt about each particular piece of legislation. Incidentally, it is not amiss to point out that a listing of these same 22 measures is absolutely identical with a chart issued by the Communist Party and tallying in exact detail to the last vote on the so-called goodness or badness of each Congressman's voting record. By this standard, about 95 percent of Congress should be smeared and purged for having black records on these same measures, according to the C. I. O. Only two out of 18 Massachusetts Senators and Congressmen could pass this test; and only 5 out of 280 members of the General Court.

Mr. Binnall says Congressman PHILBIN voted against organized labor by not "keeping down exorbitant corporation salaries." After much search of the Massachusetts C. I. O. News, we come to this measure: "Lifting the $25,000 salary limit." Congress here killed part of the President's plan to make the rich share the sacrifices of war." Mr. PHILBIN is listed here as voting against labor along with every other Member of the Massachusetts delegation in Congress. Moreover, this "salary limitation bill" was lifted bodily out of the Communist Party platform of 1940 and strikes a body blow at free enterprise. Actually under present taxes the rich and everyone else including the poor is paying tremendous portions of their incomes for the war. Taxes have automatically put a limit on salaries and income.

Mr. Binnall says Congressman PHILBIN voted against labor by not "lowering the ceiling prices on foods and necessities." This refers to the much-discussed subsidy issue, which sought to establish that the Government of the United States is under an obligation to pay part, or indeed all, of the grocery, meat, and food bills of all its people at a time when wages and the national income are higher than ever before in the history of the Nation. The subsidies issue was defeated by a large vote and as a consequence some 300 Members of Congress should be retired to private life, according to Mr. Binnall. PHILBIN voted for temporary subsidies on necessities to relieve low-income groups, but opposed general "handouts" which were estimated by some to cost $25,000,000,000 a year, would cripple the Treasury, and jeopardize all pension systems for veterans and civil employees. As usual, the poor would pay this cost. A broken national fiscal system would be the result.

Mr. Binnall says Congressman PHILBIN voted against labor by not voting for "financial assistance to poor farmers." This is a pretty tough one to find in the Massachusetts C. I. O. News' master chart, but it could be that Mr. Binnall has this confused with the following listing in the C. I. O. News: "Senator BYRD's F. S. A. bill—an amendment designed to strip the Farm Security Administration of its power to make loans to small farmers." Unfortunately, this measure did not come before the House for a vote, but was acted upon in the Senate. Until such time as Mr. Binnall is more specific, we must conclude that he was furnished with the wrong set of figures or the wrong script. PHILBIN has been a consistent friend of the farmer. Of course, he is opposed to the collective farming and crackpot resettlement advocated by the Communists.

Mr. Binnall says Congressman PHILBIN voted against labor by "crippling the O. P. A. with big business domination." The C. I. O. News has this to say about this measure: "Big business in O. P. A. A House vote to enable big business to plant its own agents in policy-making positions in O. P. A." This particular measure was an amendment to the 1944 appropriations bill for the O. P. A. to provide for the employment of personnel with at least 5 years business experience in that field or activity which they would supervise as Government employees in the Office of Price Administration. The amendment also served to eliminate a number of impractical theorists and dreamers, who did much to hamper an efficient O. P. A., in the early days of rationing and price control. The measure passed by the House by a large vote and it is very difficult to figure out how labor was dealt such a death-blow as Binnall describes by the passage of this amendment by the House, in fact the bill was manifestly in the interest of rich and poor alike.

No one in Congress more vigorously fought for strict, just, price control and elimination of the black market than Congressman PHILBIN, who even went so "all out" for labor as to favor abrogation of the Little Steel formula, if necessary, to bring prices and wages into balance and prevent unconscionable mulcting of poor low-paid consumers by inflated price scales ordered by the starry-eyed dreamers in O. P. A. PHILBIN supported all appropriation requests to finance rigorous enforcement of price ceilings, with court appeals for all aggrieved citizens.

Mr. Binnall says that Congressman PHILBIN voted against labor by voting for the "abolition of the domestic Office of War Information." The domestic activities of O. W. I. have not been abolished. They have been curtailed because Congress cut the O. W. I. appropriations for domestic operations, and increased appropriations for overseas propaganda work. In addition, it would certainly make interesting reading to have Mr. Binnall tell us how the laboring men and women of the Third Congressional District suffered when Congress passed this measure by a decisive vote. It must also be borne in mind that there is strong radical activity in O. W. I. at home and abroad, unwise, harmful propaganda, censorship and other irregularities. Does Mr. Binnall remember the phrase "the moronic little king." That was hatched in O. W. I., and much more, too. The work of screwballs in O. W. I., being paid by United States taxpayers and laborers.

Mr. Binnall says that Congressman PHILBIN voted against labor by "loosening control of rent." This is a very broad statement entirely unsupported in fact and it was most difficult to find out just what measure Mr. Binnall had in mind since Congress at no time voted to discontinue or relax rent control. The C. I. O. News enlightens us, however, and we find: "Creation of Smith committee. The House gave HOWARD SMITH of Virginia a committee which tried to destroy rent control." This was a vote for the creation of a committee to investigate all phases of rent control and other abuses of administrative power and to report to Congress thereon with whatever recommendations were felt necessary. PHILBIN has been a staunch advocate of rent control during the war crisis but he does not want private ownership confiscated by bureaucratic decrees denying appeals to the Federal courts. He does not want the homes of the poor people taxed away from them. Incidentally, the Smith committee was approved by the House by a preponderant vote. Mr. Binnall says Congressman PHILBIN voted against labor by voting to continue the Dies Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities. Mr. Binnall's concern is apparent, since the Dies committee has been very appropriately investigating the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. However, he should not mask an investigation of the activities of this particular group as being detrimental to organized labor as a whole. Honest organized labor has never suffered from the hands of the Dies committee. Many "parlor pinks," Communists, radicals, and so forth have suffered through exposure of their nefarious work, among them notably a major portion of big executives in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, of whom we will hear more of as this campaign progresses.

Mr. Binnall should be more frank concerning his discussion of Congressman PHILBIN's labor record. The American Federation of Labor has endorsed PHILBIN's record and has requested all its members to support him at the polls. So have the railroad brotherhoods, the postal employees, and thousands like me in the C. I. O. The C. I. O. is not opposing PHILBIN because of an alleged anti-labor record which exists only in fancy of propagandists. It is opposing him because he is not a 100 percent rubber stamp, because he cannot be controlled or delivered, because he is fighting the Communists and the crackpots.

Labor has little to fear with PHIL PHILBIN in Congress. The outstanding measure, solely touching upon organized labor as such, to come before the Seventy-eighth Congress for vote was the so-called Smith-Connally bill designed to liquidate labor unions. This was the acid test of loyalty to labor. PHILBIN voted against this measure in committee, he voted against the rule permitting consideration of the bill on the floor of the House, he voted against the hostile Harness amendment, and he voted against the bill itself when it came up for final passage. When the President vetoed the bill, Congressman PHILBIN was called away from Washington by two tragic deaths in his family, but on the basis of his previous votes on this measure, it is easily apparent that he would have voted to uphold the veto. At that time, Mr. Binnall joined with the tri-city C. I. O. in misrepresenting PHILBIN's vote and actually publicized a letter in the press condeming him for voting wrong on the Smith-Connally bill, though he voted for labor.

We will have more smears and lies before this campaign ends because the radical boys of the C. I. O. palace guard know that PHILBIN is one of the strongest enemies they have in Congress and they will try to liquidate him at all costs. Slurs, smears, and shake-downs of poor workers are the technique. But the people have the power to smash these subversive influences in the voting booth and will do it. And the rank and file of C. I. O. which will not follow radical leaders will help them do it. I predict an overwhelming majority of C. I. O. will support PHILBIN. Over 95 percent of my own C. I. O. local endorse him.

The intelligent electorate of the third district will not be confused by the smokescreen, and distortions circulated by the C. I. O., because Congressman PHILBIN has demonstrated real leadership, honest, conscientious service and independent courageous thinking and acting in the Congress of the United States. C. I. O. radicals are not going to turn this country Communist or run the Government, nor will they turn us loyal Americans in C. I. O. into Communists. And stooges and rubber stamps are not going to be elected to Congress. The people will retain their own free Government and their own good, honest, conscientious Representatives in Washington. We need more Congressmen like PHILBIN and we will have them. That goes for labor and every other group in the third district.

Colleagues of C. I. O.—don't be used as tools. Vote American. Vote for the boys who fight, their early return, for your homes, your families, and your American institutions. Vote for PHIL PHILBIN for Congress.

Very truly yours,

JOHN O'ROURKE,
Vice President, Local 2828, United Steel Workers of America, C. I. O.

Southern "Revolt" Against the New Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Charles G. Ross, from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch:

SOUTHERN "REVOLT" AGAINST NEW DEAL AND ITS VARIOUS AND UNUSUAL POSSIBILITIES—IF ELECTORS FROM DISAFFECTED STATES SHOULD VOTE AGAINST PARTY NOMINEE RESULTING DEADLOCK MIGHT ELECT PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT FROM DIFFERENT PARTIES

(By Charles G. Ross, contributing editor of the Post-Dispatch)

WASHINGTON, June 17.—The shabby political shenanigans now being practiced by anti-Roosevelt Democrats in some of the Southern States could result, conceivably, in the election next January—January, not November—of a Republican President and a Democratic Vice President. Or there could be a deadlock over the Presidency that would make the Vice President the acting head of the Nation.

These interesting possibilities grow out of the scheme in the South—Texas, South Carolina, Mississippi, and perhaps other States—to name Democratic electors who will vote in the electoral college for some other person than the party nominee unless the national Democratic platform meets certain specified conditions. These are: Support of the poll tax and the South's traditional views on the race question and, according to the demands of Texas and Mississippi, a restoration of the rule requiring a two-thirds vote for the Democratic Presidential nomination.

The scheme may or may not come to fruition. The Texas situation has been further complicated by a State Supreme Court decision, handed down last Wednesday, granting pro-Roosevelt Democrats the right to file suit to require that the names of Roosevelt electors be placed on the July 22 primary ballot. But if the scheme does work, the choice of a President, as has happened on two occasions in our history, might be thrown into the House of Representatives through the failure of any Presidential candidate to receive an electoral-college majority.

VICE PRESIDENT WOULD ACT

The election of a Republican as President might well follow, for it appears likely that unless the Democratic nominee wins in a sweep the House will go Republican. There could, however, be a deadlock in the House beyond the date, January 20, of the beginning of the new Presidential term, and in this event the Vice President-elect would act as President until a President had qualified.

Why the likelihood of a Democratic Vice President, to serve, possibly, with a Republican President, if the action of the rebellious southerners prevents a decision in the electoral college? Because the Constitution provides that the choice of a Vice President in that case shall rest with the Senate, and the Senate (with at present 58 Democrats, 37 Republicans, and 1 Progressive) probably will stay Democratic no matter how the November elections may go in other respects.

Back in 1924 our antiquated electoral college system came in for the same sort of scrutiny it is receiving today. There were three candidates for the Presidency—Calvin Coolidge, John W. Davis, and the late Robert M. La Follette. As the event showed, Coolidge was never in danger, but early in the campaign there was widespread fear on the part of the Republicans that La Follette would get enough votes to keep Coolidge from a majority—266 votes—in the electoral college and so throw the election into the House.

VOTING BY STATES

The line-up in the House at that time was such that a deadlock for an indefinite period might have resulted. In the Senate, it appeared highly possible that through a combination of Democratic and insurgent Republican (La Follette) votes, the Vice Presidency would be won by the Democratic nominee, Charles W. Bryan, brother of William J.

This—in the Republican view—horrendous chance that Charlie Bryan would become acting President of the United States was exploited to the limit in G. O. P. propaganda and undoubtedly had something to do with the poor showing of both Davis and La Follette at the polls.

The Constitution provides (twelfth amendment) that when a Presidential election goes into the House, the voting there shall be not by individuals but by States. Each State has one vote, so that Nevada, for example, with only 1 Representative, has exactly the same power in the balloting as New York, with 45 Representatives.

The House must choose among the three Presidential candidates with the highest votes in the electoral college and a majority of all the States—or 25—is necessary for a choice. How a State would vote would depend on which party controlled its delegation. If a State was represented in the House by, say, 11 Republicans and 10 Democrats and all voted on party lines, the vote of that State would go to the Republican nominee.

How this arrangement would work out in practice was the subject of endless speculation in 1924. The regular Republicans controlled 22 delegations, the Democrats 20, and La Follette 1, while in 5 there was a tie between the Democrats and the Republicans. As long as the tie lasted these delegations would have been out of the voting. Neither party could count immediately on the 25 votes necessary to a choice. The chances for trading were obvious. Deaths or resignations in the tied delegations might have tipped the scales. Conceivably, the result could have been determined by a single special election to fill a House vacancy.

WITH OUTGOING HOUSE

The decision at that time would have rested with the outgoing House, and this was one of the considerations that led to the adoption of the Norris constitutional amendment, the twentieth, which abolished the short, or "lame duck," session of Congress and provided for sessions beginning each year on January 3, and for the start of the Presidential term on January 20. Until the adoption of this amendment, the Chief Magistrate of the country could have been chosen by a House which had just been repudiated at the polls.

If this condition still obtained, the election would go into a House—the present House—in which the Democrats control 22 delegations (this gives them New York, which is divided 22 and 22 between the two parties, with the American Labor representative holding the balance of power); the Republicans control 23 (though Wisconsin could be made a tie if its two Progressives voted with the Democrats); and in three States—Idaho, Washington, and West Virginia—the 2 parties cancel each other out. With this division, there would have to be a break somewhere before any candidate could get the required 25 votes.

It is anybody's guess how the next House—the one actually to make the decision in the event of electoral college impotence—will be divided. Seemingly the Republicans will gain the edge in any election close enough to permit the rebellious southern bloc to throw the Presidential contest into the House; but it should be noted that the Republicans can make very material gains in numbers in the House without greatly altering its voting complexion on a State-by-State basis.

Take Pennsylvania, for example, with 20 Republicans and 13 Democrats. The Republicans could wipe out the Democratic representation, gaining 13 seats, and yet have no more voice in the selection of a President by the House than they would have today. Or Illinois, where the Republicans could add 7 seats to the 18 they now hold and still have but one vote on the Presidency.

BALANCE OF POWER

It follows that a Republican victory which would give them control of the House would not necessarily enable them to elect a President. The balance of power might rest with the Democratic Representatives from the insurgent Southern States. Would they vote with their party colleagues, or throw the election to the Republican nominee, or continue to hold up the choice by following the example of their States' electors and voting for a third person—say Senator BYRD? A stalemate might well ensue in the House for a considerable period, with all that this would mean in the way of undercover political trading—to say nothing of the indescribable confusion into which the country would be thrown by the uncertainty.

The voting in the Senate, if the electoral college should fail to choose a Vice President, would be on the two highest candidates for that office; hence there would be a deadlock only in the event of a tie. A majority of the whole Senate, or 49, would be required for a choice. The voting would be as it is normally—by individuals. As already said, the complexion of the Senate is such that the Democratic candidate probably be chosen.

It would be an ironic outcome of the southern rebellion if it should tie up the House and thereby elevate to the headship of the Nation, for an indefinite time, a man whom the rebels condemn equally with the President—HENRY WALLACE.

The House has twice elected a President. In 1801, Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr were tied in electoral votes. The House balloted without adjournment from February 11 to 17 and on the thirty-sixth ballot chose Jefferson. Under the constitutional provision which the twelfth amendment superseded, Burr, being the second highest on the list, became Vice President.

The second election by the House was in 1825, when Andrew Jackson and John Quincy Adams were the leading contenders. Jackson had received 99 electoral votes and Adams 84. Henry Clay threw his support to Adams, who was elected and made Clay his Secretary of State.

LEGISLATURE CONTROLS

If the southern anti-Roosevelt Democrats persist in their plans they will undoubtedly bring on renewed demands for abolition of the electoral-college system in favor of a less complicated and more democratic way of choosing our Presidents and Vice Presidents.

The present system stems from the constitutional provision that in each State electors shall be chosen "in such manner as the legislature may direct" and that these electors shall meet in their respective States at an appointed time—the date this year will be December 18—and officially choose a President and Vice President. Each State has electors equal to the number of its Representatives and Senators. Their ballots will not be officially counted till after the convening of the new Congress on January 3, 1945, or less than 3 weeks before the date, January 20, set by the twentieth amendment for the beginning of the Presidential term. There is thus but a very short interval for the breaking of a possible deadlock over the Presidency in the House. The Constitution puts no brake on the power of a State legislature to prescribe the manner in which the electors shall be chosen.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST SYSTEM

Arguing more than 100 years ago for the revision of the electoral-college system, a House Member pointed out that a State legislature could legally vest appointment of the State's electors in a "board of bank directors, a turnpike corporation, or a synagogue."

In practice, rival sets of proposed electors are chosen by the State party organizations and voted upon in State-wide elections. Fifteen States in recent years, including Missouri, have eliminated the electors' names from the ballot, allowing the voters to select them simply by indicating a choice between Presidential candidates, and the same result has been accomplished in New York and Rhode Island through the use of voting machines which omit the names of the electors.

The States, however, lack the power under the Constitution to go the whole way and abolish the office of Presidential elector.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

BOARD OF SELECTMEN,
Hardwick, Mass., June 19, 1944.

To the EDITOR OF THE WORCESTER TELEGRAM,
Franklin Street, Worcester, Mass.

SIR: The Democratic voters of the Third Congressional District are getting their first vivid impressions of the character and form of a purge attempted by an outside group which attempts to purge a man from public life. The present purge assumes particular significance because it is leveled against Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of Clinton, who is recognized by Senators, Congressmen, Washington correspondents, and by the families of servicemen, and thousands of constituents in the Third District as the hardest working and the most effective Congressman sent to Washington from any Massachusetts district in the last four decades.

The test at the polls, if it may be classed as such, will neither reflect on the President to whom the Congressman has been loyal wherever the interests of the district permitted, nor upon labor whose rank and file knows of the PHILBIN traditional loyalty.

Unfortunately the interference of people from outside the district will force the present campaign to be settled on any and all but the real issues vital to the district and which an alert, responsive Congressman must always recognize. The people of the Third District are not so short of memory as to overlook the fact that their present Congressman has been identified with the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, which has made its influence felt in the State and National platforms as well as making these planks part of the statutes.

The Democratic voter who looks at the maze of charges and misrepresentations which are bound to be injected in this campaign by the invaders might find soothing relief in the documentary proof which is available and which further appraises the records of the men in Congress. A recent supplement appraises the records of all Congressmen on vital, progressive legislation.

This highly esteemed authority (the New Republic) places Congressman PHILBIN among the top four Massachusetts Congressmen whose record was predominantly progressive. This same analysis bring out in bold contrast the votes of Congressmen who had very few progressive votes and who nevertheless escaped the wrath of purgers.

On the three vital "Foreign Affairs" bills, Congressman PHILBIN is credited with progressive votes—a 100-percent record for the sane, responsible internationalism which would steer our Nation out of future wars. The Congressman's votes on social legislation and agriculture are in the majority progressive, with the votes against the O. P. A. being the exception. Would these "giant-killers" tell the voters of the third district that their Congressman should have remained indifferent when arrogant bureaucrats flaunted them in the critical periods of fuel and food shortages?

In the votes on taxes and inflationary control, Congressman PHILBIN's votes were identical with the top four and the other Massachusetts Congressmen. The vote on the Bates resolution reflected the temper of the feeling of the people of the Third District over the acute fuel shortage.

Congressman PHILBIN voted prolabor in the acid test of the Smith-Connally bill. Responsible labor men in Washington know that Congressman PHILBIN can be counted on in all legislation vital to labor.

And, finally, this appraisal of the record of Congressman PHILBIN gives him a clean bill of health on the civil liberties bills. We might add that these invaders coming from an environment where civil liberties are more honored in the breach than in the observance might be inclined to overlook the fact of Congressman PHILBIN's progressive votes on the poll tax and on the soldiers' vote bills.

From the account of the analysis prepared by the New Republic, it is clear that the motives of the men who would beat Congressman PHILBIN are not because of his lack of sympathy for labor or for the President, but more because of personal pique, jealousy, or the desire to convert our Congressman into a feeble and futile rubber stamp.

The critics of Congressman PHILBIN, if they are to deserve the right to scold an able, responsive, go-through Congressman, must be able to say something good or else detract from the esteem from their representations. They must not underestimate his valiant fight for deserved veterans' legislation; his pronounced effectiveness, even as a first-term Congressman; and his efficient staff and personal effort which accommodates well over a thousand constituents each week.

The issue is very simple. The voters will either renominate their Congressman with a record majority, or they will administer a stab-in-the-back that will not only show their ingratitude but will lose the district.

Very truly yours,

WITOLD J. MICKELK,
Selectman.

Information for Servicemen, Veterans, and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAX SCHWABE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. SCHWABE. Mr. Speaker, one of our duties here in Congress is to keep the people of our districts informed of the benefits we in Congress have made available to the service men and women, veterans and their dependents. The fact that we have received so many inquiries regarding the simplest benefits suggests to me the need of a digest of our laws relating to veterans, service people and their families, that can be used as a handy reference and can be sent by the families to their service men and women so that there may be no misunderstanding between them of the protection both have under our laws and the need for careful attention to the details and promptness in making application therefor.

One can see at a glance that the Government of the United States is liberal with those who are wearing and have worn the uniform of their country; our servicemen are the best paid and the best equipped in the world; our veterans and their dependents receive more adequate care than any others in the world. Because of the different kind of warfare which has developed, the needs will change and many future requirements will have to be met, but up to the present time I think we have provided very handsomely for our service families. We have a special duty to both our veterans and their dependents, to help them readjust their lives to the new conditions that have been imposed upon them. I am very proud that I have had a small part in providing these advantages, especially the educational features, in my work as a member of the Education Committee of the House of Representatives.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES FOR DEPENDENTS

Dependents of all grades of enlisted men and aviation cadets of the Army and Navy are eligible to receive a dependent's allowance from the Government in addition to the serviceman's allotment. Those men and women serving as officers come under another system. The allowances provided by the Government are as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife and one child, $72, and $20 for each additional child. Note: If the divorce or separation order of the court does not call for alimony or separate maintenance, the wife will not receive any allotment, and in case of a court order providing alimony or separate maintenance, she will get no more than the amount fixed by the court.

Class B dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is substantially but not completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37.

Class B–1 dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $50 plus $11 for each brother or sister; two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $68 plus $11 for each brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

It is important that men and women with dependents make application through their commanding officers for allotment and allowance, as these benefits will begin the date application is filed. Allotments are compulsory only for class A dependents. If the service man or woman for some reason or other fails to make application or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out; the Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife and children and dates of birth. In case a man is reported missing in action, the allotment and allowance continue to be paid for a period of a year, unless in the meantime his status is definitely determined.

Parents and brothers and sisters who can prove dependency can receive an allowance at the same time as wife and children. Parents can get an allowance from more than one son or daughter in the service. For instance, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son or daughter in the service, they get $68 per month. Now, if another son or daughter in the service helped support these same parents, they can get another $37 from the second son or daughter.

The agency for the Navy having jurisdiction over allotments and allowances is: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.; the agency for the Army is: Office of Dependency Benefits, War Department, 213 Washington St., Newark, N. J. If you experience any difficulty, contact your Congressman.

TEMPORARY AID FOR DEPENDENTS OF SERVICEMEN

Sometimes cases of extreme hardship arise involving dependents of servicemen. Many dependents, and even members of the armed forces themselves are not fully acquainted with the two emergency agencies set up for the express purpose of helping such persons in need. These two agencies have branches all over the country. They are the Army Emergency Relief Fund, whose functions have recently been assigned to the Red Cross, and the Navy Relief Society, which also can be reached through the Red Cross.

Any member of the armed forces in the Army can appeal to the Army Relief Fund, represented in all camps, or through the Red Cross if the soldier is not at camp, for needed immediate financial assistance. He will receive courteous and willing assistance at all times. The fund is also open to all dependents of men and women in the Army and anyone needing relief should get in touch at once with this fund through the local Red Cross.

Any serviceman or servicewoman in our naval forces or his dependents can appeal to this agency for urgent financial assistance. To get immediate action, it is advisable to take the case up through the Red Cross.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

This benefit is payable to all honorably discharged personnel of our services whose rank is below captain in the Army, and lieutenant senior grade in the Navy. Payments are made in the following sums: Personnel with less than 60 days' active service, $100; personnel with 60 days or more active service none of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $200; personnel with 60 days or more active service, any part of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $300. Whenever mustering-out payments amounts to more than $100, payments are made in monthly intervals of $100 each. Servicemen who are discharged at their own request are not entitled to muster-out pay.

FREE MEDICAL AND NURSING CARE FOR WIVES AND INFANTS OF MEN IN OUR ARMED FORCES

Under this plan a wife of any man in service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service. If the doctor does not have these blanks, write to the Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Missouri State Board of Health, Jefferson City, Mo., and ask them to send a blank to you. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2 at once and send it immediately to Jefferson City for approval. It is important that wives apply for this in early pregnancy; the State board of health will not approve payment of the doctor, hospital, or any service, before the application is made out. In the case of emergency, be sure that the doctor makes application for you within 48 hours after service is rendered. If the application is not made within 48 hours, no bills for medical or hospital service will be paid. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse; no money is given to the wife. This service is extended to wives and infants of servicemen in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska, but not to any other foreign country.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY PENSIONS

Our honorably discharged veterans of all wars are entitled to a pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by their service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10-percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as a hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month.

The disability claim is filed by the veteran for benefits payable to him as the result of injury or disease resulting from military service. The award of compensation is based on the degree of disability which is determined according to the Veterans' Administration schedule provisions. Any disability, except misconduct, is compensable if it is as much as 10-percent disabling. This application is known as form 526. It is simple to execute and seldom does one have any trouble answering the questions. Additional evidence is seldom required. This is particularly true on the adjudication of the initial claim. No subsequent formal claim need be filed. If the veteran is dissatisfied with his present rating, he can submit medical evidence to this effect.

However, it should be borne in mind that the doctor's statement must state not only his diagnosis but sufficient findings to warrant it. It is essential that this evidence show, or at least indicate, a higher degree of disability than the present evaluation. Upon receipt of competent medical evidence, the Veterans' Claim Service will authorize an official physical examination for rating purposes, thereby reopening the case for further consideration.

Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred from one Veterans' Administration facility to another, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for settlement, veterans should file claim on proper form which will be supplied them by any Veterans' Administration facility, or the local representative of the American Red Cross. If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

READJUSTMENT TO CIVIL LIFE

Education: One of the provisions of the so-called G. I. bill of rights offers an education to any man who served for a period of 90 days, on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice, up to $500 per year for tuition and books, and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if single and $75 if he has dependents. In no event shall the total period of education exceed 4 years. There is also a provision for part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

A veteran also has the right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities, extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

Application for education and training should be made to the Director, Servicemen's Education and Training, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

Loans for the purchase or construction of houses, farms, and business property: Loans provided for the above-mentioned purposes or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000. Loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions. The interest rate must not exceed 4 percent. The loan must be practicable and suitable to veterans' circumstances. The loan must be repaid in 20 years. Application must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

Employment of veterans: A veteran of any war, honorably discharged from any one of the services, has the right to register for employment and for placement in employment by the Veterans' Employment Service. He should contact his local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

Unemployment compensation: There is also a provision for unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed. To be eligible, the person must reside in the United States; be completely unemployed, or if partially unemployed, at wages less than $23 per week; be registered with and report to a public employment office; be able to work and available for suitable work.

Any person will be disqualified if he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; if he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work offered; if he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; if he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage.

BENEFITS FOR DEPENDENTS AS A RESULT OF LOSS OF SON, DAUGHTER, HUSBAND, OR FATHER

There are four money benefits provided for the dependents of a deceased veteran: 6 months' gratuity payment, monthly insurance payments (if the serviceman applied for insurance), monthly pension, and back pay.

Gratuity: The gratuity is a lump-sum payment equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received at the date of death. In addition, the dependents of any private or seaman who dies in foreign service receive 20 percent of his base bay, and the dependents of any officer who dies in foreign service receive 10 percent of his base pay. If the serviceman was in either the flying service or submarine service, his dependents receive, in addition, 50 percent of his base pay. There is also a longevity provision in addition to the above amounts.

The gratuity is automatically paid to a wife of a deceased veteran, or if there is no wife, it is automatically paid to the surviving child or children. It is not automatically paid to parents or brothers or sisters of an unmarried serviceman. The serviceman should designate some one of this latter class to receive it; however, if he does not, they may apply for it. If two parents survive, the amount is divided between them. A grandparent must show an insurable interest in order to receive it.

Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to: Gratuity Pay Branch, Finance Office, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Monthly insurance payments: This insurance is not paid in a lump sum; it is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary—the older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy a beneficiary over 30 years of age will receive $55.51 a month for 240 months. A beneficiary over 30 years of age will get a guaranteed 120 equal installments—and if they survive beyond 120 months it is paid for life. Under a $10,000 policy, a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will get $35.10 monthly, and so forth.

It would be well to have parents and next of kin check with the men and women in service to see that all insurance policies are in order and in the hands of the beneficiaries. An insurance policy taken out by men and women in service can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister, including those of half blood. There is nothing to prevent a parent or brother or sister from being the beneficiary of more than one serviceman.

All dependents and next of kin ought to check their insurance policy now. See that everything is in order now. It might save a lot of grief in the future. Negligence has caused many a beneficiary to lose out. A little care can avoid a lot of trouble should anything happen. I would suggest that you send your serviceman this pamphlet so that he may check all matters pertaining to his beneficiaries.

Monthly pension: This pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, they are not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased serviceman can get a pension at the same time his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 a month. Two parents, $25 each. Widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child. No widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38; no widow but two children, $33 equally divided, with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100.

The fact that a widow, a child, or parent gets the insurance, does not prevent them from getting a pension also. They can collect both insurance and a pension.

Back pay due the serviceman: When a casualty occurs, that serviceman or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. All this back pay is paid to the nearest heir. Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to: Finance Officer, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Headstone for grave: Any person may make application for a headstone for the grave of any veteran of any one of the Army or Navy services whose service was honorable, to the Quartermaster General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Burial allowance for any war veteran: After honorable service, reimbursement for burial may be allowed, not exceeding $100, on burial, funeral, and transportation expenses. Application should be made to Director, Dependent Claims Service, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C.

Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, his minor children or adult unmarried daughters.

WRITE FOR OTHER INFORMATION

It is exceedingly difficult to cover all the details of benefits available to veterans of this and previous wars. I have tried to sketch briefly the benefits particularly relating to World War No. 2, as many pamphlets have been printed covering the provisions for veterans of other wars. I merely offer this digest as a guide to servicemen, veterans, and their dependents. If anyone has special questions or individual problems not covered in this summary, I suggest you write to me personally, to the following address: MAX SCHWABE, Room 334, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Permanent Nurse Corps in the Veterans' Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I introduced the following bill in an effort to secure an adequate nursing staff to care for our disabled veterans:

A bill by Mrs. ROGERS to provide for the establishment of a permanent nurse corps in the Veterans' Administration

Be it enacted, etc., That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, hereinafter referred to as the Administrator, is authorized and directed to establish in the Veterans' Administration a permanent Nurse Corps to be known as the Veterans' Administration Nurse Corps and hereinafter referred to as the Nurse Corps.

SEC. 2. The Nurse Corps shall consist of the following members: 1 superintendent of nurses with the rank of colonel; 6 officers with the rank of lieutenant colonel; 73 officers with the rank of major; 160 officers with the rank of captain; 800 officers with the rank of first lieutenant; 15,000 officers with the rank of second lieutenant, and such other commissioned, noncommissioned, enlisted personnel and civilian employees as may be deemed necessary by the Administrator.

SEC. 3. The superintendent of the Nurse Corps shall be appointed by the President, upon the recommendation of the Administrator, and shall be responsible to the Administrator for the nurse service of the Veterans' Administration.

SEC. 4. After the original appointment to the grade of superintendent of the Nurse Corps, a vacancy occurring in that grade shall be filled by appointment from members of the Nurse Corps who have served not less than 2 years in the grade of lieutenant colonel.

SEC. 5. No commissioned officer shall be appointed in the Nurse Corps or promoted to a higher grade or rank until his or her professional, mental, moral, and physical fitness to perform all the duties of the assigned rank or grade have been established to the satisfaction of a board consisting of Corps members to be appointed by the Administrator in accordance with regulations to be promulgated by him.

SEC. 6. The rates of pay and allowances, increase of pay, transportation of property, retirement or pension benefits, rights under the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, entitlement to hospitalization and other gratuities and privileges for commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Nurse Corps shall be identical with those provided for personnel of the corresponding rank and status in the United States Army.

SEC. 7. Members of the Nurse Corps may purchase commissary or other supplies in or through the Veterans' Administration, the War and Navy Departments in accordance with regulations to be jointly promulgated by the Administrator, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, under as nearly the same conditions as are practicable and as are applicable to members of the Regular Establishment.

SEC. 8. The Administrator shall prescribe the rules and regulations governing the conduct of personnel and regulations respecting the internal administration of the nurses.

SEC. 9. The Administrator shall establish and maintain a Nurse Reserve Corps of officers and enlisted personnel to which there shall be appointed such nurses as are found qualified on examination in such numbers and ranks as are deemed necessary by the Administrator to fill any vacancies or meet any emergent conditions. Members of the Nurse Reserve Corps may be assigned to active duty whenever needed, and any member of the Nurse Corps may be transferred to the Reserve for any period during which his or her services on active duty are not required. Regulations may provide for longevity and other credits for service in the Reserve as well as active service in the Nurse Corps.

SEC. 10. The superintendent of nurses, under such regulations as the Administrator shall prescribe, shall from time to time appoint a board of not less than three nor more than five officers of the Nurse Corps to determine charges of inaptitude, inefficiency, or misconduct of any member of the Nurse Corps, and if such charge or charges are sustained shall recommend reduction in grade, retirement, or discharge from the Nurse Corps of such member. Any member so discharged for inefficiency or inaptitude shall be entitled to one month's pay at the rate of pay in effect at the time of discharge for every completed year of service in the Nurse Corps not in excess of 6 years, but no additional pay shall be allowed to a member discharged because of misconduct.

SEC. 11. Commissioned officers and enlisted personnel of the Nurse Corps may be detailed for service with the Nurse Corps of the Army or the Navy, and commissioned or enlisted nurses of the Army and Navy may be detailed for service with the Nurse Corps of the Veterans' Administration when such detail will promote the public interests without, however, in any wise impairing the efficiency of the service for the purpose for which the same was created and is maintained.

SEC. 12. The Administrator, in his discretion, may grant members of the Nurse Corps leave of absence for 30 days per annum, without deduction of pay. Such leave may accumulate annually for a period not in excess of 3 months.

SEC. 13. The Administrator, upon recommendation of the superintendent of nurses, may employ such personnel in addition to the personnel of the Nurse Corps on a full time, part time, or fee basis at such rates of pay as he may prescribe.

SEC. 14. The Nurse Corps shall be entitled to use the insignia of service and rank as may be prescribed by the Administrator, and the appropriations of the Veterans' Administration shall be available for the expenses deemed necessary and appropriate to carry out these and other provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. The Administrator is authorized to enter into agreements or contracts with the War Department and the Navy Department for the purchase of uniforms, accouterments, equipment, and other supplies for the Nurse Corps.

SEC. 16. Appointments to the Nurse Corps shall be made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Administrator and without reference to other laws pertaining to civil-service employees of the United States, except that appointment of a member in the Nurse Corps shall not be construed as depriving any member of the Nurse Corps of any rights or the continuance of any rights which such member may have secured or may hereafter secure as a civil-service employee.

SEC. 17. All acts or parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby modified accordingly.

Keep the Record Straight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OREN HARRIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. HARRIS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by Britain's Minister of Production, Capt. Oliver Lyttelton, of the inner war cabinet, on Tuesday, June 20, 1944, was the most ridiculous and insidious that has been made, in my opinion, by a responsible person during this terrible and tragic war.

At an American Chamber of Commerce luncheon, he said in referring to lend-lease: "Japan was provoked into attacking the American at Pearl Harbor. It is a travesty on history ever to say that America was forced into the war. Everyone knows where American sympathies were. It is incorrect to say that America was ever truly neutral even before America came into the war on an all-out fighting basis."

It is inconceivable that a member of the inner war cabinet or any person with a responsibility would willfully and intentionally make such a misstatement of facts. It is a travesty on the purposes for which we are fighting to make such an incorrect statement.

Anyone who knows anything about the history of the Japanese aggression and attitude toward this country knows the statement was wholly incorrect and unjustified. Everyone knows of the Japanese aggression that started in 1931. The efforts of this country to keep the world at peace are also known by everyone who has followed these developments.

Japan has through these years deliberately pursued her notorious conquest which ended with the unpardonable attack on Pearl Harbor. Secretary Hull correctly denounced the statement immediately and though the people of America view the statement as idle talk and incorrect, it is unfortunate that it was ever made.

The Washington Post of today has a very good editorial expressing a practical view as well as a clear one, and I include it herewith:

FAUX PAS

There were grounds for Secretary Hull's indignation over Mr. Oliver Lyttelton's speech in London. Mr. Lyttelton, who is Britain's Minister of Production, and a member of the War Cabinet, said that "Japan was provoked into attacking the Americans at Pearl Harbor." The observation was subsequently amended, but the damage had been done. Mr. Lyttelton, who ought to have more common sense and more political sense, merely repeated a piece of foolishness which the bitter-enders toward the President used to utter. They had been silenced by facts which would convince a school boy. Thus the prospect had been opened up in the last few weeks that there would be no dissension on issues of either war or foreign policy in the coming campaign. Obviously Mr. Hull, who has been laboring patiently in the last 6 months to take foreign policy out of politics, could not allow the Lyttelton remark to go by without instant repudiation.

The long history of Japan's aggressions since the invasion of Manchuria in 1931 is a rebuttal of Mr. Lyttelton's assertion. Japan by that act flouted the Kellogg Pact. Secretary Stimson even at that time wanted to take action in defense of American interests. The Nine Power Pact was the next multilateral arrangement to go into the discard. Japan likewise tore up her arms agreements with this country. In addition, the war lords started to move the Nipponese armies into China proper and didn't stop till they were at Camrah Bay, whence they overlooked the Philippines. In the process, American lives and property and even warships were attacked. Japan, indeed, had closed almost all the accesses to the Pacific when this country began to take alarm. Then, in response to public pressure, we clapped embargoes on American exports to Japan, and war became inevitable.

Mr. Churchill is reputed to have wondered only a short while before Pearl Harbor when the United States would wake up to the Japanese menace and take military as well as economic action. Pearl Harbor supplied the awakener. It was all of a piece with a campaign of aggression which, as the Japanese themselves aren't loath to admit, was intended to make the Pacific a Japanese lake. Mr. Matsuoka, when he was foreign minister of Japan just before war broke out, outlined the great Japan as including all of Oceania as well as the "coprosperity sphere" of half of Asia. That in all these circumstances Japan can be held to have been "provoked" into action at Pearl Harbor is a gross misreading of history.

My Record in Opposing F. E. P. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Committee on Labor is now conducting hearings on the Scanlon bill (H. R. 3986) to make permanent the so-called Fair Employment Practice Committee, commonly referred to as F. E. P. C. I desire to go on record as being utterly opposed to any such legislation and expect to fight it with all the force at my command.

I think the committee would better serve the public interest and the unity now so much needed in the war effort if it would abandon any such effort and announce to the Congress and the country that the States and local governments are ready, willing, and able to fairly and equitably adjust all problems regarding fair employment of their citizens.

The present agitation is incubating and promoting race feeling and prejudice rather than discouraging it. The people of the South are a just and fair people. In my section white and colored people have lived and worked together in harmony and contentment for many years, under existing segregation laws which must not be changed. If the uplifters and bureaucrats will leave us alone, we will work out the problem in fairness and justice to all.

I also oppose and bitterly resent the procedure recently resorted to in this House to tack the so-called F. E. P. C. as a rider on to a necessary and essential war appropriation bill. I protest the parliamentary tactics employed. Same was confusing and calculated to mislead the reading public. Some newspapers of high standing carried stories that did not reflect the true situation. I spoke with vigor against that item and voted against it at every opportunity.

I was one of those who demanded a roll call record vote on the Tarver amendment, which was denied. I still hope the Senate will strike out F. E. P. C. and I will continue to work and vote against it if the bill comes to the House.

The remarks which I made in the House denouncing F. E. P. C. just before the Tarver amendment was voted on to deny it any funds was as follows:

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I think the gentleman from Georgia has made a very excellent statement. I shall vote for his amendment to strike out the entire appropriation for the Committee on Fair Employment Practice. I think this organization has committed some violent abuses and, as the gentleman says, has rendered a disservice, and created a disunity in time of war. In addition to specific instances of meddling cited, I have in mind the instance of the Dallas News, wherein the Dallas News advertised, "Wanted: Colored man." And this organization, the Committee on Fair Employment Practice, took that up with the Dallas News and said they had no right to use the word "colored" in an advertisement, that it was discriminatory as to race, and demanded that this ad should not be used. The News wanted a colored man, and not a white man, for a particular job; but they must not so advertise for fear of offending the colored race. An agency which has no more sense than that should be abolished. (P. 5029, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 26, 1944.)

Speaking of fair practice, I want the record to show, and every Member of this House will bear me witness, that I was one of those who voted to strike out the F. E. P. C. item when we lost by four votes, and yet certain persons with selfish interest, opposed to me in my district, are deliberately seeking to misrepresent my record and leave the impression that I voted for the F. E. P. C. There is not one word of truth in this statement and the voters will not be deceived by any such unfair practice or tactics. The people I represent believe in and practice fair play.

I did, on final passage, vote for the war appropriation bill which carried over a billion dollars for 16 essential war agencies, and made funds available for our fighting men all over the world, the major part of which was for ships to transport our armed forces and take their supplies. The vote on the war appropriation bill was 247 for and 58 against. Judge TARVER, of Georgia, the author of the amendment to strike F. E. P. C. from the bill, and who led the fight, was one of those who voted as I did, as did a majority of those who voted for the Tarver amendment. I am proud of that vote for the war appropriation bill and willing to defend it. I also take pride in my record of having supported the war policies, and the appropriations to carry them out 100 percent. This course I shall continue to pursue until the war is won and peace is restored. I shall continue to place the necessities of war above every other consideration. I shall continue to work and vote for returning service men and women and help to see to it that they are provided with hospitalization, compensation, employment, and education. I was one of those who gave active support to the recent G. I. bill which was sponsored by the American Legion.

When the armistice comes, as we all hope and pray it will soon, I shall devote my best efforts to the adoption of a treaty insuring, if possible, an enduring peace.

I am one of those who believe that had we followed the advice of Woodrow Wilson, our boys would not now be fighting in every corner of the world. I want to make certain this time that the boys of the next generation do not have to undergo the same experience. I am ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Furthermore, under appointment by Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, I served for many months on a committee who have been working on a post-war foreign policy. My experiences on both these committees will enable me to make a contribution in planning for a just and lasting peace. This I would prefer to do above all else.

Evasion of Hog-Marketing Regulations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions:

EVASION OF HOG-MARKETING REGULATIONS

Whereas we, the undersigned local representatives of the United States Department of Agriculture, acting under instructions from our superior officers, in 1943 urged farmers to maintain a high rate of pork production as a patriotic duty, assured that they would at least receive the Federal W. F. A. floor price for their hogs; and

Whereas farmers did respond by producing for the 1943–44 market one of the country's largest hog crops; and

Whereas farmers in marketing their crop have been forced to accept prices much below the floor price established for the area and promised them by the Government; and

Whereas farmers have been obliged to submit to unusual, unorthodox, and unethical practices on the part of buyers in their

(buyers) effort to bypass the intent of the floor regulations; and

Whereas pork products are retailed to consumers on the basis of O. P. A. ceiling prices independent of prices paid to the farmer; and

Whereas packers are subsidized $1.30 per hundredweight on all pork products slaughtered (regardless of weights) to enable them to pay floor prices or better for live hogs: Be it hereby

Resolved, That we, the undersigned members of the United States Department of Agriculture War Board for Lagrange County, Ind., petition the respective Federal authorities in charge:

First. To keep faith with hog producers by making the support prices apply to all weights of hogs thereby eliminating "floor dodging."

Second. To provide that packers who resort to unusual practices not common prior to floor regulations, thereby securing unusual shrink in weight or otherwise evading the intent of the floor's objective, be made to disqualify themselves for subsidy payments in so doing;

Third. To investigate the hog-marketing system in this area; to withhold subsidies past due from all packers who have in any way evaded, or colluded with others to evade the intent and purpose of the floor; and to make the withholding retroactive on all such evasion purchases; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the War Food Administration, the Office of Price Administration, the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress for this county, the National and State United States Department of Agriculture War Boards.

PRICE DISCRIMINATION AGAINST NORTHEASTERN INDIANA HOGS

Whereas W. F. A. hog price ceiling for the northeastern Indiana area are 10 cents per hundredweight lower than are the ceilings for the central Indiana area; and

Whereas the hogs from the two areas are consigned largely to the same eastern packers; and

Whereas the hogs from the two areas are believed to be of the same grade and quality; and

Whereas the freight rates from the two areas to slaughterers are practically identical; and

Whereas W. F. A. ceilings are said to have been determined on the market histories of the respective areas, indicating a long time discrimination against the northeastern Indiana area: Be it hereby

Resolved, That we, the undersigned members of the United States Department of Agriculture War Board, for LaGrange County, Ind., petition the Federal Office of Price Administration, the War Food Administration, and the Director of the Purdue University Agricultural Experiment Station, to (1) establish the cause or causes for discrimination in price against hogs marketed from the northeastern Indiana area, and (2) that State and Federal agencies with authority take the necessary action to correct and eliminate said discrimination in price ceilings and market practices; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be submitted to all Federal and State agencies concerned, and to the press.

OSCAR I. CHRISTNER,
Chairman, LaGrange County Agricultural Adjustment Association.

County Agent, Cooperative Agricultural Extension Service.

Finland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN B. BENNETT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that our State Department found it necessary to dismiss Hjalmar Procope, the Minister of Finland, for activities on his part said to be "inimical to the United States." No Bill of Particulars of the charges were made public and I am not able to conclude upon what basis such charges were made. Furthermore, I am a plain citizen and not a diplomat and have never been able to understand the intricacies and niceties of diplomatic maneuvering. I am very certain, however, that diplomatic maneuevering is the thing that lost the peace for us at Versailles and is very likely to lose it for us again if our dealings with other nations are based upon diplomatic horse trading instead of direct, outspoken, and straightforward action.

There is no substitute for straightforward dealing between nations, no matter what terminology you apply to such relations. Diplomats usually speak a strange tongue and in a manner calculated not to be understood by the common citizen, and sometimes I fear that such language is even misunderstood by members of their own cult. In any event, their pronouncements are usually couched in vague and complex verbiage, capable of interpretation or misinterpretation, as the case may be, by the diplomats to whom they are directed, while the average person is rarely able to do more than guess at their meaning. The world's diplomats of today have done an excellent job of confusing the aims and ideals for which we fight in this war.

Under diplomatic interpretation it is possible for Russia, who is an ally in our war against the Nazis, to remain friendly with Japan, an equally deadly enemy of this country. While I do not speak as an expert, the tremendous advantage that would accrue to us in our fight in the Pacific were Russia to break off friendly relations with Japan, is not disputable. How many American lives this action would save and how much it would shorten the war no one can say with certainty. But it is reasonably certain that such action on the part of Russia would be of inestimable benefit to us. Mr. Stalin, however, has very little interest in our fight in the Pacific because he knows it is a job we will have to finish with or without assistance.

Everyone agrees on the desirability of getting Finland out of the war. The Finns themselves would like to be at peace. This war has not been of their choosing, as they were forced into it by the war machines of two equally ruthless aggressors. To say that Finland should withdraw from the war on terms that mean her complete annihilation as a sovereign state, is like saying that peace is desirable even though it means the complete enslavement of the nation and its people. No nation in Europe outranks Finland in its fair and honest dealings with this country. They are a plain, honorable people. They want nothing more than to be left alone so that they may live a peaceful, democratic existence and keep the sovereignty of their government and its people intact. Surely, they are entitled to this fundamental birthright of free people everywhere.

Industrial Survey and Statistical Data on Cleveland and Cuyahoga County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, the city of Cleveland, Ohio, could well be the industrial heart of America, situated as it is just halfway between the Pittsburgh-Youngstown district and the Detroit-Toledo district.

The Great Lakes district has produced a third of all the war and combat equipment for our armed forces.

Aggregate war contracts of the Nation up to May 1, 1944, totaled $189,471,000,000 and the Great Lakes district turned out $61,258,000,000 of this vast production for war.

The share of the Cleveland community proper is an outstanding achievement in the world-wide battle of production.

Although this is a global salt-water war, Cleveland has made a remarkable record in the production of various types of ships and maritime equipment. It has produced $1,100,000,000 worth to help keep our flag flying in all corners of the world seas. Cleveland-made mine sweepers and subchasers are helping to fight the Axis on all the far-flung battle fronts.

Industrial equipment produced here for our armed forces amounts to $1,417,- 000,000. Of aircraft and aircraft parts, the city has had awards totaling $956,000,000.

Ordnance contracts total $766,000,000, and other supplemental contracts, $248,000,000.

This makes a grand total (as of May 1, 1944) of $4,487,000,000. Almost 84 percent of this vast total is for expendable material in the Army or Navy service.

Besides its hundreds of small shops and factories, Cleveland has 306 plants employing 100 to 500 people, 55 plants employing 500 to 1,000, and 57 plants employing over 1,000.

Forty-two new plants were started in 1943, using 196,660 square feet of floor space and 259 old plants added 1,923,568 square feet of space at a cost of $22,568,816.

Fifteen Cleveland factories are making landing-craft parts.

Below are the industrial statistics for the last 4 years:

	Workers	Pay roll	Product value
1940	147,000	$221,250,000	$1,165,000,000
1941	185,770	338,038,240	1,674,000,000
1942	216,000	413,100,000	2,175,000,000
1943	247,000	600,000,000	3,100,000,000

It is interesting to note that while from 1940–43 the number of workers increased only 69 percent, production and pay rolls nearly tripled.

Another interesting fact is that in the first 4 months of 1943, Cleveland workers produced more than they did in the entire year of 1940.

These things should be a source of pride to every Clevelander and to labor especially.

The Pabst Post-war Employment Awards Contest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following plan on post-war employment submitted by W. E. Greenway, 123 Bellevue North, Seattle, Wash.:

The plan herewith submitted provides for post-war employment, the conserving of our natural resources, the buying and the storing of material from other countries that may be necessary for a prolonged war and the keeping of the United States in a state of almost instant readiness to repel invasion by a foreign foe.

It is now known by many that our boasted unlimited natural resources are not unlimited but are being rapidly exhausted.

Our better grades of coal may not last for another century. The same may be said of our iron, copper, lead, zinc, and many other minerals so necessary for a prolonged war. Our forests are being depleted. Everything that might be used from them is not being used. Much useful material is being left to rot on the ground.

An intelligent way must be found to conserve our natural resources, if for no other reason than because of military necessity.

We have been forced to call upon all classes of our citizens to bear arms or to work in essential war industries. We have discovered that millions of our men and women are not up to physical standard because of undernourishment, lack of education, or lack of training in the arts and sciences.

As a military necessity it behooves the United States to see to it that our men and women are always in good health. The Army and Navy medical staffs should have the care of our citizens and provide medical and dental care at Federal expense. Those who prefer to employ private physicians should not be denied that right, but, nevertheless, always subject to Federal supervision.

To be in a position to repel invasion, we need millions of trained workers, soldiers, sailors, and professional men and women. It shuld be the duty of the Federal Government to provide for the education and training of artisians, scientists, physicians, dentists, and specialists. Those undergoing training should be supported by the Federal Government. Private schools that comply with Federal regulations should be encouraged and open to all who elect to use them.

It should be the settled policy of the Federal Government not to permit the exporting of any raw material nor manufactured article that may cause a shortage in the event of another war.

Tin and other metals of which we are short, rubber and other vegetable products such as quinine, etc., should be bought in large quantities by the Federal Government and stored in suitable places as a reserve to be used in national emergencies.

Coal, oil, iron, copper, zinc, and other minerals should be held in reserve ready to be used in the event of another war. Substitutes should be used wherever possible. The manufacturing of subsitutes and the gathering and raising of substitute materials will give employment to thousands. The Federal Government should buy coal, oil, and forest lands and hold them in reserve.

It will be cheaper in the long run for the American people to have to pay more for substitutes than to import substances from abroad. We should import crude rubber in large quantities, yet we also should manufacture synthetic rubber. Import taxes can equalize the costs of substitutes and help support the Government.

It is not seriously disputed that for years previous to this World War No. 2, millions of our people were unemployed, or employed at substandard wages, or worse, were forced to apply for public work which was but a poor substitute for doles.

All American workers should be paid living wages. With that end in view, a United States Labor Board should be established. Its duties to be the setting wages for every worker in America. The Labor Board should invite representatives of unions to meet with representatives of nonunion workers and employers of labor. The first duty of those so meeting is to decide what is a fair living wage to be paid to the humblest adult men and women workers. Next will come the fixing of fair wages for skilled workers, specialists, scientists, physicians, dentists, and teachers and white-collar workers. The findings of the Labor Board to be published and in such manner that all Americans may be able to compare the wages to be received by the many classes of American workers. The findings of the Labor Board to become the law of the land. Of course the United States Labor Board may revise the rates from time to time when injustice seems to have been done. But the revisions must apply to all workers in that class.

Forty-four weeks of 40 hours each shall be considered a fair year's work for an American worker. In time when America is rehabilitated, the working hours per week may be reduced with the end in view of keeping all workers employed.

Workers should be encouraged to form themselves into unions. Production in the United States will be best served when almost every worker is a member of a union. The first and the most important service unions can perform for their members is to represent them before the United States Labor Board. When the rates of wages to be paid to all workers have been set, unions should insist that their members receive that rate of pay. Grievances of workers should be handled by unions if the workers are organized. Working conditions, housing, safety devices, medical and dental care, eating houses (if provided by their employers) and the educational facilities for the children of the workers and recreational facilities are all proper subjects that can best be obtained when insisted upon by unions. Complaints of workers when not adjusted between workers and their employers should be settled by the United States Labor Board and decisions reached without undue delay.

Until the huge American war debts are paid, all able-bodied Americans should do their share in the essential work to be done to make the United States ready for another war. Workers may quit their employment at their option, but must find other work considered essential to future war efforts or for the general welfare. If America is to be put in a position to repel invasion, it will take years of work by all. We must all work for the next few years.

The staffs of engineers and assistants of the Army, Navy, Air Forces, and other departments of the Federal Government should immediately be greatly enlarged. All the engineers who can be spared from our present war efforts should be set at work surveying and planning for thousands of miles of trunk highways and have some of the plans ready when peace is restored. This one effort will give employment to millions of our workers released from the armed services.

Other engineers should draw plans after surveying possible dam sites for hydroelectric development. When a plant is completed and the necessary power lines installed and equipped and current is ready for delivery, then the people who reside in such areas should be restricted in their use of oil and coal as fuel as a conservation measure. The Federal Government to own and operate the lines and plants and sell the current at cost plus a retirement sum necessary to repay the Government for the money spent in providing such facilities. Coal and oil must be reserved in sufficient quantities to meet the requirement of our armed forces in the event of a blockade. The manufacturing of the articles necessary to put the road building and the hydroelectric schemes in operation will give work to millions.

Every American worker is entitled to decent living quarters. Slums must be abolished. If their owners will not abolish them, then the Government must compete with them. If that is not always practical then slum dwellings should be bought by the Federal Government after an appraisal, then demolished and decent housing erected in their places.

Rentals for housing of workers to be fair and just to both tenant and owners. Costs, facilities, services, and maintenance to be considered. Housing for the lowest paid workers to be provided first.

Industries employing many workers should be as near as possible to the source of supply of the largest amounts of raw materials to be used.

The retail sale prices of food, clothing, and other necessities of the American people should be fixed by the Federal Government. Prices must be such as to insure the paying of the established rates of wages and also to permit a reasonable profit to farmers, merchants, manufacturers, and all others who render essential services toward producing and keeping up sufficient supplies of such things.

The very old, the very young, and those unable to work because of illness or other disabilities should not be permitted to suffer. They should be assisted from Federal Social Security funds.

A Social Security Board should be established to collect at the source from workers and others, funds to maintain the necessary training facilities for all Americans who care to use them. It will be the duty of the Social Security Board to provide the money necessary to pay for the medical and dental care of all Americans who need such care and are unable to pay for them. But none are to be denied the right to employ their own physicians and dentists.

Private property rights must be respected and private industry encouraged. But nothing is to be permitted that will hinder preparations for the defense of our country nor that is detrimental to the general welfare.

The Federal Government must insist that neither race, color, nor religion shall be permitted to affect the rights and opportunities of American citizens.

Tragedy of Versailles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. JONES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by William C. Bullitt from Life for March 27, 1944:

TRAGEDY OF VERSAILLES—A VETERAN OF THE CONFERENCE OF 1919 ANALYZES THE MISTAKES OF THE LAST PEACE

(By William C. Bullitt)

It is a tale that is told, from which we may draw the knowledge and comprehension needed for the future. The disproportion between the quarrels of nations and the suffering which fighting out those quarrels involves; the poor and barren prizes which reward sublime endeavor on the battlefield; the fleeting triumphs of war; the long, slow rebuilding; the awful risks so hardily run; the doom missed by a hair's breadth, by the spin of a coin, by the accident of an accident—all this should make the prevention of another great war the main preoccupation of mankind.—Winston Churchill, 1929.

The Treaty of Versailles at the close of the last World War established an uneasy armistice—not peace. Nations learn by trial and error. Can we learn from the errors of those who made the Treaty of Versailles any lesson which may help us to establish at the close of the present war a peace which may endure?

He who attempts to answer this question honestly must confess that, at best, he can bring only a small light into the darkness which shrouds the present and the future of mankind. Since the outbreak of the war in 1914 the speed of change in human life has become too great, the pattern of evolution and revolution too intricate, for a finite mind to comprehend.

Man's control over the forces of inanimate nature has been increasing with incredible speed; but man has acquired little, if any, increased control over the forces of his own nature. In the laboratories of the world new instruments of war—like the atomic bomb—are being perfected; instruments which will make the largest blockbuster of the present day seem a child's toy. If man cannot increase his control over the envy, hatred, malice, and cruelty that well up within his own nature, he will use his increasing control over the forces of inanimate nature to destroy the major portion of the human race and all the fairest creations of civilization.

This moral question underlies all problems of enduring peace and no finite intelligence can answer it. Easy answers can be given by glib columnists and clever propagandists; but in truth, the pattern is understood by God alone.

Was there ever a chance, then, that the Peace Conference of Paris which produced the Treaty of Versailles might have created an enduring peace?

These seemed to be a chance. World conditions were extraordinarily favorable. Germany, Austria-Hungry, and Russia had all been defeated and were all powerless. Italy was a great power of the second rank, and her Christian tradition had not been perverted by Mussolini. Japan was also a power of the second rank and was stepping softly, subtly, toward her distant objective of conquering China and controlling the Pacific. Force, overwhelming force, was in the hands of the United States, Great Britain, and France. They were all democracies. Their peoples were deeply and sincerely devoted to liberty, democracy, and peace. And their leaders—Woodrow Wilson, Lloyd George, and Clemenceau—seemed to have in their hands the power to remold the world into a form close to the desire of all sane men for justice, liberty, and peace.

Why did they fail? Why was the treaty they signed at Versailles a tragedy that involved all the world in suffering?

There was no villain in the tragedy. But each of the chief actors had the defects of his qualities, as well as the qualities of his defects.

Clemenceau was a magnificent old fighting man whose courage had carried France from a dark hour to victory. Intelligent, straightforward, brusque, intense in his loves and his hatreds, he was dominated by a passionate desire to make France secure against attack by Germany. He had seen German soldiers overrun France in the war of 1870, when the populations of the two countries were relatively equal. He had seen Germany grow into a colossus compared to France, and then in 1914 attack again. He knew that France had escaped defeat at the Marne by a miracle, and that the united efforts of Great Britain, Russia, Italy, the United States, and a host of lesser allies had been needed to help France win the victory which had just been won. He was doubtful that France could ever aagin gather such a constellation of allies. And always present in his mind was the terrible fact that the victory to which he had led France had cost the French 6,161,000 casualties, while the whole British Empire had suffered 3,190,000, and the United States only 350,000.

Clemenceau's heart was with his friends who lay dead along the Marne and the Chemin des Dames and at Verdun. He felt that all the bravest and best of the French had been killed, and that France would be poor in leaders, as in soldiers, for at least a generation. To strengthen France against Germany was, he believed, not only a service to France but also to all Western civilization, since the defeat of France by Germany would place in mortal peril not only all other Nations of the continent of Europe but also Great Britain.

He did not believe that the proposed League of Nations would change men's hearts. He was skeptical of the value of such an organization until Colonel House—who was Woodrow Wilson's closest friend—suggested to him before the Peace Conference that the Covenant of the League might bring the American Army and Navy immediately to the aid of France in case of future German attack. Then Clemenceau became the advocate of a stronger League than either Wilson or Lloyd George wanted. His representative on the League of Nations Commission fought day after day for the creation of a permanent international police force, with a permanent general staff, to enforce peace.

Clemenceau was French policy. Lloyd George, the British Prime Minister, was a brilliant Welsh solicitor representing the interests of the British Empire. Clever, charming, adept at playing on the vanities and weaknesses of his opponents, able to make the worse appear the better reason, he was a smooth lawyer serving a great client—Britain.

Four centuries of unswerving British policy had laid down for him the course he must pursue. Philip II of Spain, Louis XIV of France, Napoleon and, finally, William II of Germany had all learned to their cost that Great Britain would go to war rather than permit any great power to dominate the continent of Europe.

This British persistence had its roots in the conviction that if any single power should control Europe, Great Britain would not be strong enough to withstand attack by that power; to prevent domination of Europe by any power was, therefore, a matter of life and death to Great Britain.

Lloyd George did not have to invent the policy created by this conviction. Persistently throughout four centuries Great Britain had followed the policy of trying by diplomacy to weaken the strongest state on the Continent of Europe and to build up a coalition of weaker states against it under British leadership. If the strongest state could be kept from dominating the continent by peaceful means, so much the better. If war was necessary, then Great Britain would not hesitate to make war.

This policy of self-preservation for Great Britain was known as the policy of the balance of power in Europe. It had acquired a bad name. For Great Britain logically treated her friend and ally of today as her possible enemy of tomorrow. And, after victory, Great Britain never desired to see her chief ally too strong or her conquered foe too weak—since in the next round she might need her conquered enemy as an ally against her present friend.

The balance of power was the major policy that Lloyd George represented at the peace conference in Paris; but there was a subsidiary policy as well. That was the policy of adding to the British Empire bits of land in all portions of the earth. The German colonies in East and West Africa, the German islands in the Pacific, the Turkish possessions (Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Trans-Jordan, Iraq, and Arabia) offered immense spoils. It was Lloyd George's task to acquire for the British Empire as much of the spoils as he could.

The idea of the League of Nations offered him possibilities both for gaining control of new territories and for implementing the policy of the balance of power. The British recognized quickly that, while annexations were frowned upon by world opinion, a control almost equivalent to annexation might be acquired by accepting a mandate from the League. Moreover, in the service of the balance of power, the proposed League might become a useful mechanism by which to mobilize the weaker nations of Europe against the strongest nation of Europe. And the League might bring to Great Britain, in case of war, the immediate support of the United States.

The British, therefore, wanted a League, but they did not want a strong League with an army and a general staff such as the French wanted and they did not want to have to promise unequivocally to go to war in case of aggression against a member of the League. They wanted to have their hands more or less free to tolerate minor aggressions—such as subsequently came in Manchuria and Abyssinia—which did not intimately affect the safety of Great Britain or threaten to produce domination of Europe by a single power.

To make France secure was Clemenceau's passion. To preserve the balance of power and acquire additions to the British Empire were Lloyd George's tasks. To establish peace on earth forever was Wilson's dream.

In this day of hatred, cruelty, battle, and death, let no one scoff at Wilson's vision of the future. In his aim he was eternally right. And the world is suffering now not because his goal was wrong but because he did not know how to reach his goal.

Like all other men, Wilson had his shortcomings. He had learned to coin phrases that moved men's hearts. But he had acquired a faith in words that made him sometimes consider a word a deed, a phrase an act. His vision of the peace conference was a picture of statesmen being so uplifted by his appeals that they would become drunk with the spirit of self-sacrifice, and in that spirit make a just and lasting peace.

He had such faith in the power of his words that he neglected to take elementary precautions to prepare the way for his appeals.

His first great opportunity to get rid of the secret treaties between the Allies, and to pledge the Allies to a peace of reconciliation, came shortly after the United States entered the war, when Mr. Balfour, foreign secretary of Great Britain, visited America. The magnitude of this opportunity can scarcely be exaggerated because Balfour was obliged to tell Wilson that the position of the Allies was desperate; that Russia was likely to make a separate peace; that morale in France was collapsing; that Great Britain's financial condition threatened calamity, and that the United States must carry a burden in the war enormously greater than Wilson or anyone else in the United States had anticipated.

At that moment the fate of the Allies was in Wilson's hands. They were totally dependent for their lives on men, money, munitions, food and supplies of all sorts from America. At that moment Wilson could have got rid of the secret treaties and begun the work of turning the war into the crusade for peace which he had proclaimed.

Wilson had his opportunity then, but he did not use it. After consultation with Colonel House he decided not to demand of Balfour the elimination of the secret treaties. He did not even ask to see them.

(One was the secret treaty between Japan and Great Britain by which the British Empire got the German islands in the Pacific south of the equator and Japan got the German islands north of the equator—to capture which American marines and soldiers and sailors and aviators are now giving their lives.)

Wilson allowed himself to be persuaded, without any specific information being given him, that the British Government would approach the peace conference in his own spirit. Thus he lost the opportunity to prepare the way for the peace he hoped to make.

MR. WILSON'S LOST OPPORTUNITY

Many other such opportunities arose during the next 17 months. Russia's Soviet government made a separate peace with Germany, and the remaining Allies continued to be dependent for their lives on the United States until the collapse of the German Army in October 1918. At any time during that long period Wilson might have used his power to bind the Allies to make the sort of peace he wanted. He made no attempt to do that. He stated America's war aims in his Fourteen Points speech and in many other eloquent, moving and noble addresses. But he did not pin down the Allies, or attempt to do so, until after the German collapse.

Similarly, he neglected elementary precautions to insure the passage by the Senate of the treaty of peace. He appealed for the election in November 1918 of a Democratic Congress. But the voters gave the Republicans a majority in both House and Senate, and former President Theodore Roosevelt declared to the world: "Our allies and our enemies, and Mr. Wilson himself, should all understand that Mr. Wilson has no authority whatever to speak for the American people at this time. His leadership has just been emphatically repudiated by them."

A large group of Republicans, which included former President Taft and Elihu Root, former Secretary of State, did not agree with former President Roosevelt. They favored a League to Enforce Peace. They had great influence not only in the country but also in the Senate. They proposed to Wilson that, if he would include in his peace delegation two strong Republicans, they would do all in their power to obtain ratification of the treaty of the Senate. Wilson ignored their offer.

With the secret treaties ahead of him and an unreconciled Republican majority behind him, Wilson on December 4, 1918, boarded the George Washington and set out for Europe.

He was supremely confident of his ability to give the world the peace he had promised. The wild applause which greeted his arrival in Paris, the intense enthusiasm of the crowds in London, and finally the delirious reception accorded him in Italy—where peasants were burning candles before his photograph—confirmed his belief in the power of his words and his mission. He was, indeed, at that time—so far as any man can be—the moral leader of mankind. And when on January 7, 1919, he returned to Paris from his visit to Italy, he was convinced that the peoples of Europe would rise and follow him even against their own governments.

No program for the conference had been agreed upon. Clemenceau had proposed that the terms of peace to Germany should be drawn up first and the Covenant of the League of Nations second. Wilson insisted that the League of Nations should be established before the peace terms were discussed.

He said to Colonel House that he intended making the League of Nations the center of the whole program and letting everything revolve around that. Once that is a fait accompli nearly all the very serious difficulties will disappear." His theory was that establishment of the League of Nations would make "safety antedate the peace" and thus facilitate his task of persuading the statesmen assembled in Paris to behave in a truly Christian spirit.

Wilson had his way and it was agreed that the Covenant of the League of Nations should be drawn up before the terms of the treaty were considered. Neither Clemenceau nor Lloyd George sat personally as members of the commission to draft the Covenant of the League, but Wilson did.

On the drafting of the Covenant he worked enthusiastically and excellently. He had little free time to give to the military, economic, and territorial problems of the conference. But on January 24, 1919, the question of mandates was taken up in the Council of Ten. The British presented a resolution declaring "that in no circumstances should any of the colonies be returned to Germany." And Lloyd George added, "In behalf of the British Empire, I would like to say that we are opposed to a return to Germany of any of these territories under any circumstances."

Frequently Wilson had expressed his opposition to annexations; and Point Five of the Fourteen Points, which the British and the other Allies had accepted as the basis for the peace, read: "A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that, in determining all such questions of sovereignty, the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined."

Thus Wilson faced his first test on peace terms. The moment was extraordinarily important, because the question involved not only the fate of masses of people but also the issue as to whether or not Germany was to be offered a genuine peace of reconciliation of the sort that Wilson had promised.

DESTRUCTION OR RECONCILIATION?

Wilson knew that there were only two possible methods of preventing Germany from attempting by war to avenge her defeat. The first was to render Germany impotent, by annexing large portions of her territory, by dividing what remained into three or four States, by wrecking her industries and lowering her standard of living to such a point that her birth rate would fall and her citizens would emigrate. The second was to offer Germany a genuine peace of reconciliation.

Wilson, and everyone else in Paris, knew that the worst possible treaty would be one which neither reconciled Germany nor rendered her impotent. To leave Germany burning with a passion for revenge and at the same time to reduce her strength only temporarily would be to prepare the way to a new world war, a war of revenge—the war which became Hitler's war.

Long before the Peace Conference, Wilson had chosen the course of reconciliation. And shortly before the German surrender he had reasserted his intentions in his address of September 27, 1918, saying: "First, the impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just."

To believe in the possibility of reconciliation with Germany was by no means so difficult at the time of the Peace Conference as it is today. The Prussian militarists had been discredited. Nazi-ism had not been invented. Germany was in the throes of becoming a democratic republic controlled by a Socialist Party so tender-minded that it would not even shoot political murderers. Wilson's hope to establish a peace of reconciliation depended on the continuance and growth of this democratic, almost pacifist, trend in Germany. He had no evidence that some of the Socialists might secretly be working with the Prussian militarists. And the very life of democratic Germany seemed to him to depend on a fair embodiment of his promises in the peace settlement, since a settlement not in accord with the letter and spirit of the Fourteen Points would tend to turn Germany over to the apostles of revenge and war.

Wilson's reply to Lloyd George's demand that Germany should lose all her colonies, therefore, was awaited with acute anxiety because his answer would indicate the manner in which he intended to battle for his Fourteen Points—the fifth of which was at stake.

"President Wilson said that he thought all were agreed to oppose the restoration of the German colonies."

There was no battle.

COLONIES: FIRST OF MANY STEPS

Wilson had been persuaded that Germany did not deserve to have any colonies. Thus he took the first step of many that made it difficult for any German to regard the Treaty of Versailles as a fair embodiment of the Fourteen Points or the offer of a peace of reconciliation. And the danger became evident that peace might be allowed to fall between two stools: Germany would neither be rendered impotent nor be reconciled.

This was the only concrete question of peace terms which Wilson decided before his return to America on Feb. 14, 1919.

On that day before his departure from Paris he read to the plenary session of the peace conference the Covenant of the League of Nations. He was a very tired but a very happy man. "People that were suspicious of one another can now live as friends and comrades in a single family, and desire to do so. The miasma of distrust, of intrigue, is cleared away." He said that—and he believed that.

Before leaving for America, Wilson instructed Colonel House to work out with the leaders of the Allies the military, territorial, reparation, and economic clauses of the treaty.

House began his work hopefully. But by March 3, 1919, the major demands of the Allies had been revealed to him and in despair he wrote: "It is now evident that the peace will not be such a peace as I had hoped, or one which this terrible upheaval should have brought about."

Wilson returned to France on March 14, 1919, full of fight, hoping that "by making safety antedate the peace" he had made it possible for him to lift the negotiations to the level of Christian ideals. House told him that the establishment of the League had not in any way reduced the demands of the Allies and advised him to accept those demands quickly. To take House's advice was to abandon his belief in his own mission—and he rejected it.

The very afternoon of his arrival in Paris he met Clemenceau and Lloyd George. He was determined to make no compromises. But he began his battle with them by making an extraordinary concession. In a moment of enthusiasm he agreed to make a treaty guaranteeing that the United States would go to war immediately on the side of France if France should be attacked by Germany. He did this for the same reason that he had insisted on guaranteeing the peace before its terms were fixed—in order to "make safety antedate the peace" and also to get rid of the French contention that France would never be secure against attack by Germany unless the French Army should occupy permanently the west bank of the Rhine.

Nearly all Americans at the Paris Conference felt sure that the Senate would never ratify this treaty of alliance and believed that Clemenceau had been deceived by a promise that never would be made good. But Clemenceau accepted the illusory guarantee.

WILSON THREATENS TO GO HOME

On March 27 Clemenceau demanded a 30-year occupation of the Rhineland and the annexation of the Saar. The next day Wilson, in a burst of irritation, replied that the French were bringing up territorial questions that had nothing to do with the war aims of anybody, that no one had heard of their intention to annex the Saar Valley until after the Armistice had been signed. Clemenceau returned an angry answer: "You are seeking to destroy France." "That is untrue, and you know it is untrue!" said Wilson. Clemenceau answered that if France did not receive the Saar he would not sign the treaty of peace. Wilson replied: "Then if France does not get what she wishes, she will refuse to act with us. In that event do you wish me to return home?" "I do not wish you to go home, but I intend to do so myself," said Clemenceau, and stalked from the room.

When Wilson asked Clemenceau the question "Do you wish me to return home?" he was thinking seriously of breaking up the peace conference, cutting off further financial aid to the Allies, denouncing Lloyd George, Clemenceau, and Orlando as enemies of lasting peace and returning to America on the George Washington.

The power over the Allies which he had possessed before the Armistice, when they were dependent for their lives on America, had in large measure disappeared. They no longer needed our men and munitions, and we needed their ships to bring our soldiers home. But Wilson thought they still needed our money. And he felt that both his financial weapon and his moral authority were strong. But his moral authority also in large measure had evaporated. It had sprung, in part, from the perfection of his phrases which held out hope of peace to all the world; but, in greater part, it had sprung from the physical power of the people of the United States to save the Allies from destruction. Propagandists in England, France, and Italy had been depicting him as an ignorant egotist who thought he was a Christ. In France, only the Socialists and some of the Radical Socialists (who in spite of their name were neither radicals nor socialists but "liberals") were strongly in favor of a peace of reconciliation. In Great Britain the Labor Party, the trade-unions and some of the liberals were heartily with Wilson, and some of the trade-unions were ready to go so far as to call a general strike against Lloyd George. Moreover, Wilson knew that if he should break up the conference and go home he would be denounced throughout the United States—except by the "liberal" section of the Democratic Party which controlled few votes in the Senate or the country.

He was caught on the horns of a terrible dilemma. He felt that if he should sign a treaty the terms of which were not "just and right" he would himself sow the seeds of new wars and betray the hopes of the world. He knew that if he should break up the conference he would precipitate a political battle in Europe and America of epic dimensions, and that he would have few friends. In despair, he longed for the power over the Allies which was his before the Germans collapsed and he wished, too late, that he had used it while he had it.

On April 3, 1919, he suffered a nervous and physical break-down.

"He was seized with violent paroxysms of coughing, which were so severe and frequent that it interfered with his breathing. He had a fever of 103°. * * * His condition looked very serious."

SICKBED NEGOTIATIONS

But the work of the conference had to go on; and 2 days later Lloyd George, Clemenceau, Orlando, and Colonel House met in his study; and Colonel House walked back and forth through the door in the bookcase which separated Wilson's bedroom from his study to keep him informed of the progress of their negotiations.

Reparations were under discussion. Wilson had already yielded to the demand that pensions and separation allowances should be included in the reparations bill to Germany. He had also ordered the American experts to cease fighting for his original position that a definite sum for Germany to pay must be named in the treaty. But he was still under the illusion that he would not have to make further compromises and that Lloyd George would support him in insisting that the total reparations payments must be limited to the amount Germany could pay in 30 years. To Wilson's horror, House came through the door and reported that Lloyd George opposed any limitation either of years or of amount to be paid.

The following day, Sunday, April 6, Wilson—still ill in bed—sent for the American peace commissioners and outlined to them his objections to the terms that Lloyd George, Clemenceau, and Orlando were trying to write into the treaty. "It was determined that if nothing happened within the next few days the President would say to the Prime Ministers that unless peace was made according to their promises, which were to conform to the principles of the Fourteen Points, he would either have to go home or he would insist upon having the conferences in the open; in other words, to have plenary sessions with all the delegates of the smaller powers sitting in."

The evening of the same day, April 6, 1919, Wilson went over the whole situation with his closest intimates. He then gave orders that all further advances of money from the United States to Great Britain and France should be stopped, and that the George Washington should return to Brest so that he could leave for America if he should be unable to get the sort of peace he sought for the world.

When Clemenceau, referring to Wilson's purpose in ordering the George Washington, said to Admiral Grayson, Wilson's physician and intimate friend, "It is a bluff, isn't it?" Grayson replied with entire sincerity, "He hasn't a bluffing corpuscle in his body."

Late the following afternoon, to various friends, Wilson again expressed his determination to fight. But the next day, April 8, 1919, when he met the prime ministers for the first time after his illness, he yielded, and accepted tentatively the "compromise" on the question of reparations.

WEAPONS LOST WITHOUT KNOWING IT

Any remnants of an inclination to fight which may have remained in Wilson were removed by two telegrams, the first, from his White House secretary, Joseph P. Tumulty, saying, "The ordering of the George Washington to return to France looked upon here as an act of impatience and petulance. * * * A withdrawal at this time would be a desertion." The second telegram was from the Secretary of the Treasury and said that financial arrangements already had been made with the British which would cover their requirements to July 1, 1919, and that commitments for loans to France already made by the Treasury would cover future French requirements so completely that only temporary inconvenience to France would be caused by a refusal of new loans.

The financial weapon on which Wilson had counted had slipped from his hand without his becoming aware that it was gone.

Thereafter Wilson excluded all Americans from the meetings of the four and gave orders that minutes of the meetings should not be given to any American. Lloyd George had Sir Maurice Hankey to assist him, Clemenceau had Mantoux, Wilson had no one. Alone, he agreed to the transformation of the 14 points into the Treaty of Versailles.

Wilson had a powerful conscience and he could not commit an act which was evil unless he could convince himself that it was somehow good. He escaped from his dilemma by persuading himself that the League of Nations would alter all the unjust provisions of the treaty. Again and again he said to his friends, "I would never have done that if I had not been sure that the League of Nations would revise that decision."

He was entirely conscious that the League as it stood could not revise the treaty and was essentially a mechanism to guarantee the permanence of the treaty. But he convinced himself that the League in time would be made stronger until it should become a true parliament of man, and that it would then revise the treaty.

As soon as Wilson achieved the belief that the terms of the peace were mere temporary expedients which would be rewritten by a permanent and powerful League, he made his compromises quickly. On April 7 he had been convinced that he should break up the conference rather than accept bad terms. One week later, April 14, the treaty was so far advanced that the German Government was invited to send delegates to Versailles to receive it. It was actually handed to them on May 7.

By the terms of the treaty, Germany lost:

The districts of Moresnet, Supen, and Malmedy to Belgium.

Alsace and Lorraine to France.

The Saar Valley to control by an international commission pending a plebiscite to be taken after 15 years. The Saar coal mines ceded to France.

Northern Schleswig to Denmark.

The southern half of Upper Silesia, a large part of the Posen and Bromberg areas, and a corridor to the sea—which cut off East Prussia from the body of Germany—to Poland.

The city of Danzig—to be administered by the League but its foreign relations controlled by Poland.

The city of Memel to the Allies.

All her colonies—under mandates. The Cameroons to Great Britain and France, Togoland to Great Britain, Southwest Africa to the Union of South Africa, East Africa to Great Britain and Belgium. Her islands in the Pacific north of the equator to Japan; those south of the equator to Great Britain, Australia, and New Zealand.

Also her rights and properties in the Chinese province of Chantung—to Japan.

Also all her treaty rights, capitulations and concessions in China, Liberia, Siam, Egypt, and Morocco.

All German state and private property abroad, including the property and stations of German missionaries.

All vessels of the German merchant marine exceeding 1,600 gross tons and half the vessels between 1,600 tons and 1,600 tons, and one-fourth of her trawlers and other fishing boats—mostly to Great Britain under a provision for ton-for-ton replacement of Allied shipping lost during the war.

As many billions as the Reparations Commission might choose, or be able, to take from her—the sum being unlimited either in magnitude or in number of years to be paid.

The German Army to be reduced to 100,000, with guns and ammunition in proportion, the rest destroyed. Abolition of conscription. Destruction of all fortifications. Absolute demilitarization of all German territories on the west bank of the Rhine and in a zone 50 kilometers deep on the east bank of the Rhine.

German Navy to be surrendered and thenceforth limited to six small battleships, 6 light cruisers, 12 destroyers, and 12 torpedo boats. Complete destruction of naval works and fortifications within 50 kilometers of the coast.

Destruction of all army and navy aircraft and other air material, and absolute prohibition of naval or military air forces.

These were a few of the principle provisions of the Treaty of Versailles. There were a vast number of other provisions; among them those that dealt with war criminals—including the Kaiser—and those which put the chief German rivers under control of international commissions.

The cumulative impression produced by the treaty was one of rancorous severity. Yet the treaty was by no means so severe as it might have been. Germany was not destroyed or cut into pieces. She was rendered powerless—for the moment. She was not rendered permanently impotent.

On the other hand, the peace was clearly not a peace of reconciliation which gave the new-born German democratic state a real fighting chance to survive and uproot forever the militarism which had been rooted so long in the soil of Brandenburg. There were within the treaty too many talking points for specialists in hatred—like Hitler.

The most atrocious provisions of the treaty were those dealing with reparations. They seemed to promise that for an indefinite future the entire German race would have to labor for the Allies. In reality, they were so unworkable that they produced financial and economic chaos in Germany and had to be revised—and in the end Germany paid only what gullible American private investors gave her in loans.

Along with these provisions of the Treaty of Versailles went other provisions which technically were parts of other peace treaties or agreements. Their authors did not design them to assist the German apostles of revenge to overrun Europe, but they tended to produce that result.

VIENNA BEGAN TO STARVE

Austria-Hungary was cut into small bits. The economic unity of the basin of the Danube which had been maintained by the Hapsburg monarchy was split into 5 pieces with tariff walls between, making them too weak economically to resist the thrust of Germany. Vienna, a noble city of 2,000,000 which had been the capital of an empire of 52,000,000, was made the capital of a tiny state of 6,000,000 and forthwith began to starve. Two hundred and fifty thousand Austrian mountaineers of the Tyrol, of purest German stock, were given to Italy. Hungary was whittled down to dimensions that gave her a series of mortal grievances against Rumania, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia. And Fiume, the logical port of Yugoslavia, went to Italy in spite of Wilson's efforts.

Russia, torn by 21 different civil wars, was the great unrepresented at the Conference of Paris. The Soviet Government made a proposal on March 14, 1919, good until April 10, 1919, to the Allied and Associated Governments, that there should be an immediate armistice of 2 weeks in all the former territories of the Czar's empire, and that a conference should meet to discuss peace on the basis that all de facto governments which had been set up in the territory of the former Russian empire and Finland should remain in full control of the territories they occupied at the moment the armistice became effective. The Soviet Government at that time controlled only the Moscow, Leningrad, Vologda, Kazan, and Samara areas, the northern Ukraine, and a portion of White Russia. Lenin's proposal meant, therefore, that the Soviet Government offered to give up, at least temporarily, the whole of Siberia, the Urals, the Caucasus, the Archangel and Murmansk areas, Finland, the Baltic States, a portion of White Russia, and most of the Ukraine. Furthermore, Lenin agreed to recognize the Czarist debts.

Lloyd George was much interested by the proposal but feared to champion it because of the opposition of Northcliffe and Churchill, Wilson was too ill and too burdened by his troubles with Lloyd George, Clemenceau and Orlando to turn his mind to it. The consequences were momentous. Indeed, the world does not yet know what the consequences may be. And Wilson's decision not to burden what he was fond of calling his "one-track mind" with Russia may well, when the history of this century is written, turn out to be the most important decision he made in Paris.

Under mandates, Lloyd George acquired for the British Empire control of Iraq, Trans-Jordan and Palestine, while the French got Syria and Lebanon.

Japan acquired by the Treaty of Versailles not only the German islands in the Pacific, north of the Equator but also control of the Chinese province of Shantung.

Wilson felt bad about this article of the treaty. "He said he had been unable to sleep the night before, thinking of it * * * He knew * * * that he would be accused of violating his own principles but, nevertheless, he must work for world order and organization, against anarchy and a return of the old militarism."

LLOYD GEORGE IN "A PERFECT FUNK"

To the Chinese, the delivery of a province of China to the Japanese militarists seemed a queer way to work against militarism, and the Chinese government refused to sign the Treaty of Versailles. And the opponents of the treaty in the Senate were given one of their most effective arguments against ratification.

After the terms of the treaty had been communicated to the Germans, Lloyd George returned to Paris from London in a state of mind which Wilson described as "a perfect funk."

He had carried the treaty proudly to London but, in spite of the fact that he had garnered for the British Empire a new imperial domain in Africa, the Near East and the Pacific, he had been criticized by his associates in London because the treaty, in their opinion, made France too strong and Germany too weak and, therefore, threatened to upset the balance of power in Europe. Thenceforth, British policy toward the continent was controlled by this thought.

Wilson was intensely irritated by Lloyd George's last-minute conversion to the doctrine of milder terms for Germany. "These people that overrode our judgment and wrote things into the treaty that are now the stumbling blocks, are falling over themselves to remove those stumbling blocks," he commented.

The stumbling blocks were not removed.

On June 28, 1919 the Treaty of Versailles was signed.

Wilson commended it, saying, "It ends once for all an old and intolerable order * * * There is ground here for deep satisfaction, universal assurance and confident hope."

He had escaped from a conscious sense of guilt by clinging firmly to the belief that the League of Nations would become a parliament of man which would alter the imperfect terms of the treaty. To believe that was not easy. To believe that the league ever would grow into an instrument powerful enough to revise the treaty if it should be weakened further by "reservations" was almost impossible. The Republican majority in the Senate was hostile to Wilson and was opposed to some of the terms of the League Covenant and insisted on adding reservations to it. Wilson would not accept the reservations, which were associated with the name of Senator Lodge, Republican chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. In consequence, when the Treaty of Versailles, with the Lodge reservations, came to a vote in the Senate in November 1919, Wilson requested the Democratic senators to vote against it—and ratification of the treaty was defeated by a vote of 39 in favor, 55 against.

There were many other votes in the Senate, but in the end the United States did not ratify the Treaty of Versailles. And the alliance with France, for which Clemenceau had bartered military occupation of the west bank of the Rhine, was not even submitted to a vote in the Senate.

Clemenceau failed to obtain security for France. Wilson failed to establish an enduring peace. Lloyd George achieved a glittering surface success since he preserved the balance of power in Europe and acquired some spoils for the British Empire. But, in truth, he too failed. The greatest of British interests is peace; and 20 years after his bright triumph Great Britain was at war and close to destruction.

MANKIND WAS THE LOSER

There was no winner in the tragedy of Versailles. The whole of mankind was the loser.

From this sad story of good intentions leading only to a new world war, a few conclusions may, perhaps, legitimately be drawn:

(1) At the end of each great war comes a period when the world is in flux and may be molded by the leaders of the victorious powers into a better or a worse form. That moment of great opportunity passes quickly, and the world congeals in the new mold fixed by the peace settlements. If the settlements are wise, the world may enjoy a period of peace. If they are unwise, the world will be shattered soon by war.

(2) The political, economic, military, and moral march toward wise terms of peace must begin long before the defeat of the enemy. Unwise terms of peace—even terms desired by our allies—must be excluded by binding international agreements while our allies are dependent on us for their preservation. We must use our power while we have it. Wilson did not use his power while he had it.

(3) Good intentions are not enough. The organization of peace is a more difficult problem than the organization of war. Foresight and many preparatory decisions and acts are vital if the moment of opportunity is to be seized. We have to know what we want, plan how to get what we want and act in time, unless victory is to be barren of peace. A staff for the organization of peace, working in close contact with the President, is no less necessary than a general staff for the organization of war.

(4) By our Constitution, the Senate has coordinate power with the President in the matter of treaties. A close coordination of thought, intention, and will between the President and the Senate, therefore, is essential so that the President will not negotiate treaties which the Senate will reject and the Senate will not reject treaties negotiated by the President.

WE CANNOT RESIGN FROM THIS EARTH

(5) Since man is acquiring increased control over the forces of nature without acquiring increased control over the forces of his own nature, new weapons of war are placing unprecedented means of destruction in the hands of beings who have not evolved greatly since the dawn of recorded history. The problem of international morality, therefore, underlies all problems of lasting peace. A minimum of human decency and good faith between nations is essential for the conduct of world affairs in peace. Rightly the people of the United States feel kindly toward nations that do not do unto others what they would not have done unto themselves. Rightly we hate dictators who use the lie, the pledged word given and broken, propaganda that makes black appear white, "fifth columns" and threats of force as their habitual weapons in international affairs. They are the enemies of international morality—and of peace.

(6) We as a Nation cannot resign from this earth. We cannot escape the consequences of unwise settlements in Asia and Europe which will produce new wars. We shall be involved in those wars.

(7) The problem of peace in Europe, where 400,000,000 of the most highly endowed people of the earth are concentrated in a peninsula projecting from Asia, is—as it was in Wilson's day—the central problem of world peace. It is such a difficult problem that, at times, we are inclined to give up hope that Germany can be incorporated in a decent society of European and international law, and that Europe can be organized in a peaceful federation of democratic states. In weariness we are tempted to try to wash our hands of the problem.

We cannot wash our hands of it. If we try to do so, we shall suffer physical consequences in war; and we shall suffer moral consequences. We cannot escape history. Pontius Pilate washed his hands, and the world has never forgiven him.

Entertainment Industry Emergency Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include a statement and a program adopted by the Entertainment Industry Emergency Committee, which was organized immediately following the Detroit riots of June 21, 1943, by a group of interested people in the theater, radio, and picture business for the purpose of stimulating interest in the danger of riots, and then set about arranging a national broadcast on the subject. This was sponsored by more than 150 leading people in the entertainment world, including such persons as Maxwell Anderson, Jean Arthur, Ralph Bellamy, Erskine Caldwell, Ilka Chase, Duke Ellington, John Garfield, Benny Goodman, Max Gordon, Lillian Hellman, Jean Hersholt, James Hilton, Miriam Hopkins, Thomas Mann, Groucho Marx, Paul Muni, Jean Renoir, Elmer Rice, Billy Rose, Lawrence Tibbett, Orson Welles, David Selznick, and many others.

The statement and program follow:

The most vicious result of a vicious mind is the concept of the right of one man to subjugate another. The history of man has been his fight against that conception. Always men have stood up to fight against it. We are fighting against it now. White men, black men, and yellow men all over the world are giving their lives by millions; they believe in the equality of man, and are now dying to secure it. Here at home we are denying that equality to the very men who are fighting to give it to us.

For many generations the Negro citizen, whether by custom or local ordinance, has too often been denied his constitutional rights and privileges. Such denials have always been illegal and immoral. The dangers of such denials are now, in wartime, thrown into bolder relief.

It may be said that in time of war it is unwise to emphasize internal stresses within our country. But they have been tragically emphasized for us in the violent anti-Negro outbreaks which have come to the surface in recent months in Detroit, and more recently by the clashes in New York. Steps such as we advocate should have been made in time of peace. But they were not made and we find curselves now in a war of national survival with an ancient injustice clogging our national effort. To say that the Negro is better off than he was before the Civil War is only to say that in fact the lot of all men has improved since those days. But to say that a man is better off is not to say that he has yet been accepted as a full citizen with the rights of other citizens. This fact has become more noticeable under the strain of emergency organization and the building of a great army. And it is a fact which is known to our allies, to our enemies, to the neutrals, and to all those in any country who might fear that they will be mistreated by us. Our attitude toward the Negro is alienating hundreds of millions throughout the world whom we need as friends and who might otherwise be our friends. It is poisoning morale within our own country and giving our enemies a deadly effective propaganda weapon.

We of the entertainment industry recognize that we have a peculiar responsibility in that we are engaged in bringing ideas to audiences which include our whole population. This responsibility we can use in such a way that it will contribute to national unity.

For the present, and for our own industry, this much we propose:

1. We ask that the writers of books, plays, radio scripts, motion pictures, short stories, and comic strips cease telling the pre-Civil War lies about the Negro. The Negro is not a man with a razor in his hand, or a woman with a handkerchief on her head; they are not happy-go-lucky illiterates, clowns, cowards, superstitious, ghost-ridden, liquor-drinking, chicken-stealing, watermelon-eating, jazz-crazed Aunt Jemimas or Uncle Toms who at their worst are villains and at their best slavish admirers of their white superiors. We wish these dangerous vilifications to stop forever. The Negro is as legitimate a hero or a villain as the rest of us, and should be so treated.

2. We ask the theater, radio, dance bands, night clubs and symphony orchestras to insist that discrimination against the Negro artist, musician, and other performers cease. The Negro artist is to be judged on his merits as an artist and not on the color of his face. The Negro needs a job as desperately as anybody else.

3. We ask that the moving-picture industry, the director, the writer, the actor, the technician, and, above all, the producing company, face out and find a solution for the prejudices of southern customers and the prejudices of southern theater owners. These prejudices have far too long controlled the industry's ability to treat seriously and justly of the Negro. The moving-picture industry should not be asked to make this fight unaided. The decent southerner, who has always been ashamed of the savage and vulgar prejudices of the South, must come to the aid of the moving-picture industry and come quickly.

We of the entertainment industry are conscious of the considerable contributions which have been made to our democratic culture by the Negro people. These contributions highlight the task of the entire entertainment industry, in all its creative and technical branches, of treating the Negro problem in full truth with full seriousness. It is a sharp and tragic problem running through our country like a wicked and unattended epidemic. We must move forward, in our way, and help solve it. And we must move now.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, "Undercover" should not include Capt. Oliver Lyttelton.

The House was in session 10 hours today—the longest this year, on the longest day.

Two men may be drafted at the Chicago convention by delegates who are above the draft.

Two things hurting the Republican Convention: the lack of a contest there, and too much contest over there.

Surely nothing will prevent the recess tomorrow night, not even U. N. R. R. A., about the last source of contention.

They eliminated a clause in a soldier-preference bill which would have given benefit to a husband of a deceased service woman.

The first landing on the beachhead of perpetuity will be in Chicago, June 26, the place where our new foreign policy of "quarantine" was handed down.

There is greater satisfaction this week-end on the successes of three battle fronts than any previous time. We hope Congress will be reconvened because of victory, soon.

The wife of the Member who moved to strike out the enacting clause, killing the WASP bill, sat in the gallery, unknowingly, beside the lady officer who most wanted the law.

Mr. Baldwin's transfer from the head of Farm Security to second place to Hillman on C. I. O. political action is proving to be, from disclosed evidence, an effort to seduce the farm element through that agency, if possible.

All should be vitally interested in the processes that choose a President. A President could use influence enough to lead to the bitterest ends. He could take your son, brother, husband, or father and send him to foreign soil to die. He could.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Governor of Massachusetts:

THE COMMONWEALTH
OF MASSACHUSETTS,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
State House, Boston, June 7, 1944.

Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK,
Congressional Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: This afternoon Representative Edward Staves, of Southbridge, who is the vice chairman of our post-war highway commission, came in to see me. This commission, as you know, is comprised of members of the department of public works, other State officials, and members of the legislature. Its duty is to make plans for post-war highway building.

Naturally we are much concerned with what the Federal Government does on this subject. Staves points out to me that under the original bill (H. R. 2426), in which the Federal Government is asked to appropriate $3,000,000,000 on a 75–25 basis, the total cost to Massachusetts will be $125,000,000, and the total receipts in Massachusetts will be $72,000,000.

A group from various States, of which Staves is one, has proposed H. R. 4853, as amended, in which the Federal Government is asked to appropriate $2,000,000,000, of which the total cost to Massachusetts will be $124,000,000, and the receipts in Massachusetts $114,000,000. Naturally, under these circumstances, the second bill seems to be very much more favorable and a fairer one to us in this State.

I have stated many times publicly and privately my feeling that while the States and the municipalities have saved much money during this war, and while at the same time the Federal Government has had to bear the cost of the war, and to do so has gone heavily into debt, I believe that the municipalities and the States should not go to the Federal Gorvernment for financial assistance except in extreme cases. Consequently, I am not heartily in favor of either of these bills. However, the cooperative road-building plan has worked out better probably than any other Federal-State cooperative undertaking.

If there is to be a Federal appropriation on this subject, naturally I hope you will use your influence to pass H. R. 4853, as amended, rather than H. R. 2426. Possibly, there may be other bills or amendments of which Staves is not informed, but I am glad to endorse his position on this subject with the qualification as above stated.

Best regards to you.

Sincerely yours,

LEVERETT SALTONSTALL,
Governor of the Commonwealth.

P. S.—I am sending an identical letter to Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN.

Some Evidence Backing View That United States Is Unprepared for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include the following article which appeared in a recent issue of the Chicago Daily News, by Edwin A. Lahey:

SOME EVIDENCE BACKING VIEW THAT UNITED STATES IS UNPREPARED FOR PEACE

(By Edwin A. Lahey)

The other day, in an unaccountably ponderous vein, this column became pessimistic about the ability of America to protect itself against the ravages of peace. I'd like to pursue this depressing line with some evidence to the effect that (a) as a nation we are unwilling to face the cold probabilities of the post-war era, and that (b) we are trending toward a state of hopeless disunity which will make it difficult to agree on methods for maintaining full employment, which is the essence of the problem ahead of us.

It may seem a little silly to be discussing this, when the front page is filled with news of the B–29, with the increased tempo of the invasion, and with the counteroffensive of the Nazi rocket bombs. But like the last act of a Wagnerian opera, this deafening clang of noise might be followed abruptly by the overwhelming silence of peace. It may be later than we think.

JOB PROBLEM UNSOLVED

Issue (a) cited above requires that we honestly and frankly face the fact that "private enterprise" as we know it, and as political ostriches like Harrison Spangler speak of it, has not demonstrated that it can solve the problem of unemployment. The obvious next step, if capitalism is to prove its right to exist as a system of distribution, is a compensatory economy in which public spending fills in the inevitable valleys in the business cycle, thus maintaining a reasonable stability of the national income.

But when you look over the field of public expression, you find most men with their heads in the sand, talking like Herbert Hoover in 1931, when he thought that all we needed was more confidence. There are some notable exceptions. Economists like Stuart Chase and Alvin Hansen have been assiduously warning us of the need of an economic system in which public spending acts as a backstop against depression. Wendell Willkie courageously takes the dilemma by the horns and warns his fellow Republicans that economic security for the individual is not incompatible with "free enterprise."

MINORITY VOICES INEFFECTIVE

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee last week also proclaimed the principle that while the job of providing full employment was one essentially for private industry, government in the future must stand by in readiness to provide employment in public works when and if private industry falters on the job. But these seem like lonely voices beating against the hard wall of indifference that runs through industry, Congress, and most of the President's advisers. Such minority voices do not enact adequate plans for protection from the impact of peace.

Item (b) cited above says we are trending toward disunity. This, unfortunately, is borne out by statistics of labor disputes. Theoretically industry and labor should be learning gradually to be getting along better. Perhaps this is true over the long run. The history of the National Labor Relations Board shows that each year the number of representation cases it handles is a higher percentage of the whole, while cases involving violations and complaints decline. This would tend to prove that employers have accepted the principle of collective bargaining.

W. L. B. LOAD UP ELEVENFOLD

But War Labor Board statistics knock out this comfortable theory, at least for the moment. During the first 6 months of the W. L. B.'s existence, from January to June 1942, it received an average of 50 disputes per week. From June to December of 1943 it received an average of 550 dispute cases per week, an elevenfold increase. The vast majority of these disputes were over petty matters, including standard contract provisions which are now being disputed by employers. The burden of work on the W. L. B. has increased so that the average dispute case now requires 4 to 5 months for adjudication.

These figures would support the statement that we are trending toward a dangerous disunity. The time would seem ripe for the President to recognize the certainty of peace and victory, and call a national conference of industry, labor, agriculture, and Government to see if they could not make a desperate effort at unity of purpose and evolve a blueprint to keep our economic structure going, come the end of the war.

English as a World Language

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Robert L. Owen:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 20, 1944.

Re: English as a world language.

Hon VICTOR WICKERSHAM, M. C.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR VICTOR: During the last decades a wonderful revolution has been taking place in teaching the peoples of the world to read and write their own language by a few days of instruction through phonetic alphabets adopted and put into execution by over 300 nationalities. These alphabets differ from each other in the forms of the phonetic letters employed. They have one characteristic in common to them all, to wit: each letter represents one primary vocal sound and one only, which enables an illiterate person to read the alphabet in a few hours of instruction, and therefore to read their own language printed in this phonetic type.

After several years of intense study I have devised a phonetic alphabet of 42 letters with which any language in the world can be printed; by which any language in the world when so printed can be read and written by people knowing that language. They can learn this alphabet within 2 or 3 hours of instruction. They can easily read books printed in it in a few days of practice. They can learn to write it by hand almost immediately and with facility in a few weeks of practice. The global, phonetic, stenographic alphabet I explained to the Senate in a petition referred by the Senate to the Committee on Foreign Relations, Senate Document 133.

I wish to explain this to the Senate and House of Representatives, and to the American people in a convincing manner which can only be done through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by using the Global type. This type will be available in a few weeks.

Using the Global letters in writing by hand enables an illiterate to write English or Russian or Chinese stenographically and at high speed after reasonable practice. Printing Russian in phonetic letters saves a substantial percentage of the paper which would be employed if printed unphonetically, but printing in English with the Global would save half the paper used for printing purposes. This means a possible saving in the United States of millions of dollars of printed paper per annum if adopted, or double the printed contents of books, magazines, and papers.

It would save half the cost of transportation by mail, express, and freight. It would save half the space of storage.

Above all by far in importance, it would save the youth and the illiterates of the world the enormous loss of time in learning how to spell unphonetic words used in English which take children 5 or 10 years of precious time at an impressionable age.

It would multiply the production of the mass of mankind through increased knowledge of modern productive processes and vocational instruction. This latter fact has been completely demonstrated by Russia and Turkey, and by the individual states in eastern Europe and northern Asia. Russia, using the phonetic alphabet as the basis of its educational system, has in two decades increased its production over 400 percent.

The world revolution in abolishing illiteracy and human ignorance and poverty has been making great strides in other countries through the activities of the Committee on World Literacy and Christian Literature through the activities of the Reverend Frank Charles Laubach, Ph. D., who have taught nearly a hundred nationalities how to abolish illiteracy with the phonetic alphabets. These communities have received Laubach's instruction with joy and enthusiasm. In recent months many communities in the Caribbean and South America have received this system such as Jamaica, Santo Domingo, Haiti, Puerto Rico, and many others. These languages are widely distributed: 22 in the Philippines, 5 in China, 3 in Malay, 13 in Latin America, 4 in Mexico, and 5 in the Caribbean, 23 in India, 11 in Africa, 4 in the Near East and Hawaii.

Theodore Roosevelt when President instructed the Public Printer to adopt simplified spelling of 300 words as of economic importance. This list was prepared by the Committee on Simplified Spelling. It spelled "tho" in lieu of "though", etc. President Roosevelt referred to unphonetic English spelling as "foolish and fantastic." The unphonetic words of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary makes the appalling number of nearly 500,000 words, where two or more letters are used to convey the sound instead of one letter employed by the phonetic system.

President Roosevelt might be criticized for using the term "foolish and fantastic," but listen to what the greatest expert in the world on phonetic teaching, Laubach, says about the difficulty of teaching foreigners to spell and pronounce scholastic, unphonetic English words (Philippine Literacy Method, p. 2). "English is one of the world's worst-spelled languages. The letter 'a' has eight sounds, 'o' sixteen, 'c,' 'e,' 'g,' 'h,' 'i,' 'p,' 'r,' 's,' 't,' 'u,' 'x,' 'y,' and 'z' also have plural pronunciations. The foolish clause, 'though a tough cough plough me through', contains five pronunciations for 'ough.' Probably nobody in Oxford—or even in Boston—can pronounce every word in the Oxford Dictionary. There is no escape from it—we must learn each English word before we can be sure we are pronouncing it correctly, and that requires years." I have Dr. Laubach's letter commending my alphabet as the best he had ever seen.

I had a card from George Bernard Shaw favoring phonetic spelling dated April 28, 1944, stating that he was convinced on two points: "A. That the only argument strong enough to carry its adoption (phonetic letters) is its enormous saving of labor in writing, typing, printing; paper making and in wear and tear of machinery. The cost of spelling one sound with two letters is so prodigious that the initial cost of substituting a phonetic alphabet capable of representing every single sound in English speech by a single letter is negligible in comparison. B. As phonetic spelling with our alphabet is impossible without a very frequent indication of one sound by two letters, all attempts at it must be ruled out on economic grounds alone, to say nothing of the impression of illiterate misspelling which they make on educated people." Mr. Shaw condemns any attempt to spell phonetically with the old English letters and said that he "is interested only in a new English alphabet containing between 40 and 50 new letters to be used and taught concurrently with the old alphabet until one or the other proves the fitter to survive." It will be remembered that Mr. Shaw proposed to leave his entire estate to establish the phonetic system in spelling English.

I, myself, merely propose a method of writing English (and all other languages) with shorthand phonetic letters leaving the present English printing undisturbed, as it is of great value as it is, and there is no need for interfering with those who use it and will continue to use it. It ought to be known to all scholars because of the enormous literature already printed in it. Writing and printing with phonetic shorthand will quickly remove illiteracy and will enable people of all languages, by use of a universal alphabet, to learn the language of other people whose sounds they can read at sight with the Global phonetic, stenographic alphabet.

I recently received a letter from an accomplished teacher in our public schools which I think should be of interest as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C. May 15, 1944.

DEAR MR. OWEN: Answering your inquiry, I have taught two classes of children to read and write the Global Alphabet since January 1. They could read it after a few hours of instruction and have been pleased and interested with it. I have found no word in the English language that I could not write in the letters of the Global Alphabet.

One of my children of 10 years of age speaks Portuguese and I had her write in Portuguese the phrase, "Can we go home?" I translated this in the Global Alphabet and found that my children could immediately read and intelligently pronounce the Portuguese sentence. They were delighted to read the Portuguese. Of course, you would know this, but it surprised and pleased them because they could not read and intelligently pronounce the Portuguese as written in roman letters. The name of the child who speaks Portuguese is Helena Fonseca. Her father is a diplomat in the employ of the Brazilian Government. She is 10 years old.

Yours respectfully,

MRS. FRANCES D. DORMAN.

I propose teaching Portuguese and English by printing words and sentences of identical meaning, interlinear, using the Global Alphabet to enable Portuguese and English students to intelligibly pronounce both Portuguese and English at sight. Then the only thing they have to do is to remember the meaning of the word pronounced without any complications whatever in pronunciation or spelling.

By this mechanism an intelligent American should learn to speak Portuguese and understand it when it is spoken, within 2 or 3 months of study. Chinese, Russians, and others may learn English the same way.

In other words, the Global, phonetic, stenographic system offers the whole world a mechanism by which the people of the world can learn conversational English with great speed through bilingual books printed in Global. An available plan and text for all the leading languages is immediately available. With 1,200 words business and social conversation can be carried on in any language. And the knowledge of 1,200 words, which could be learned in 60 days at 20 words a day will open the door to any desired larger vocabulary. Suitable books in Global using familiar phrases and common words and containing a glossary of 5,000 words can be easily printed and sold for 25 cents apiece at a profit. In this way the spoken English words can be heard intelligently by radio receiving sets throughout the entire globe and the voice of America and of English-speaking people make known the value of the new world which is soon to emerge, "When the war drums throb no longer and the battle flags are furled in the parliament of man and the federation of the world."

My dear Victor, may I not beg you and your colleagues in Congress to give your sympathetic cooperation in the war on illiteracy and poverty and in the mechanism to enable the people of all nations to better understand each other and bring about a new world of abundance, peace, and friendly international cooperation. With governmental support English can be made a world language inside of 2 years. When this is done, radio will do the rest with perfect ease and we shall indeed have a new world of understanding and peace.

With kind personal regards,

ROBERT L. OWEN.

What This Country Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the chief exponent of business in this country, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and many other related organizations appear to be seeking a solution of this country's financial and business problems. The desks of the Members of Congress are deluged with communications from these organizations and individuals in every walk of life proposing plans and seeking to influence Congress in support of some particular program.

With all the legislative expedients that have been proposed and tried, I still adhere to the simple formula I have suggested to the national chamber in response to their letter and inquiry with my reply submitted herewith.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, June 21, 1944.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE, M. C.,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WHITE: You are, no doubt, acquainted with the United States Chamber's program on national affairs. Today more than 1,200 local committees are endeavoring to bring to the memberships of local chambers and the public generally unbiased information on national issues. We are not striving to influence public sentiment but, rather, to develop sound convictions on issues of national importance. We have proceeded upon the theory that if our businessmen and citizens generally are in possession of all of the facts upon definite issues, they will in the majority of instances act in the public good. The studies that we have made available to these committees, as you know, dealt with both sides of an issue, with equal attention being given to both sides.

We are planning a rather active summer and fall campaign for these groups and would like very much to provide them with a list of the issues which Members of Congress believe to be the most vital, and which will be determined in the coming 12 months. Because of the truly educational aspects of this program, we felt that you would be willing to give us just a few minutes of your busy day.

Enclosed you will find a check sheet listing several issues which we believe are waiting for solution; there may be others that you would care to add. Won't you check this sheet for us so that we may have the benefit of your thinking on this subject? No signatures are necessary. The only record we will make is whether the check sheet came from a Member of the Senate or the House. A stamped envelope is also enclosed for your convenience.

Awaiting with interest your reply, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. HAZEN,
Executive Assistant,
Department of Governmental Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1944.

Mr. JOHN C. HAZEN,
Executive Assistant, Department of Governmental Affairs, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HAZEN: Answering your inquiry of June 21, what we need and what we must have before your chamber or any other uplift group can get very far in advancing the welfare and prosperity of the country is a program that would give this country a sound, adequate, workable money system that would provide sufficient cash with which to conduct the Nation's business, and a strong Federal Trade Commission with adequate laws to protect free enterprise from the restraints of unfair competition and unfair trade practices—as a means of giving the law of supply and demand the way to bring the price structure into adjustment.

When you and your members recognize this need and are ready to lend assistance to achieving these objectives, I shall be ready and most eager to cooperate to this end.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

Beaver-Mahoning Canalization Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the Rivers and Harbors Subcommittee, Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, May 2, 1944:

Mr. Chairman, in opposing the Beaver-Mahoning canalization project I do not want to be misunderstood as opposing waterway improvement and development for increasing water transportation. In fact, I advocate such development when it can be clearly established that any given project is to promote the general public welfare. There is no evidence that this project is essential to the war effort and its benefits would be enjoyed by a very restricted area. In view of these facts, I question the wisdom of constructing a project of this magnitude in time of war when we have a shortage of manpower and material. If the project is in any way justified, it would be far better to construct it in the post-war period when labor and material more than likely will be looking for a market.

I am pleased to remind you that during this emergency our private transportation facilities have met all demands made upon them. There has not been any serious transportation bottlenecks of long duration. Our railroads have moved greater tonnage and a greater number of passengers, including millions of servicemen, all with reduced personnel, equipment replacements not available, and repair material greatly reduced. The railroads of this country, and this includes both management and labor, have done a miraculous job. Few Americans are fully aware of the enormous job their railroads are doing to help win the war. Railroad labor is the best managed and there has been no labor difficulties such as occurred too frequently in other classes of industry. We Americans should not forget that in successfully handling this war job the railroads are giving another fine example of free enterprise, rising to meet a great national emergency in a way to confound the theorists ready to believe that free, private enterprise has had its day.

The railroads are not seasonable. They move 24 hours a day, 365 days in the year, over snowcapped mountains in subzero weather and across scorching deserts. It would be manifestly unfair and inconsistent, as well as economically unsound, to impose further tax burden upon these facilities and their employees in order to subsidize competition. Hundreds of thousands of our best families are dependent upon them for a source of income. Any disruption to the orderly operation or lessening of employment by these facilities would have a far-reaching effect.

I hope the committee will not approve the project at this time.

What About the Veterans of World War No. 2?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, these are days of peril to millions of our soldier citizens now standing poised on the brink of the invasion. While every contemplative mind realizes the magnitude of the job to be done none for even a moment has any doubt about the ultimate victory.

How well are our boys trained? How well are they equipped and officered for the attack. The answer to those questions is a matter of heartfelt concern to every man, woman, and child in these United States.

Mr. Speaker, these are equally momentous days for the General Staff of our Army and our Navy. For months that staff has been engaged in coordinated strategic planning, directing task maneuvers and training millions of our men for the titanic struggle impending. Of a certainty we in Congress as well as all at home must steel ourselves for news of losses among our troops. That these losses will be kept to an irreducible minimum has already become evident by the unfolding plan of aerial attack and the enemy destruction by air now under way.

I wonder how many realize that each night more than an entire military division numbering from 12,000 to 15,000 men now penetrate 500 miles into the very heart of the enemy stronghold by way of aerial warfare. Think of the hundreds of divisions or millions of men, the length of time it would take and the losses that we would encounter if our infantry and artillery had to fight their way 500 miles across enemy-held and fortified territory to reach objectives, which under the present plan are attacked again and again every few hours by the men of the Air Corps.

Mr. Speaker, the 1,200 to 1,500 bombers that roar out of hangars in England each 24 hours carry with them the equivalent of a division of infantry or of artillery. They have been and are continuing virtually to put thousands of cannons right up against the belly of the German Army every hour of every day. They are blowing the tracks from under the German railroads. They are blasting the waterworks and their bridges off piers and abutments. They are splintering the very floors from under the feet of factory workers in the Nazi munitions and armament factories and production lines.

Mr. Speaker, it is my studied conviction that when the chronicles of this struggle are spread across the pages of history, to the ingenuity, the sagacity and the planning of the General Staff of the United States Army and Navy will go the honor of having won the most brilliant military victory ever to be achieved by any nation in all history.

The process of "softening up" if not actually destroying every possible enemy defense is now under way. How long before the invasion actually begins, if as yet determined, is a matter known only to a few.

Now Mr. Speaker, a great sage once said: "If you want to get a really important thing done quickly, go to a busy man." It is truly comforting and inspiring, to know that even at such a critical time as this, that one charged with carrying a large part of the burden of responsibility of the Armed Service Forces of the United States in all parts of the world, could and would even now for a moment step out of his character as a military leader long enough to bespeak the great humanism which so long characterized him to his brother officers.

I make reference to a speech made a few days ago by Lieutenant General Somervell, the commanding general of the A. S. F. Weighted as he is by the burden of his charge today—it is highly commendable for him to take time, and spend of his energies to pose the problem of troops that he will take back to these United States in a post-war world.

Speaking in behalf of the wounded and discharged soldiers before the Cleveland Advertising Club, General Somervell said in part:

As commanding general of the Army Service Forces of which the Medical Corps is part, I pledge * * * that every soldier * * * will have the finest medical attention possible and * * * that these wounded soldiers of ours have given and will continue to give so much that whatever we attempt to do for them in return will be all too little.

But no matter how skilled our surgeons, no matter how thoughtful and careful our nurses, there is another element in the care of these wounded men for which we must depend on you * * * the people. It is you, their neighbors, who can make these soldiers realize that they are wanted here, that their suffering and their courage and their patriotism have not been unnoticed and unappreciated. You, by your hospitality, can lighten the load these men must bear.

I know that you only await the opportunity to show them and through them the people of America how deeply you appreciate the sacrifices these soldiers have made. The comfort and cheer and the * * * good warm hospitality that you can offer them will be the medicine they most need.

The Army realizes its duty to these men and it will not shirk that duty! Every effort will be made to repair each broken body and make it as nearly whole as is humanly possible. But even when this has been accomplished our responsibility does not end. When medical science has done all it possibly can do, the Army has a further duty to these men. It recognizes its obligation not only to restore them to civil life at the earliest possible moment, but to help them in their efforts to become self-reliant, self-supporting members of their communities.

To that end the Army Medical Department and the Army Service Forces as a whole are working out a program right now, in conjunction with other government agencies, to aid every individual wounded soldier in reestablishing himself in the civilian world. In cooperation with the Veterans' Administration, Selective Service, the Civil Service and United States Employment offices and the American Red Cross, we rapidly are pushing forward our plans.

It isn't the Army's particular task to fit these wounded men for civil life. We are not legally responsible to any man after we discharge him from the hospital and from the service. Our official duty ends with the process of mustering out.

But let me say, here and now, that the Army recognizes its moral obligation to every man wounded in his country's service, and that we're going to see that obligation through to the end. * * * We're not going to let any bureaucratic barriers stand between the returned, wounded soldier and every comfort and every care that it's possible to give him. We're going to help each individual man, not as a case number, not as a card in the files, but as a human being to whom we owe more than we ever can repay. The Army gladly accepts this responsibility and—the Army isn't going to let a single wounded soldier down.

We have recently established in the Army a division of personal affairs. It is designed to give individual, personalized service of whatever kind is needed to our soldiers and our discharged veterans and their families. It's a place to which our men can turn when they are troubled. In time of peace the Army looks out for its own and I see no reason we shouldn't do the same thing in time of war.

We don't intend to usurp the rights or assume the responsibilities of other governmental agencies. There's enough of a job to be done to keep us all busy. We simply intend to act as the advocate of the individual. We intend to supplement the work the other organizations are doing, not to duplicate or try to do their job. We intend to step in quickly in emergencies. We intend to act fast. Every disabled war veteran is going to have every advantage that the Army can give him and he's going to have that advantage right away.

There aren't going to be any soldier apple sellers on the street corners after this war if we can prevent it, and there aren't going to be any wounded soldiers sleeping in parks or lodged in jails. The best we can do for these men isn't good enough, but we will do our best.

I'm not nearly as much concerned about some soldier getting some advantage he doesn't deserve as I am about a wounded soldier not getting all the advantages he does deserve.

What these men have done for us cannot be added up on any cash register. We've got to keep that fact constantly in mind. We've got to remember that they weren't getting any overtime pay for the 24 hours a day they put in on the battlefront. They weren't laying aside any funds for the reconversion of their lives to peacetime activities after the war. And they didn't lay down their guns when conditions got too hard to bear, either.

They just kept on fighting till they couldn't fight any more.

The spirit in which we tackle the job ahead of us is all important. Helping our wounded soldiers is a privilege, not a chore; it is something to look forward to with pleasure, to accomplish with enthusiasm, and to look back on with satisfaction.

Mr. Speaker, in the days to come when we in this House are concerned with the problem of the reconversion and of disposing of Federally owned defense plants, let us remember General Somervell's concern for the men, which he, as Commanding General of the A. S. F., brought into service and trained for battle, and when they had achieved the victory, he brought them back to these States from overseas.

Let us in the spirit in which he spoke remember that the human rights of returning soldiers must be considered far and above the property rights of bond and share holders, even though they be the properties acquired by this Government through the sale of Victory bonds—for without the sacrifices made by our soldiers—both the people and their war plants would have fallen into the bondage of Nazi slavery and supremacy.

Mr. Speaker, let us in this House all join to make good General Somervell's pledge that:

There aren't going to be any soldier apple sellers on the street corners after this war if we can prevent it, and there aren't going to be any wounded soldiers sleeping in parks or lodged in jails. The best we can do for these men isn't good enough, but we will do our best.

Two Great Compacts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, we trace proudly the history of our country back to the Mayflower Compact signed by a group of the very first intrepid settlers of this great continent. Those people were called Pilgrims and their landing upon Plymouth Rock is one of the proudest moments in the history of our country.

It is, I think, significant that throughout the Nation members of the Congregational, Christian, and some other churches are now signing, in the interest of world peace, a world-order compact patterned after the historic Mayflower Compact.

This world-order compact was recently signed by all the members of the Community Church at Claremont, California. Among those signing this compact at Claremont were a considerable number of people who make their residence in what is known as Pilgrim Place, a group of homes set aside for retired Christian missionaries. It is also significant that whereas the Mayflower Compact was signed on the rock-bound coast of New England at the eastern extremity of our great country, the signing of this world-order compact by the particular group about whom I am speaking, took place on the shores of the Pacific Ocean.

It is most earnestly to be hoped that the same spirit which guided the first Pilgrims to a safe landing upon Plymouth Rock, may likewise inspire us, that we, led by such devoted people as the residents of Pilgrim Place, may in this modern day establish a true and lasting peace and thus carry forward worthily the work begun here in America by those Pilgrims who first ventured here to build a new world of peace and freedom.

Address by the Secretary of the Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. STERLING COLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by James Forrestal, Secretary of the Navy, at a special convocation of Princeton University, June 21, 1944:

Up to today I had always assumed that when any man reached the phase where he received academic degrees without solid scholarly accomplishment he was an obvious candidate for the stuffed shirt club, or, to use the classical name for it, societas pseudo-optimatum, meaning the society of the pompous.

When President Dodds reported the great honor conferred upon me by the board of trustees I demurred because of my belief that the degrees of a great university should be reserved for scholars and gentlemen. I pointed out that I was certainly not a scholar and there was a great deal of dubiety about my being a gentleman. Dr. Dodds, however, with that gentle but firm authority that has characterized his career as the head of Princeton, mildly suggested that I leave the propriety of such awards to the judgment of the trustees, implying possibly that this was one local power not yet garnered by the bureaucrats of Washington. There was no further argument, and so here I am.

One of the collateral advantages to the recipient of such an honor is that, in addition to the honor itself, it is customary for him to make some observations which may or may not prove beneficial to society. I propose to take brief advantage of this. I assume that this audience was not collected by force and that those who succumb to boredom have ready access to many exits.

UPS AND DOWNS BETWEEN WARS

In the 25 years between the first World War and the second, this country went through alternate phases of enlarged ego and abnormal inferiority. In the twenties we thought we had found the answer to the problem of full employment for our people and economic security for the individual—that we were at the beginning of a constantly rising curve of prosperity. In the decade that followed we were attacked by grave misgivings about our economic system and even by some misgivings about our Government, call it democracy, representative-republican government, or what you will.

At times there were even evidences of admiration of Hitler's Germany and Mussolini's Italy. Efficiency, always appealing to the American mind, seemed to be associated with their concepts of government. What those who praised them overlooked was that it was efficiency gained at the sacrifice of human and spiritual values without which the foundations of the state become rotted timber.

There were misgivings about the ability of democracies to fight, to wage war against these superefficient States. Yet democracy has proved to be a match for, and will prove to be the master of, these supermen and their war machines. It was a democracy, England, that "precious stone set in the silver sea," that stood alone between Hitler and a conquered Europe in 1940.

The Russians, after the Germans hit them in 1941, took the full impact of the German power, struck back with a fury and ferocity that amazed the world, and shattered Hitler's great dream of a drive to the east.

But let us never forget it was the little island of England in the summer of 1940 and in the hard and bitter months of 1941 that bore the full brunt of the German Luftwaffe and finally drove it out of the English skies. The pitifully small but gallant forces that England could spare for the campaigns in Greece, Crete, and north Africa were decimated and battered, but never beaten. Let us not forget that although, as someone said to me in London, in that bleak winter of 1941 "there was no light in the tunnel of darkness," the fires of the English spirit never died.

DEMOCRACY IN TRIUMPHANT ACTION

That was democracy. That was the despised, weak and spineless country which the Germans had decided must vanish before the thundering machine of German efficiency. The glorious deeds of the Russian Army can never be forgotten, but it does not detract from its achievement to remind ourselves that it was the English people and the English will that baffled Hitler.

In the Orient another dictatorship, another of the efficient Fascist governments, was preparing a blow against another democracy. The Japanese looked upon us as a great sprawling people afraid to fight, afraid to die, a people who thought of our purses rather than of our honor. At the prepared moment, December 7, 1941, the Japanese struck, while Fascist partners applauded.

And what did this democracy of ours do? It shook itself from its isolation and insulation, took a mighty breath, and went to work. Two years later it had trained and equipped a huge army and a strategic air force greater than that of any other nation. It had built a navy in terms of both sea and air power greater than the combined naval strengths of the rest of the nations of the world. While doing this it turned out munitions of war for its allies as well as itself; it produced ships and material that enabled the British and ourselves to harry the German submarine from the Atlantic; it equipped divisions of the renascent French Army; it helped to feed the peoples of our allies and of North Africa and Italy; it chased—and I say that advisedly in the light of today's news—the Japanese Navy out of the Pacific back close to its home waters and it will continue to chase them.

All of this was done by a nation functioning under that supposedly weak form of government, a democratic government.

These two impotent democracies, England and America, sustained the violent attack of enemies which had been arming for two decades, took the shock, and came back to begin the march with their great Russian ally to the victory which is now in process.

Democracies have proved that they can withstand the shocks of war. Is there reason to lack confidence that with equal will and with equal sacrifice they can withstand the shocks of peace?

AMERICAN ECONOMY SWAMPS AXIS

I have said that in the 25 years between the two World Wars there had grown up misgivings about our Government and about our economy. Neither was perfect, but I submit that they are the rock against which the Axis forces have struck and been splintered. The economy of the United States, even that sometimes abused sphere of activity known as business, produced an industrial organization and a productive machine which have been able to pour out the torrent of weapons which today is swamping our enemies, and I mean that literally. Those vulgar people known as business men, those brash and indecent characters who write advertising to stimulate consumption and create customers—they had created demands and markets which had developed American factories to a productive power that even the national socialism of Hitler, with the full might of his government back of him, could not match.

The American economy and American business in time past built railroads, utilities, created a market for 5,000,000 motor cars, laid the foundations of a gigantic steel industry—and every one of these industrial units has contributed to the winning of the war. They are the framework and the fabric upon which our vast production has been based.

And American labor, which during wartime has been evolving its position in our society, has been awakening to the responsibility which new privileges and power have given it—free American labor has worked in a way that the Axis nations, using the Gestapo and the machine gun as incentives, could not match.

Should we assume that this system which rolled back the tide of the new barbarians of the twentieth century, should we assume that this economy, this Government, will fail in peace?

I don't believe we need make any such assumption. The times ahead are full of varied and complex problems, but they are certainly no darker than those days in the winter of 1941 when, as I have said before, for the British there was no light in the tunnel.

But if democracy is to work when we undertake to wage peace instead of waging war, there are certain affirmations we need to make to ourselves. When we no longer have the driving urge of our national safety to give us unity and common will, there are certain things we shall have to do to give our democracy the health and vigor to meet the great problems of peace. I shall touch on only a few.

PEACETIME NEEDS OUTLINED

First. We shall need to maintain a strong economy. By that I mean an economy healthy in terms of employment, with wages adequate to maintain the consuming power of our 135,000,000 people; an atmosphere of confidence in which businessmen can take those ventures upon which a sound economy must rest; a realization on the part of labor of its new powers and responsibilities and willingness of labor wisely to use that power and to meet those responsibilities.

The Government must do its part, and it will be a big part, in making the transition from war to peace. It must keep some of the controls exercised in war, but it should keep them for as short a time as possible. It may have to make bold and imaginative use of Government credit, but it must do so with the objective of getting the wheels of private enterprise turning as quickly as may be. It must use its powers, which include the use of credit, not with the objective of creating the state socialism which started Hitler and Mussolini on their road to power and ruin, but to return our economy to the general framework of individual effort upon which the country has been built.

Second. We must recognize that we shall be one of the three great anchors of stability in the world. We must continue to be good neighbors, but our good neighborliness must rest upon sound conditions at home, without which the wish to help our neighbors may be an idle wish.

Third. We must face the fact that whether we like it or not we are not immune from the disease of war wherever and whenever war starts in the world. We must face the fact that an act of aggression against China, Poland, or France, or any other country, automatically becomes an act of aggression against ourselves, because such acts are committed by men and nations who recognize only the law of might. We must not allow our own idealism and our hope for a permanent quarantine of war to persuade us to disarm.

WORLD COOPERATION FOR PEACE

Fourth. We must face the fact that while the guaranty of permanent peace can be obtained finally only by some form of world cooperation, it cannot come overnight or spring full-blown from the ideal itself. We must realize that such an organization will have to be built brick by brick. In other words, I suggest that we move surely rather than too swiftly in the building of an international organization which is to provide a permanent framework for peace among nations. There must be some general outline of a pattern toward which we move, but it should be a pattern sufficiently elastic to accommodate itself to reality rather than to force realities into a rigid and inelastic plan. The stairway to the goal of perfect human relations, whether between men or nations, cannot be compassed in a single leap.

Fifth. We must face the fact that while this organization is in the process of construction peace may be obtainable only through the existence of the armed force of the United States and her allies. As Prime Minister Smuts has said, "Peace without power remains a dream." And I suggest here what I am sure you will agree with, that one of the great elements in the pattern of our military power will be that service which I have the high honor to serve, the sea and air power of the United States Navy. We must not destroy our existing naval power when the war is over, or accept limitations upon our ability to add to it, either qualitatively or quantitatively, while others who have no real faith in the possibility of world peace are left free to arm.

Sixth. We must provide the means in some way to create a greater number of trained public servants, men whose task it will be not to create policy but to master the facts and to correlate and state the facts upon which policy is based. This problem must be faced in terms of providing adequate pay, a position of prestige, and retirement security. By so doing I think it is not impossible that we can obtain for the public service men with the same high standards of ability and character as are attracted to service in the Army and Navy.

I suggest we start by increasing the pay and prestige of those who represent us in the Congress of the United States, and that we think twice before we too quickly and too casually reproach these men or subject them to thoughtless pressures. We cannot expect devoted service and high patriotism unless the men we elect to public office can stand or fall on great, not petty, issues.

We face a world in which we must conduct ourselves as adults and not as adolescents. It will be a world which will move at a higher tempo and will not permit us to leave all things to chance rather than to plan. This will require sincere, thoughtful, and wise men in the Congress, and trained men in continuing positions of the executive departments.

Finally, we must see to it that institutions such as this university, with a history closely intertwined with that of the Nation itself, shall have adequate scope for development and service. I am a believer in the part the privately endowed liberal arts college has to play in the Nation and in the world. I believe in it now with a greater conviction than I did when I was a student on this campus. The Navy during this war has seen a great need for specialized and technical training, but it has also recognized the need for developing the character upon which leadership must rest.

In recent years there has been some tendency to introduce sweeping changes in the methods of education; it has gone so far as to be termed in some quarters a "revolution" in education. I am not quite sure what it is designed to achieve, except that I gather in some way it will produce greater scholarship and a more perfectly balanced human thinking machine.

Some of this goes so far as to ridicule games and competitive athletics as a valuable part of college life. I think that these undoubtedly qualified and able proponents of such changes overlook some of the foundations upon which education must be built. The concept of education, it seems to me, means not merely the creation of a good mind, but also a sound body. I am sure that every hour spent at Princeton in games and athletics, whether intercollegiate or intramural, has been productive of practical good for the Nation.

TARAWA CITED AS EXAMPLE

I am reminded of a saying of Admiral Stark, that "guts as well as guns are necessary to win battles." No one can deny that the bruising contacts of football and the physical and spiritual discipline that goes with it have assisted our men in many lands and on many seas. I went to Tarawa last winter, and even though I arrived long after it had been taken, I still could see the intricate and efficient network of defenses built by the Japs, and I marveled at the cold and unflinching courage that drove the marines of the glorious Second Division ashore in the face of the murderous fire of those defenses.

Those qualities are not attributable solely either to a superefficient mental training or to physical development. They come from the combination of the two, which create character—character which can face death against high odds when the chips are down.

The liberal arts college is one of the foundations upon which our democracy is built. It may have to receive some financial aid from the Federal Government, but that aid must never carry with it a mortgage upon intellectual and spiritual freedom. It will help and be helped by the State universities. Its curriculum must return, if our Navy experience is any index, to certain basic compulsory courses rather than allowing complete freedom of selection to its students. It must recover its ability to turn out men soundly trained in mathematics and sciences as well as in the broadening humanities. There may be some argument on this, but I would even like to see Greek and Latin restored to their ancient glory.

The liberal arts college such as Princeton, drawing as it does its students from every State in the Union, embodying, as I know from my own experience on its campus, the broadest and most generous principles of democracy, must continue if a free and developing America is to continue.

American Slovaks of New York Support Fourth War Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, during the Fourth War Loan drive, thousands of American Slovaks of the State of New York raised over half a million dollars as a result of their energetic, patriotic campaign to do their bit for their country. One of the purposes of the campaign was for the purchase of a Flying Fortress to be named "Slovaks of New York State."

Again, under the leadership of the Reverend Florian C. Billy, O. M. C., pastor of SS. Cyril and Methodius Church, Schenectady, N. Y., State chairman of this drive, American men and women of Slavic descent are demonstrating their loyalty to their country by a house-to-house canvass to raise $6,000,000 in as short a time as possible. From the Thirtieth Congressional District of the State of New York, comprising the counties of Hamilton, Montgomery, Fulton, and Schenectady, canvassers are daily reaching into the homes of various individuals, working toward the completion of the drive. Since the previous drive, many of the sons and daughters of these loyal Americans, who were then serving their country in the armed forces, have paid the supreme sacrifice for their devotion to duty and country. Many of them have performed deeds of valor and heroism that have brought from their superior officers words of praise and commendation. It is thrilling to be able to publicly speak of the patriotic services rendered their country by these individuals, and to place upon the records of their country a testimonial of fidelity and patriotism.

International Monetary Fund Debate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES S. DEWEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. DEWEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by Lord Keynes on the international monetary fund debate, House of Lords, May 23, 1944:

My Lords, it is almost exactly a year since the proposals for a Clearing Union were discussed in your Lordship's House. I hope to persuade your Lordships that the year has not been ill-spent. There were, it is true, certain features of elegance, clarity, and logic in the Clearing Union plan which have disappeared. And this, by me at least, is to be much regretted. As a result, however, there is no longer any need for a new-fangled international monetary unit. Your Lordships will remember how little any of us liked the names proposed—bancor, unitas, dolphin, bezant, daric, and heaven knows what. Some of your Lordships were good enough to join in the search for something better. I recall a story of a country parish in the last century where they were accustomed to give their children Biblical names—Amos, Ezekiel, Obadiah and so forth. Needing a name for a dog, after a long and vain search of the Scriptures they called the dog "Moreover." We hit no such happy solution, with the result that it has been the dog that died. The loss of the dog we need not too much regret, though I still think that it was a more thoroughbred animal than what has now come out from a mixed marriage of ideas. Yet, perhaps, as sometimes occurs, this dog of mixed origin is a sturdier and more serviceable animal and will prove not less loyal and faithful to the purposes for which it has been bred.

I commend the new plan to your Lordships as being, in some important respects (to which I will return later), a considerable improvement on either of its parents. I like this new plan and I believe that it will work to our advantage. Your Lordships will not wish me to enter into too much technical detail. I can best occupy the time available by examining the major benefits this country may hope to gain from the plan; and whether there are adequate safeguards against possible disadvantages. We shall emerge from this war, having won a more solid victory over our enemies, a more enduring friendship from our allies, and a deeper respect from the world at large, than perhaps at any time in our history. The victory, the friendship, and the respect will have been won, because, in spite of faint-hearted preparations, we have sacrificed every precaution for the future in the interests of immediate strength with a fanatical single-mindedness which has had few parallels. But the full price of this has still to be paid. I wish that this was more generally appreciated in the country than it is. In thus waging the war without counting the ultimate cost we—and we alone of the United Nations—have burdened ourselves with a weight of deferred indebtedness to other countries beneath which we shall stagger. We have already given to the common cause all, and more than all, that we can afford. It follows that we must examine any financial plan to make sure that it will help us to carry our burdens and not add to them. No one is more deeply convinced of this than I am. I make no complaint, therefore, that those to whom the details of the scheme are new and difficult, should scrutinize them with anxious concern.

What, then, are these major advantages that I hope from the plan to the advantage of this country? First, it is clearly recognized and agreed that, during the post-war transitional period of uncertain duration, we are entitled to retain any of those wartime restrictions, and special arrangements with the sterling area and others which are helpful to us, without being open to the charge of acting contrary to any general engagements into which we have entered. Having this assurance, we can make our plans for the most difficult days which will follow the war, knowing where we stand and without risk of giving grounds of offense. This is a great gain—and one of the respects in which the new plan is much superior to either of its predecessors, which did not clearly set forth any similar safeguards.

Second, when this period is over and we are again strong enough to live year by year on our own resources, we can look forward to trading in a world of national currencies which are interconvertible. For a great commercial Nation like ourselves this is indispensable for full prosperity. Sterling itself, in due course, must obviously become, once again, generally convertible. For, without this, London must necessarily lose its international position, and the arrangements in particular of the sterling area would fall to pieces. To suppose that a system of bilateral and barter agreements, with no one who owns sterling knowing just what he can do with it—to suppose that this is the best way of encouraging the Dominions to center their financial systems on London, seems to me pretty near frenzy. As a technique of little Englandism, adopted as a last resort when all else has failed us, with this small country driven to autarchy, keeping itself to itself in a harsh and unfriendly world, it might make more sense. But those who talk this way, in the expectation that the rest of the Commonwealth will throw in their lot on these lines and cut their free commercial relations with the rest of the world, can have very little idea how this Empire has grown or by what means it can be sustained.

So far from an international plan endangering the long tradition, by which most Empire countries, and many other countries, too, have centered their financial systems in London, the plan is, in my judgment, an indispensable means of maintaining this tradition. With our own resources so greatly impaired and encumbered, it is only if sterling is firmly placed in an international setting that the necessary confidence in it can be sustained. Indeed, even during the transitional period, it will be our policy, I hope, steadily to develop the field within which sterling is freely available as rapidly as we can manage. Now, if our own goal is, as it surely must be, the general interconvertibility of sterling with other currencies, it must obviously be to our trading advantage that the same obtains elsewhere, so that we can sell our exports in one country and freely spend the proceeds in any other. It is a great gain to us, in particular, that other countries in the world should agree to refrain from those discriminatory exchange practices which we ourselves have never adopted in times of peace but from which in the recent past our traders have suffered greatly at the hands of others. My noble friend, Lord Addison, has asked whether such an arrangement could be operated in such a way that certain markets might be closed to British exports. I can firmly assure him that none of the monetary proposals will do so, provided that if we find ourselves with currencies in a foreign country which we do not choose to spend in that country, we can then freely remit them somewhere else to buy goods in another country. There is no compulsion on us, and if we choose to come to a particular bargain in the country where we have resources, then that is entirely at our discretion.

Third, the wheels of trade are to be oiled by what is, in effect, a great addition to the world's stock of monetary reserves, distributed, moreover, in a reasonable way. The quotas are not so large as under the Clearing Union, and Lord Addison drew attention to that. But they are substantial and can be increased subsequently if the need is shown. The aggregate for the world is put provisionally at £2,500,000,000. Our own share of this—for ourselves and the Crown Colonies which, I may mention, are treated for all purposes as a part of the British monetary system (in itself a useful acknowledgment)—is £325,000,000, a sum which may easily double, or more than double, the reserves which we shall otherwise hold at the end of the transitional period. The separate quotas of the rest of the sterling area will make a further large addition to this. Who is so confident of the future that he will wish to throw away so comfortable a supplementary aid in time of trouble? Do the critics think it preferable, if the winds of the trade cycle blow, to diminish our demand for imports by increasing unemployment at home, rather than meet the emergency out of this fund which will be expressly provided for such temporary purposes?

I emphasize that such is the purpose of the quotas. They are not intended as daily food for us or any other country to live upon during the reconstruction or afterwards. Provision for that belongs to another chapter of international cooperation, upon which we shall embark shortly unless you discourage us unduly about this one. The quotas for drawing on the fund's resources are an iron ration to tide over temporary emergencies of one kind or another. Perhaps this is the best reply I can make to Lord Addison's doubts whether our quota is large enough. It is obviously not large enough for us to live upon during the reconstruction period. But this is not its purpose. Pending further experience, it is, in my judgment, large enough for the purposes for which it is intended.

There is another advantage to which I would draw your Lordships' special attention. A proper share of responsibility for maintaining equilibrium in the balance of international payments is squarely placed on the creditor countries. This is one of the major improvements in the new plan. The Americans, who are the most likely to be affected by this, have, of their own free will and honest purpose, offered us a far-reaching formula of protection against a recurrence of the main cause of deflation during the interwar years, namely, the draining of reserves out of the rest of the world to pay a country which was obstinately borrowing and exporting on a scale immensely greater than it was lending and importing. Under clause VI of the plan a country engages itself, in effect, to prevent such a situation from arising again, by promising, should it fail, to release other countries from any obligation to take its exports, or, if taken, to pay for them. I cannot imagine that this sanction would ever be allowed to come into effect. If by no other means, than by lending, the creditor country will always have to find a way to square the account on imperative grounds of its own self-interest. For it will no longer be entitled to square the account by squeezing gold out of the rest of us. Here we have a voluntary undertaking, genuinely offered in the spirit both of a good neighbor and, I should add, of enlightened self-interest, not to allow a repetition of a chain of events which between the wars did more than any other single factor to destroy the world's economic balance and to prepare a seedbed for foul growths. This is a tremendous extension of international cooperation to good ends. I pray your Lordships to pay heed to its importance.

Fifth, the plan sets up an international institution with substantial rights and duties to preserve orderly arrangements in matters such as exchange rates which are two-ended and affect both parties alike, which can also serve as a place of regular discussion between responsible authorities to find ways to escape those many unforeseeable dangers which the future holds. The noble lord, Lord Addison, asks how the fund is to be managed. Admittedly, this is not yet worked out in the necessary detail and it was right that he should stress the point. But three points which may help him are fairly clear. This is an organization between governments, in which central banks only appear as the instrument and agent of their government. The voting power of the British Commonwealth and that of the United States are expected to be approximately equal. The management will be in three tiers, a body of expert, whole-time officials who will be responsible for the routine; a small board of management which will make all decisions of policy subject to any overriding instructions from the assembly; an assembly of all the member governments, meeting less often and retaining a supervisory, but not an executive, control. That is perhaps even a little better than appears.

Here are five advantages of major importance. The proposals go far beyond what, even a short time ago, anyone could have conceived of as a possible basis of general international agreement. What alternative is open to us which gives comparable aid, or better, more hopeful opportunities for the future? I have considerable confidence that something very like this plan will be in fact adopted, if only on account of the plain demerits of the alternative of rejection. You can talk against this plan, so long as it is a matter of talking—saying in the same breath that it goes too far and that it does not go far enough; that it is too rigid to be safe and that it is too loose to be worth anything. But it would require great foolhardiness to reject it, much more foolhardiness than is to be found in this wise, intuitive country.

Therefore, for these manifold and substantial benefits I commend the monetary proposals to your lordships. Nevertheless, before you will give them your confidence, you will wish to consider whether, in return, we are surrendering anything which is vital for the ordering of our domestic affairs in the manner we intend for the future. My Lords, the experience of the years before the war has led most of us, though some of us late in the day, to certain firm conclusions. Three, in particular, are highly relevant to this discussion. We are determined that in future the external value of sterling shall conform to its internal value as set by our own domestic policies and not the other way round. Secondly, we intend to retain control of our domestic rate of interest, so that we can keep it as low as suits our own purposes, without interference from the ebb and flow of international capital movements or flights of hot money. Thirdly, whilst we intend to prevent inflation at home, we will not accept deflation at the dictate of influences from outside. In other words, we abjure the instruments of bank rate and credit contraction operating through the increase of unemployment as a means of forcing our domestic economy into line with external factors.

Have those responsible for the monetary proposals been sufficiently careful to preserve these principles from the possibility of interference? I hope your Lordships will trust me not to have turned my back on all I have fought for. To establish those three principles which I have just stated has been my main task for the last 20 years. Sometimes almost alone, in popular articles in the press, in pamphlets, in dozens of letters to the Times, in textbooks, in enormous and obscure treatises I have spent my strength to persuade my countrymen and the world at large to change their traditional doctrines and, by taking better thought, to remove the curse of unemployment. Was it not I, when many of today's iconoclasts were still worshippers of the calf, who wrote that "Gold is a barbarous relic"? Am I so faithless, so forgetful, so senile that at the very moment of the triumph of these ideas when, with gathering momentum, governments, Parliaments, banks, the press, the public, and even economists have at last accepted the new doctrines, I go off to help forge new chains to hold us fast in the old dungeon? I trust, my lords, that you will not believe it.

Let me take first the less prominent of the two issues which arise in this connection. Namely, our power to control the domestic rate of interest so as to secure a cheap money. Not merely as a feature of the transition, but as a permanent arrangement, the plan accords to every member Government the explicit right to control all capital movements. What used to be a heresy is now endorsed as orthodox. In my own judgment, countries which avail themselves of this right may find it nesessary to scrutinize all transactions, so as to prevent evasion of capital regulations. Provided that the innocent, current transactions are let through, there is nothing in the plan to prevent this. In fact, it is encouraged. It follows that our right to control the domestic capital market is secured on firmer foundations than ever before, and is formally accepted as a proper part of agreed international arrangements.

The question, however, which has recently been given chief prominence is whether we are in any sense returning to the disabilities of the former gold standard, relief from which we have rightly learned to prize so highly. If I have any authority to pronounce on which is and what is not the essence and meaning of a gold standard, I should say that this plan is the exact opposite of it. The plan in its relation to gold is, indeed, very close to proposals which I advocated in vain as the right alternative, when I was bitterly opposing this country's return to gold. The gold standard, as I understand it, means a system under which the external value of a national currency is rigidly tied to a fixed quantity of gold which can only honorably be broken under force majeure; and it involves a financial policy which compels the internal value of the domestic currency to conform to this external value as fixed in terms of gold. On the other hand, the use of gold merely as a convenient common denominator by means of which the relative values of national currencies—these being free to change—are expressed from time to time, is obviously quite another matter.

My noble friend, Lord Addison, asks who fixes the value of gold. If he means, as I assume he does, the sterling value of gold, it is we, ourselves, who fix it initially in consultation with the fund; and this value is subject to change at any time on our initiative, changes in excess of 10 percent requiring the approval of the fund, which must not withhold approval if our domestic equilibrium requires it. There must be some price for gold; and so long as gold is used as a monetary reserve it is most advisable that the current rates of exchange and the relative values of gold in different currencies should correspond. The only alternative to this would be the complete demonetization of gold. I am not aware that anyone has proposed that. For it is only common sense as things are today to continue to make use of gold and its prestige as a means of settling international accounts. To demonetize gold would obviously be highly objectionable to the British Commonwealth and to Russia as the main producers, and to the United States and the western allies as the main holders of it. Surely no one disputes that. On the other hand, in this country we have already dethroned gold as the fixed standard of value. The plan not merely confirms the dethronement but approves it by expressly providing that it is the duty of the fund to alter the gold value of any currency if it is shown that this will be serviceable to equilibrium.

In fact, the plan introduces in this respect an epoch-making innovation in an international instrument, the object of which is to lay down sound and orthodox principles, for instead of maintaining the principle that the internal value of a national currency should conform to a prescribed de jure external value, it provides that its external value should be altered if necessary so as to conform to whatever defacto internal value results from domestic policies, which themselves shall be immune from criticism by the fund. Indeed, it is made the duty of the fund to approve changes which will have this effect. That is why I say that these proposals are the exact opposite of the gold standard. They lay down by international agreement the essence of the new doctrine, far removed from the old orthodoxy. If they do so in terms as inoffensive as possible to the former faith, need we complain?

No, my Lords, in recommending these proposals I do not blot a page already written. I am trying to help write a new page. Public opinion is now converted to a new model, and I believe a much improved model, of domestic policy. That battle is all but won. Yet a not less difficult task still remains, namely, to organize an international setting within which the new domestic policies can occupy a comfortable place. Therefore, it is above all as providing an international framework for the new ideas and the new techniques associated with the policy of full employment that these proposals are not least to be welcomed.

Last week my noble friend, Lord Bennett, asked what assumptions the experts might be making about other phases of international agreement. I do not believe that the soundness of these foundations depends very much on the details of the superstructure. If the rest of the issues to be discussed are wisely settled, the task of the monetary fund will be rendered easier. But if we gain less assistance from other measures than we now hope, an agreed machinery of adjustment on the monetary side will be all the more necessary. I am certain that this is not a case of putting the cart before the horse. I think it most unlikely that fuller knowledge about future commercial policy would in itself make it necessary to alter any clause whatever in the proposals now before your Lordships' House. But if the noble Viscount meant that these proposals need supplementing in other directions, no one could agree with him more than I do. In particular, it is urgent that we should seek agreement about setting up an international investment institution to provide funds for reconstruction and afterward. It is precisely because there is so much to do in the way of international collaboration in the economic field that it would be so disastrous to discourage this first attempt, or to meet it in a carping, suspicious, or cynical mood.

The noble Lord, Lord Addison, has called the attention of your Lordships to the striking statement made by Mr. Hull in connection with the National Foreign Trade Week in the United States, and I am very glad that he did so. This statement is important as showing that the policy of the United States Administration on various issues of political and economic preparation forms a connected whole. I am certain that the people of this country are of the same mind as Mr. Hull, and I have complete confidence that he on his side will seek to implement the details with disinterestedness and generosity. If the experts of the American and British Treasuries have pursued the monetary discussions with more ardor, with a clearer purpose and, I think, with more success so far than has yet proved possible with other associated matters, need we restrain them? If, however, there is a general feeling, as I think that there is, that discussion on other matters should be expedited, so that we may have a complete picture before us, I hope that your Lordships will enforce this conclusion in no uncertain terms. I myself have never supposed that in the final outcome the monetary proposals should stand by themselves.

It is on this note of emphasizing the importance of furthering all genuine efforts directed toward international agreement in the economic field that I should wish to end my contribution to this debate. The proposals which are before your Lordships are the result of the collaboration of many minds and the fruit of the collective wisdom of the experts of many nations. I have spent many days and weeks in the past year in the company of experts of this country, of the Dominions, of our European Allies and of the United States; and, in the light of some past experience I affirm that these discussions have been without exception a model of what such gatherings should be—objective, understanding, without waste of time or expense of temper. I dare to speak for the much abused so-called experts. I even venture sometimes to prefer them, without intending any disrespect, to politicians. The common love of truth, bred of a scientific habit of mind, is the closest of bonds between the representatives of divers nations.

I wish I could draw back the veil of anonymity and give their due to the individuals of the most notable group with which I have ever been associated, covering half the nations of the world, who from prolonged and difficult consultations, each with their own interests to protect, have emerged, as we all of us know and feel in our hearts, a band of brothers. I should like to pay a particular tribute to the representatives of the United States Treasury and the State Department and the Federal Reserve Board in Washington, whose genuine and ready consideration for the difficulties of others, and whose idealistic and unflagging pursuit of a better international order, made possible so great a measure of agreement. I at any rate have come out from a year thus spent greatly encouraged, encouraged beyond all previous hope and expectation, about the possibility of just and honorable and practical economic arrangements between nations.

Do not discourage us. Perhaps we are laying the first brick, though it may be a colorless one, in a great edifice. If, indeed, it is our purpose to draw back from international cooperation and to pursue an altogether different order of ideas, the sooner that this is made clear the better; but that, I believe, is the policy of only a small minority, and for my part I am convinced that we cannot on those terms remain a great power and the mother of a commonwealth. If, on the other hand, such is not our purpose, let us clear our minds of excessive doubts and suspicions and go forward cautiously by all means, but with the intention of reaching agreement.

Who Can Answer This Question?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, for many weeks I have been endeavoring to find someone among the Bye Boys or the bright young economists who could give one single reason why more milk subsidy per hundredweight is paid in one State than is paid in another State.

The planners even have two different subsidies within one State.

The following letter shows the subsidies by States:

WAR FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, June 19, 1944.

Hon. REID F. MURRAY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR REID: This is in reply to your letter of June 3, requesting a list of the dairy production payment rates in the various States and the rates proposed beginning September 1, 1944.

The rates on butterfat are now 6 cents per pound in all States. They will be increased to 10 cents per pound in all States on September 1, 1944.

On whole milk sold, the rates per hundred pounds now vary from 35 cents to 65 cents, with the following States in the indicated rate zones:

1. Thirty-five cents: Tennessee (except 2 counties), Idaho (except 10 counties), Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Kentucky.

2. Forty-five cents: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Alabama (except 2 counties), Mississippi, Louisiana, 2 counties in southwestern Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, California (except 8 counties), Oregon, Washington, and 10 counties in northern Idaho.

3. Fifty-five cents: Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and 8 counties in southern California.

4. Sixty-five cents: North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and 2 counties in southern Alabama.

All of these rates on milk will be increased by 25 cents per hundred pounds on September 1, 1944, to levels of 60, 70, 80, and 90 cents for the areas indicated.

Sincerely yours,

MARVIN JONES,
Administrator.

Mr. Speaker, the place to get increased milk production for the Nation is where they have the cows, where they have the families to care for them, instead of where they depend upon $200 per month hired help; and where they have the equipment and transportation needed to handle and process the product. It is hoped that sometime, somewhere, someone will realize there is not much in 100 pounds of milk that is not in 10 pounds of cheese, 50 cans of evaporated milk, or in 5 pounds of butter, plus 8 pounds of powdered skim milk.

The difference in subsidies is all the more questionable when one realizes that the States receiving the large subsidies had a ceiling on protein feeds as much as $10 per ton less than the fixed ceiling price on protein feeds in the States receiving the smaller subsidies. Such unfair procedures may be in keeping with the wishes of the Governor of North Carolina, but they do not make sense to one who believes in rulings and laws for all and not for the few.

Should We Lend-Lease the New Deal Purge?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JESSIE SUMNER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker should we lend-lease the New Deal purge?

Apparently the new dealers including the State Department have started to try to purge members of the British Parliament for saying the same thing some of us Members of the United States Congress said at the time about the way President Roosevelt was dragging our country into war before Pearl Harbor.

Perhaps international alienation of affections can be averted if it is pointed out now that the purge did not work successfully against Americans—indeed, quite the contrary. Probably it will not work against the British either. The purge in Britain might be quite a job because Sir Oliver Lyttelton will not be the only member of Parliament, nor even the only member of the Cabinet, unable to repress his feelings. For instance, the Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill, in effect said the same thing in Parliament on January 28, 1942, as follows:

> It has been the policy of the cabinet at almost all costs to avoid embroilment with Japan until we were sure that the United States would also be engaged. On the other hand, the probability since the Atlantic Conference, at which I discussed these matters with President Roosevelt, that the United States, even if not herself attacked, would come into the war in the Far East and thus make the final victory assured, seemed to allay some of these anxieties, and that expectation has not been falsified by the events.

In other words they "planned it that way."

Can You Explain This?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the cheese industry in Wisconsin has made every effort to increase production, but there are so many performances taking place in the various governmental agencies it is most difficult for the industry to maintain itself.

In 1942 we saw the United States Department of Agriculture promise one thing and do another; we saw the Food Distribution Administration arbitrarily take 3 cents per pound off the price of cheese after the producer was given certain definite promises. We saw the Secretary of Agriculture fix the price of cheese in December 1942 without consulting the cheesemakers, the farmer, or the industry when the law stated that he should. The O. P. A., through its freight-rate set-up, arranged prices so that some States get 2 cents per pound more for their cheese than Wisconsin farmers. We now see, and have seen, the War Food Administration pay a milk subsidy in some States of 65 cents per hundredweight, and in Wisconsin they pay 35 cents, or on a 10-pound-per-hundredweight-cheese yield per 100 pounds of milk—an advantage of 30 cents per hundredweight, or 3 cents per pound for the cheese. I ask if there is any reason to be surprised to learn that while some other States show an increase in cheese production, Wisconsin is either just holding its own or falling below last year's production figures?

Is it any surprise to find the following classified ad in the June 15, 1944, issue of the Waupaca County Post of Waupaca, Wis.:

> Wanted: Two licensed cheesemakers, American cheddar, work in California, family transportation paid, $200 per month, Army production work at present, post-war security, W. M. C. rules apply. Apply United States Employment Service, City Hall, Appleton, Wis.

If California is provided a larger subsidy for milk and is set up to receive 2 cents more per pound for its cheese, as a result of the rail charge differential, is it any wonder that they can use the United States Employment Service to get them some cheesemakers from Wisconsin, where the governmental agencies have put their unfair and senseless rulings into operation? After these unfair rulings have been set up is it not all the more ridiculous to see another governmental agency, such as the U. S. E. S., to which millions of dollars have been appropriated to solve the manpower problem, become a party to such an unjust approach to the problem of food production. It becomes more apparent each day that we have too many fiber boys carrying on the food program. This should be given the personal attention of the Manpower Commissioner.

Nearly 200 small cheese factories have already been closed in Wisconsin and additional closings can be expected as the planners entice the needed supply of Wisconsin cheesemakers to other States where the governmental agencies fix higher prices and larger subsidies. This is especially true when we realize that the States with high subsidies had a ceiling on protein feed which was $10 per ton below the ceiling price in the States receiving the lower subsidies.

Correspondence Between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS S. GORDON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD the exchange of letters, dated June 17, 1944, between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Poland, His Excellency Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, prior to his departure from this country:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
June 16, 1944.

His Excellency STANISLAW MIKOLAJCZYK,
Prime Minister of Poland.

MY DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER: I wish to take this opportunity, just before your departure, to wish you a safe return after your most welcome visit to Washington.

I particularly desire to express to you the pleasure I have had in seeing you again, which enabled me to have most frank, sincere, and friendly exchanges of views with you on the many questions which are of mutual interest to us.

I need hardly tell you how much the American people admire the courage and fortitude of the Polish people, who for almost 5 years have borne with brave and stout hearts the cruel hardships of war and oppression. Their steadfast determination to be free again and the indomitable spirit of their fighting men constitute the best pledge that Poland shall reassume her rightful place among the free nations of the world.

The forces of liberation are on the march to certain victory and the establishment of a peace based upon the principles of freedom, democracy, mutual understanding, and security for all liberty-loving people.

Permit me to express again how much I appreciated the opportunity of renewing our acquaintance. I feel that such personal exchanges of views cannot but contribute to mutual understanding.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. President, I am deeply touched and most sincerely grateful for the great kindness and hospitality which I have received from you during my visit. May I thank you from the bottom of my heart for all the proofs of your kindness and for giving me so many opportunities of seeing you and of having frank talks with you on the vital subjects and problems which affect Poland and Europe now and after this war.

I should like to thank you not only for your most friendly and kind reception but especially for your deep and so broad approach to the problems of the future.

The ideals and principles of the Atlantic Charter and of the "four freedoms" of which you are the initiator are for us Poles in our hard fight for the speedy liberation of our country that encouragement and inspiration which we most need on our way of struggle, suffering, and work.

The loss of individual freedom and of all that man possessed has strengthened in the Polish people their love, respect, and yearning for that freedom. The fate of the people shared by all social classes irrespective of their origin and religion has brought man closer to man in my country so strongly that it has cemented the foundations of democracy and created the conditions necessary to mutual understanding and collaboration. This love of freedom increases the striving to make it secure when, after the final victory, it will be necessary to build new foundations for nations and peace-loving peoples.

I leave greatly impressed by the conversations which I was privileged to have with you, by your views, and your wide knowledge of human and national problems.

I would be very happy if the few modest suggestions which you gave me the opportunity of contributing in our talks could even in the slightest way serve the common cause and be of some use to you, Mr. President, who is leading your Nation in this great fight for the common cause together with your allies, giving so much of yourself and carrying so great a responsibility as regards the fulfillment if the ideals with which you have inspired the hearts of the soldiers and fighters for freedom.

Accept, Mr. President, the assurances of my deepest gratitude and of my highest consideration.

S. MIKOLAJCZYK.

Part of Congressman Philbin's Record of Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD, I have prepared a chronological summary of part of my record of service.

January 1943: P. A. W. takes steps to increase supplies of fuel oil in Boston area as result strong appeal by Congressman PHILBIN.

The Petroleum Administrator for War allocates additional shipments of fuel oil to Ware as result strong plea made by Congressman PHILBIN following receipt of wire on January 15, 1943, from Joseph J. Barbiaz, Chairman, Fuel Oil Panel, Rationing Board, Ware.

January 1943: Congressman PHILBIN is assured by P. A. W. that a 25 percent cut in fuel oil for the municipal lighting plant at Hudson will be rescinded so that war industries in that community and in nearby Stow may continue to produce a steady flow of war supplies. Some 10 important war industries would have been seriously affected by the proposed cut.

HUDSON AVERTS OIL SHORTAGE THREAT—ACTION OF REPRESENTATIVE PHILBIN CREDITED WITH KEEPING WAR PLANTS GOING

HUDSON, January 9.—A serious threat to local war industries because of the fuel oil shortage was temporarily averted this afternoon by the prompt action of Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN, according to Manager Thomas Walsh, manager of department. Representative PHILBIN succeeded in having the usual monthly allotment of fuel oil released to the municipal light and power plant after plant officials had been notified their allotment would have to be cut 25 percent.

Manager Walsh had announced earlier today that he had been notified by his suppliers of the cut. Such a reduction would have seriously hampered the war effort, as there are some 10 industries here engaged in war production and dependent upon the local light and power department for electricity.

APPEALS SENT OUT

As a result of this notice, officials immediately sent appeals to all New England Representatives and Senators in Washington seeking relief. According to word received here, Representative PHILBIN, recently seated, contacted the First Service Command Ordnance Department in Boston and told officials there of the serious consequence that would develop unless some relief was given. As a result, the Sun Oil Co., which furnished the oil, was contacted and agreed to release the full quota for this month at least.

In addition to a possible curtailment of war production, local citizens and the entire poulation of the town of Maynard would have been affected. Maynard purchases electricity with which to run its pumping station to furnish the town's water supply from White Pond. If this circuit had to be shut off, it would mean that the town would be without water.

Local officials stated that the relief received today was only temporary and the outlook for next month remained gloomy. As a result, all citizens were asked to conserve electricity, and one street light circuit on the south side of Main street was not turned on tonight.

The plant consumes approximately 4,500 gallons of fuel oil per day, or about 135,000 gallons a month. According to the notice received from the suppliers, the monthly amount was to have been cut by 30,000 gallons.

THREE HAVE WON E AWARD

Of the plants engaged in war production, three have already been awarded the Army-Navy E for excellence in production. They are the Lapointe Machine Tool Co., the Universal Boring Co., and the Victory Plastics Co.

Manager Walsh said it would be next to impossible to convert to coal because of the huge expenditure involved. The plant operates with Diesel engines. A new one was recently installed at a cost of more than a quarter of a million dollars.

It was announced that it might be possible for some of the plants involved to switch to the New England Power Co., but this plan would mean a complete shutdown for as much as a week or more. Manager Walsh said that it would take nearly a month for the local power plant to switch to the New England Power Co. to obtain electricity and relay it to consumers.

February, 1943: Congressman PHILBIN obtained oil for Arden Mills, Fitchburg, so that operations could be resumed after plant had been closed by oil shortage.

[From the Worcester Telegram]

FITCHBURG MILL TO RESUME FULL-TIME OPERATIONS

FITCHBURG, February 24.—All employees of the Arden Mill of the American Woolen Co. will return to work on a full-time basis tomorrow, it was announced tonight by Percy L. Schutt, resident agent.

The mill, which manufactures cloth for the armed services, has been only partially operated since Monday night, due to lack of adequate supplies of fuel oil.

Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of Clinton, wired the local management tonight that an agreement has been reached by company headquarters and the War Production Board, so that the mill will be furnished with sufficient oil to carry on until the plant's heating and power system can be converted from the use of oil to coal. The plant employs about 540 persons.

February 1943: A serious situation is averted in the Warrens, Spencer, and the Brookfields when Congressmen PHILBIN obtains vitally needed allocation of fuel oil from P. A. W. for many homes in that area. "As spokesman for the group which wired you relative to the fuel oil crisis, may we express our deep appreciation for your very prompt reply and report. It gives us the feeling that we have a public servant in Washington, who is on the job watching out for our interests," writes Harlow E. Jones, of West Brookfield.

February 1943: Congressman PHILBIN assists woodworking plants in the Gardner area in obtaining contracts from Smaller War Plants Corporation.

February 1943: Congressman PHILBIN obtains assurances from War Department and Petroleum Administrator for War that an uninterrupted supply of fuel oil will be maintained for Uxbridge mills doing war work. "The Waucantuck Mills organization is fully cognizant of the untiring efforts you are exerting in behalf of this mill to enable us to maintain our part in the war production plan. It is certainly a reassuring and encouraging factor to know that our Member of Congress is so vitally interested in our effort. We appreciate it deeply." Thus writes Edward D. Brady, vice president of this company.

March 1943: Congressman PHILBIN cooperates with firemen stationed at Fort Devens, in adjusting pay situation at that Army post.

April 1943: Congressman PHILBIN obtains assurances from National War Labor Board that it will consider a petition for reconsideration of its original decision, disapproving a wage increase for members of the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees, A. F. of L., Fitchburg and Leominster Local.

April 1943: Congressman PHILBIN helps in obtaining priorities for truck for Hudson Highway Department.

May 1943: Congressman PHILBIN seeks extension of bus service by Worcester Street Railway Co. for residents of Douglas and East Douglas.

May 1943: Congressman PHILBIN cooperates with Three Rivers Chamber of Commerce in seeking to halt removal of a spur track from main line of Boston & Albany Railroad to Bondsville.

May 1943: Congressman PHILBIN cooperates with city officials of Gardner in having airport used by Civil Air Patrol.

May 1943: Congressman PHILBIN makes strong plea for W. P. A. workers losing annual leave with discontinuance of W. P. A. Some 3,000 workers all over the country affected.

June 1943: Congressman PHILBIN helps to alleviate serious corn and feed shortages in third district. He obtains part of shipment of wheat moving in from Canada via Great Lakes.

June 1943: Congressman PHILBIN obtains 200 rolls of turkey netting for members of Massachusetts Turkey Growers Association.

[From the Marlboro Enterprise]

SHIPMENT OF POULTRY WIRE HAS ARRIVED—TO BE USED BY TURKEY GROWERS; APPROVED BY W. P. B.

MARLBORO.—Attorney Fred L. Williams, president of the Massachusetts Turkey Growers Association, announced that the first carload of poultry wire has arrived here at the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad station since restrictions were placed on its manufacture. It was shipped from Joliet, Ill.

Congressman PHILBIN, of Clinton, was contacted by the association and he in turn got in touch with the War Production Board and persuaded them to release the wire. Marlboro will be used as the distribution center for the wire.

The turkey is a big source of food and it consumes less food than any bird or animal for the amount that they produce. The Government has asked the Nation's turkey growers to provide 10,000,000 pounds of meat for shipment to the men overseas, and the Massachusetts growers have been called on to produce 400,000 pounds.

June 1943: Congressman PHILBIN obtains necessary priority from War Production Board to install necessary lighting for municipal parking lot at Marlboro, obtaining a favorable review of application following preliminary disapproval by the W. P. B. in May. The War Production Board gives permission to the Worcester County Electric Co., of Southbridge, to install necessary street lighting on Lebanon and Snow Streets in that community. Congressman PHILBIN receives plea from Southbridge town officials on June 17 and War Production Board gives permission to use necessary critical materials on June 19, 1943, following intercession of Mr. PHILBIN. Earlier application had been disapproved.

July 1943: Congressman PHILBIN helps to obtain Army troops to harvest apple crop in central Massachusetts.

[From Webster Times of July 8, 1943]

ENLISTED PERSONNEL MAY BE USED TO HARVEST CROPS—CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN'S STATEMENT

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 8.—Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of Clinton, today was assured by Maj. Gen. James A. Ulio, the Adjutant General, that in the event of an emergency in Webster and surrounding communities due to the shortage of available farm labor, enlisted personnel stationed in the Massachusetts area could be called upon to help harvest threatened crops.

As a result of Mr. PHILBIN'S inquiries concerning the possibility of using the services of men in the armed forces to help farmers in this section because of the serious shortage of farm labor throughout the State, the commanding officers of all posts, camps, stations, divisions, and lower separate units of the United States Army located in Massachusetts and other New England States, have been authorized to permit soldiers to engage in farm work in communities within easy traveling distance of the various Army units during normal off-duty periods.

In the event of the threatened loss of a crop, these same commanding officers were authorized to grant passes for farm labor purposes not to exceed 3 days on any one occasion.

Mr. PHILBIN said that many discussions were held by the Committee on Military Affairs, of which he is a member, on the vital problem during the past few months, and stated that he was very much pleased with the helpful and cooperative attitude of War Department officials. The provisions, under which the farm labor plan will operate in this area, were outlined at length in General Ulio's letter to Congressman PHILBIN, excerpts of which follow:

"This service is contingent upon the fact that the soldier concerned desires permission or a pass; such action will not interfere with the customary employment and regular engagement in farm work of local civilians; will not interfere seriously with training, and no expense to the Government will be involved.

"Farmers or farm organizations in need of emergency aid in harvesting crops should contact the commanding officer of the nearest military establishment.

"In cases of extreme emergency to prevent the loss or destruction of a food crop vital to the war effort, a plan has been worked out by the War Manpower Commission, the Department of Agriculture, and the War Department whereby troops as units may be used as farm labor. A pertinent provision states that the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission will receive from the Secretary of Agriculture and review requests for use of troops in cases of this nature. The requests are evaluated in accordance with carefully worked out standards and if the War Manpower Commission determines the situation to be an emergency and other means are not available, it then certifies the requests for use of troops to the War Department for consideration."

Congressman PHILBIN added that he would be pleased to cooperate fully with all local groups seeking assistance from the various field commanders in the Massachusetts area for the use of troops for farm labor.

"I am gratified with General Ulio's pledge of cooperation in harvesting crops," said Representative PHILBIN. "It is high time some responsible government official gave constructive, helpful attention to the sorry plight of our farmers, small businessmen and consumers. But this concession is merely a palliative. I will press for more basic and far-reaching remedies."

July 1943: PHILBIN is the only Member of Congress from Massachusetts to protest the bombing of Rome.

August 1943: Congressman PHILBIN cooperated with town officials of Hudson in helping obtain release of a new fire truck for that community. Equipment finally obtained at a later date.

August 1943: Congressman PHILBIN assists town officials to obtain town water project for Hudson. Necessary priorities obtained from W. P. B. and final approval obtained from F. W. A., in conjunction with efforts of Senator WALSH.

August 1943: PHILBIN only Massachusetts Member of Congress to intercede with Children's Bureau of United States Department of Labor so that Federal funds may be made available for emergency maternity and child care benefits to wives of Massachusetts servicemen. Constituent makes inquiry concerning the E. M. I. C. on August 13. Is advised August 17, that Massachusetts has not yet made application for these funds. Cooperates with State officials in expediting action on application when it is sent to Washington, and on August 30 is advised by Miss Katharine Lenroot of the Children's Bureau that funds for Massachusetts are approved that date.

[From the Hudson News-Enterprise]

CONGRESSMAN PHILIP J. PHILBIN REPORTS ON EMERGENCY RELIEF

The following communication was received early this week from Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN: "In response to my previous inquiry asking the chief of the United States Children's Bureau why funds for emergency maternity and infant care for wives of enlisted men in the service had not been made available for Massachusetts, I received today the following message from Katherine F. Lenroot, chief, Children's Bureau: 'Funds for emergency maternity and infant care for wives and infants of enlisted men in service are allotted to States upon approval by the Children's Bureau of a plan of administration for such services accompanied by request for funds. Massachusetts State Department of Health has not submitted plan or requested funds for these services under approved plans. Eligible persons request authorization for medical or hospital care from State health department through their physicians. Advise discuss with Dr. Getting, State health commissioner, reasons why Massachusetts has not submitted a plan.'

"Accordingly, I requested appropriate officials of the State board of health to advise why Massachusetts has not applied for this important aid which Congress intended should be made available to prospective mothers who are the wives of boys in the service. Today I was pleased to receive a reply from Commissioner Getting of the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, indicating that his department has filed an application for this very important emergency maternity and infant care for soldiers' wives and hope it will shortly be acted upon favorably in Washington."

September 1943: Congressman PHILBIN obtains release of N. Y. A. equipment for use of city of Gardner so that special training courses may be continued in that community. Town officials of Spencer, endeavoring to obtain release of a truck for the highway department of that community and unable to obtain delivery of order placed in November 1941, asked Congressman PHILBIN to intercede in August 1943. On August 31, 1943, Congressman PHILBIN obtains preliminary approval of release of equipment from regional office of Defense Transportation officials and follows up application in Washington, obtaining final release from O. D. T. on September 4.

CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN GETS ACTION ON TOWN TRUCK

After nearly 2 years of endeavor, Spencer has at last received delivery of a new truck to urgently needed for the highway department. After all other efforts by the selectmen had failed, Armand Jalbert, our street commissioner, and Edward Gaudette, clerk of the board of selectmen, made a visit to Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN at his Clinton office and laid their case before him. The result of this conference is indicated by the enclosed correspondence, which we reprint:

TOWN OF SPENCER,
OFFICE OF BOARD OF SELECTMEN,
October 19, 1943.

Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
United States Congressman,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Sometime in August I called on you at your office in Clinton, with Mr. Jalbert, our superintendent of public works, relative to the purchase of a truck to be used in conjunction with the work of the highways, sewer, and water. Needless to say that all efforts by the board of selectmen in the past had failed to get release of this truck, which had been ordered way back in November of 1941.

I have just received word from Mr. Jalbert that the truck in question was delivered to him about a week ago, and it is for this reason that I am writing you. May I, therefore, express my personal appreciation for the very efficient and effective way in which you handled this most vexing problem for the town of Spencer. I am very certain that the people of this small community will be very appreciative this coming winter, when it becomes known that this truck will play a very important part in keeping our roads open from snow, and, incidentally, we all shall lose no opportunity to tell of the part that you so graciously played in securing for us a piece of badly needed equipment, which we had, up to the time you intervened, been unable to secure.

Please accept my thanks for a job well done, and may I remain

Very sincerely yours,
EDWARD GAUDETTE,
Clerk of the Board of Selectmen.

MAYNARD TO PURCHASE NEW SNOW-LOADER—PRIORITY ARRANGED THROUGH CONGRESSMAN; EXPECT EARLY DELIVERY

MAYNARD.—Through the efforts of Congressman PHILIP PHILBIN, the superintendent of streets, Raymond Sheridan, was able to secure the necessary priority to purchase the snow-loader and two trucks which were approved by the voters at the last town meeting. The superintendent was granted a hearing at the Congressman's office at Clinton while he was home during the period Congress had adjourned. He gave Mr. Sheridan a most welcome opportunity to discuss his difficulties and assured him of his every assistance. His efforts culminated in his receiving the necessary document within 48 hours of the conference.

It is expected that the trucks will be ready for delivery about October 15. The snow-loader will be here early part of November.

PHILBIN SCORES SHIPMENTS OF TURKEYS TO FOREIGNERS

WASHINGTON, November 19.—Reports foreign civilians will get large quantities of American turkey meat Thanksgiving, while many American families get it in the neck, brought hot demands for complete details from several red-faced Government agencies today by Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN (Democrat), Clinton. Besides these strong indications that Americans may feast mainly on globaloney Thanksgiving, while foreign civilians help us celebrate the holiday by eating our turkeys, Government muddling may also cause extreme black-market turkey deals that will make Thanksgiving turkeys available only to plush purses, Mr. PHILBIN explained.

"There has been brought to my attention news reports from foreign sources indicating American turkeys are being shipped abroad for use of civilian populations," Mr. PHILBIN said.

"So far," he continued, "I have been unable to get substantiation of these reports, and several Government bureaus have denied such shipments have been made.

"If it is a fact turkeys are being shipped abroad for civilian populations while our own people are being left without, it is a matter that should cause the deepest concern.

"I have asked the Army, Navy, Lend-Lease, War Food Administration to give me full details about this matter."

Declaring O. P. A. has failed to set a practical price ceiling on turkeys so that they can be sold without a loss, Mr. PHILBIN said he had been informed extensive preparations are already being made to corner remaining supplies of turkeys and sell them at skyrocketed prices in black-market operations, while few turkeys remain obtainable at ceiling prices.

Already, he explained, the influence of this black-market plot is being felt, indicating there is evidence the supply is being cornered by operators who expect to sell turkeys on Thanksgiving Eve at prices up to 80 cents a pound and beyond.

"This black market may be responsible for the present extreme shortage of turkeys," he said. "From many points I have received indications of very marked shortages. While the armed services have made very substantial purchases, there should remain out of our large production enough turkeys to give every community a fair share."

He said he did not have complete figures as yet of total purchase by the armed services. However, he said, he believes turkey production this year was at record rates, approximating 200,000,000 pounds, or more than a pound for every man, woman, and child in this country.

WILL RELEASE TURKEYS FOR CIVILIAN SALE—ATTORNEY F. L. WILLIAMS, PRESIDENT OF ASSOCIATION WAS AT MEETING

MARLBORO—Attorney Fred L. Williams attended a conference in Boston with Lieutenant Colonel Merrill and Major Brown, both Army Ordnance Corps officers, and George A. McLitchie, civilian turkey procurement agent for this area. The conference concerned the releasing of turkeys for civilians in New England.

It was revealed that turkeys are ready to eat but that the Army cannot provide anyone to take and kill them. It was learned that no one thought they could afford to because of the expense involved.

Attorney Williams said a protest will be made to Congressman PHILBIN and a conference will be arranged in behalf of the turkey growers. He also stated that there will be a release of turkey for civilians within a few days. This condition was brought about through the efforts of Congressman PHILBIN to relieve the meat shortage.

Attorney Williams stated that there will be a meeting of the Turkey Producers Association at Lakeville Conn., October 18. He is president of the association and also a member of the executive committee in New England and one of the largest turkey growers in New England.

TURKEYLESS THANKSGIVING SEEN, PHILBIN BLAMES O. P. A.—PRODUCERS FACE LARGE LOSS AS FOWLS CONSUME ADDITIONAL FEED GRAIN

(By Willard Edwards)

An administration muddle may keep the Thanksgiving tables of hundreds of thousands of Americans bare of turkey while despairing farmers watch countless fat gobblers consume precious grain in their barnyards, it was disclosed last night.

The folks at home may not even have the consolation of feeling that the absence of the traditional bird is the gain of the armed services here and overseas, it was reported.

PHILBIN REVEALS SITUATION

Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Democrat of Massachusetts, disclosed this situation. He terms it an O. P. A. absurdity eclipsing that agency's previous best effort in confusing the home front.

PHILBIN said he had made strenuous efforts to convince the O. P. A. that it should change the position which threatens to ruin a $100,000,000 industry, but had been advised that nothing could be done.

The War Department's laudable efforts to see that every fighting man and woman gets turkey at Thanksgiving and Christmas enters into the story, but PHILBIN stressed that the O. P. A.'s attitude is keeping the birds away from the armed services as well as the civilian market. Meanwhile, farmers who have been encouraged by the Department of Agriculture to raise more turkeys as a substitute for meat face drastic losses.

ORDER ISSUED IN AUGUST

The Army issued an order last August 1 putting an embargo upon 10,000,000 pounds of dressed turkey for fighting men abroad before turkeys could be released to civilians. The order asserted that the turkeys, frozen and dressed, should be on the docks by September 15.

The embargo was expected to be lifted by October 1 but up to the present it is still in effect. Meanwhile, reports have spread that the amount desired by the Army has risen to thirty or thirty-five millions of pounds. The amounts actually purchased by the Army thus far appear to be a military secret.

Machinery was set up designating certain official processors who were authorized to purchase live turkeys from processors and sell them to the War Department.

The O. P. A. meanwhile ordered price ceilings maintained at last year's levels despite evidence produced that the cost of production, due to increased labor and feed costs, had arisen 29 percent nationally, averaging about 6.3 cents per pound extra, and 34 percent in the New England area.

The price fixed to be paid by the Army was 40 cents a pound and the retail ceiling price averaged 51 cents a pound in the Worcester-Boston market in which PHILBIN is interested.

The official processors found themselves unable to purchase live turkeys at the ceiling price of 35 cents a pound and processing them for sale at 40 cents, without standing a heavy loss, according to PHILBIN. The result: Few turkeys for the Army and no turkeys for civilians while the Army embargo continued to stand.

WOULD ACCEPT LOSS

Many producers would be willing to take a loss for the sake of sending turkeys to the armed services overseas but the processors find themselves unable to absorb the heavy losses which they would face, it was statcd.

Lifting the O. P. A. ceiling prices by a few cents a pound would straighten out the whole situation, but PHILBIN was advised curtly by an O. P. A. Poultry Division official that "we must hold the line on consumer prices."

"Turkey producers were more than willing to cooperate gladly in the project to get turkey to the boys overseas," PHILBIN remarked, "even though the price to be paid by the Army was inadequate and the growers, especially in the East, would take a sacrifice on every bird sold."

Most turkeys are full-grown now and every day they remain in their pens costs the grower money in feed, it was pointed out.

In the Boston area Maj. Gen. Sherman Miles, of the First Service Command, has granted exemptions in three cases to permit civilian sales, PHILBIN said, and the Army attitude has been most cooperative. But the present spread between the selling price to growers and the selling price to processors remains unattractive to both and the apparent outcome, he remarked, will be no Thanksgiving turkey for the great majority of civilians and little for the men in the armed services.

December 1943: Congressman PHILBIN seeks veterans' hospital for Third Congressional District, also establishment of district Veterans' Administration offices in Worcester and Springfield. Also addition to Veterans' facility at Rutland Heights and a centrally located veterans' building in downtown Boston.

December 1943: Congressman PHILBIN obtains prompt release of lumber inventories of Gardner furniture manufacturers so that uninterrupted production schedules are maintained.

He makes a strong appeal to War Production Board and United States Navy lumber coordinating unit to expedite action on lumber inventories and receives speedy cooperation on the part of Government officials. In addition, PHILBIN seeks additional imports of Canadian lumber to help ease desperate lumber shortage in United States in order that employees of furniture manufacturers in Gardner, Ashburnham, Winchendon, and other communities in the Third District may continue full employment.

GARDNER MARINE NOT DEAD, AS WAS REPORTED

GARDNER, December 7.—Pvt. (1st cl.) Ronald E. Sargent, 22, United States Marine Corps, listed as killed in action in a telegram received by his wife on November 8, is not dead but is wounded, and is responding to treatment, according to word received by his wife, Mrs. Sylvia Allen Sargent, of 29 South Main Street, early this afternoon.

Mrs. Sargent was notified by telegram from United States Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of Clinton, that her husband is alive and responding to treatment somewhere in the South Pacific. The Marine Corps notified Mrs. Sargent last week that two reports had been received concerning Private (1st cl.) Sargent, one that he had been killed in action, the other that he was wounded. Mrs. Sargent herself received a letter from Private (1st cl.) Sargent, believed to have been written November 18, in which he said he had been wounded.

The definite word from Congressman PHILBIN ended the confusion arising from the conflicting reports. Private (1st cl.) Sargent, son of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence H. Sargent, of 197 Pine Street, entered the Marine Corps October 7, 1942, and was married April 9 of this year.

[Editorial in January 7, 1944, Leominster Enterprise]

ADDRESS BY THE CONGRESSMAN

Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of Clinton, recently addressing the Leominster Rotary Club, spoke with flashing emphasis in discussing government and governmental trends.

The Congressman dealt with his subjects without equivocation. He offers no compromise and will accept none in his contentions centering on the declaration that the fundamental principles of government, on which the Nation builded to greatness, must be preserved.

The proper assumption and exercise of power by the executive, the judicial, and the legislative branches of government were as warmly and as stoutly advocated on the one hand as on the other as he searingly assailed government bureaucracy, rather than through the accepted principles of constitutional procedure.

In attention-compelling language, the Congressman said of free enterprise:

"Free enterprise is not an attribute of great wealth alone. It does not exist solely for the talented and the favored. It is the valued possession of every person who seeks to advance himself. It is the boon of the professional man, the small businessman, the farmer, the artisan—the safeguard of the ambitious and the industrious, for it gives to the humblest, most inarticulate citizen the chance to improve his lot and join the populous ranks of those who have won their substance by the use of their own talents and the fruits of their own toil."

In the address, which touched upon a number of phases of current economic conditions and affairs of Government, there were statements or conclusions, in some cases, that would, of course, create differences of opinion.

Other schools of thought would probably question them sharply, but there are few who would question the deep sincerity of the speaker, as set forth in frankness of statement, and forthright manner of delivery in enunciating warmly defended principles and beliefs.

War Production Board grants necessary priority to town of Spencer on January 6, 1944, to purchase a new fire-truck pumper. Although this type equipment is badly needed for war purposes, Congressman PHILBIN makes a strong argument in behalf of town officials, citing the recent fire which destroyed the Spencer Methodist Church and the difficulty in obtaining parts to repair old pumper. Applications reach W. P. B. December 29 and Congressman PHILBIN obtains approval within less than 10 days.

EGG PRODUCERS PROMISED RELIEF

WASHINGTON, January 6.—War Food Administration has promised prompt action will be taken starting this week to relieve New England farmers of an extremely low egg price now prevailing because of a glut of eggs on the New England market, it was disclosed today at the office of Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN (Democrat, Clinton).

Starting this week, W. F. A. will begin buying through its regional offices the surpluses of some dealers. This is slated to start Thursday and the purchases will be made from the first dealers with large surpluses who offer the eggs at a reasonable price, it is explained. Later, more eggs will be bought, and ultimately some sort of price-support mechanism is slated to be set up to assure New England producers a fair price, it is announced.

At present, it was explained, the tremendous surplus of eggs in Massachusetts and New England generally are selling as low as 29 cents a dozen, considerably below O. P. A. ceilings under which eggs were selling up to 63 cents a dozen. New England, it is pointed out, has no price support, but in the South a price support of 46 cents a dozen wholesale for medium eggs has been set up.

Accordingly, PHILBIN's office said, W. F. A. will attempt to correct the discrimination against New England producers by buying up some of the surplus now to bolster prices and ultimately establishing price floors.

PHILBIN WINS FIRST ROUND IN PULPWOOD SUPPLY FIGHT

WASHINGTON, January 22.—Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Democrat, of the Third Massachusetts District, today won the first round of his battle to assure a continued supply of pulpwood to the paper mills of the country when legislation he introduced this week was referred to the powerful House Military Affairs Committee, of which he is a member. His bill, numbered H. R. 4000, seeks deferments for workers engaged in timber or pulpwood and logging operations by amending the Selective Training and Service Act and has a very important bearing on the Massachusetts' paper, paperboard, and products industry, the Commonwealth's second largest industry with an annual production of goods valued at $148,914,616 last year.

"So great has become the shortage of pulpwood and other materials used in the manufacture of paper products that 4 large mills on the west coast have been forced to close," said PHILBIN. "Other mills through the country have been forced to curtail their operations and the more than 60 paper and pulp mills in Massachusetts are beginning to feel the pinch of the scant raw-goods supply and are operating at a greatly reduced scale. With further curtailments in immediate prospects, I am most apprehensive that unless the manpower shortage in the logging industry is relieved at once, very serious consequences will ensue."

While the small pulpwood production touches upon industries on a Nation-wide basis, such as manufacturers of packaging and wrapping paper, newspapers, cartons for the shipment of essential military supplies, and other products, PHILBIN expressed fears that the situation in Massachusetts would soon become acute.

PHILBIN proposed two remedies, in addition to legislation he is sponsoring to have wood labor classified as essential, to help clear up the pulp shortage.

1. Lifting of what amounts to an embargo on the export of logs from Canada to the United States, PHILBIN said he was seeking the intervention of Secretary Hull and the State Department to make possible a decided increase of pulp logs to our domestic industry.

2. Making badly needed equipment available to produce pulp wood in the Pacific Northwest, which has been diverted to other uses. PHILBIN said he was taking this particular matter up further with W. P. B. officials.

February 1944: Congressman PHILBIN calls upon War and Navy Departments to furnish discharged vets with mustering-out-pay application forms.

February 1944: Congressman PHILBIN is the only Massachusetts Member of Congress to protest closing of Army Emergency Relief offices in Massachusetts. Later, General Miles advises a personal affairs liaison officer is being attached to the Worcester Veterans Center as convenience for Third District veterans and their families.

PERSONAL AFFAIRS OFFICE LOCATED IN WORCESTER—TO DEAL WITH ALL PROBLEMS

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 25.—A Personal Affairs Division of the War Department to handle all types of problems of enlisted personnel and their families has been set up in Worcester as a convenience to residents of the Third Congressional District, Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN (Democrat), of Clinton, was advised today by Maj. Gen. Sherman Miles, commanding general of the First Service Command. A special office has been set up at the Worcester Veterans' Center, 58 Front Street, Worcester, where a personal-affairs liaison officer has been assigned to deal with all types of problems relating to servicemen and their families.

The setting up of this center came soon after PHILBIN protested against the closing of the Army Emergency Relief offices at Worcester, as being detrimental to the interests of his constituents and while Army emergency relief activities are now being handled through local Red Cross chapters, it is felt that the new personal affairs division office at Worcester will be in a position to render the specialized type of service, with the exception of the allocation of funds, that was available from the Army emergency relief office in the Federal Building, Worcester. This office is now closed.

In a recent letter to Representative PHILBIN, General Miles stated:

"The mission of the personal affairs division is to provide all possible information and assistance on personal matters to the soldier and his dependents and the veteran and his dependents.

"The facilities of the service are available to the soldier through the personal affairs officer at the various posts and camps. To aid and inform the dependents of our soldiers and the veteran and his dependents, I have assigned personal affairs liaison officers at the Boston Veterans' Information Center at 7 Beacon Street, Boston, and at the Worcester Veterans' Center at 58 Front Street, Worcester, Mass.

"Also, these individuals adjacent to First Service Command Headquarters (editor's note: 808 Commonwealth Avenue, Boston) are welcome to call upon the Personal Affairs Division here for information and assistance with many personal problems that arise from time to time to vex the soldier or veteran."

PHILBIN also offered his continued assistance to all residents of the third district in solving the personal problems of soldiers or their dependents, stressing the fact that he welcomed at all times inquiries for information or help that came from servicemen, returned veterans, and their families.

National War Labor Board at Boston finally approves vacation pay for employees of the Curtis Shoe Co. and Diamond Shoe Co. at Marlboro on March 3, 1944, following a stalemate of several months. Congressman PHILBIN cooperates fully with officials of the Marlboro Shoeworkers Union, making strong plea to Chairman Wallen, of the N. W. L. B., on January 10 after having case transferred from Washington to Boston for consideration. Vacation pay is first disapproved by N. W. L. B. shoe panel. Review of case results in favorable finding later. Dennis Maher, president, Marlboro Shoe Workers' Association, wires on March 6: "In behalf of our membership, I wish you continued success and many thanks for your courtesy and cooperation."

DECISION IS DUE THIS WEEK ON VACATION PAY—CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN HAS FOLLOWED CASE CLOSELY; RELEASES TEXT OF TELEGRAMS SENT DURING MONTH

MARLBORO.—The New England War Labor Board regional office at Boston will reconsider this week its recent decision on vacation pay for 935 workers in the Curtis and Diamond shoe firms. Congressman PHILIP L. PHILBIN, of Clinton, has followed the case closely and has been in constant touch with Saul Wallen, chairman of the War Labor Board, and President Dennis Maher, of the Marlboro Shoe Union.

Following is a series of telegrams sent by Congressman PHILBIN and replies he received during this month in relation to the vacation pay question.

Wire from Saul Wallen received late Friday, February 11, evidently prior to formulation of wire by Dennis Maher relative to congressional investigation of W. L. B. and its subsequent receipt by Congressman PHILBIN on Saturday, February 12. The text follows:

"Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN,

"House of Representatives:

"On February 10, 1944, the War Labor Board denied the vacation pay in the Curtis and Diamond shoe cases, with the qualification that this decision is without prejudice with respect to a 1944 vacation.

"NATIONAL WAR LABOR BOARD, REGION 1,
"By SAUL WALLEN, Chairman."

Text of wire to Dennis Maher, February 12:

"DENNIS MAHER,

"President, Marlboro Shoe Workers, Inc.,
"Marlboro, Mass.:

"Deeply regret to have to advise Boston Regional W. L. B. denied vacation pay in Curtis and Diamond shoe cases on February 10, according to information wired me by Saul Wallen, board chairman. This decision, I understand, is without prejudice with respect to a 1944 vacation. If there is anything further I can do please let me know.

"Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN."

Text of wire sent February 16:

"Saul Wallen, regional N. W. L. B. Director, 209 Washington Street, Boston, Mass. Workers in Curtis and Diamond Shoe factories in Marlboro very much disturbed about regional office decision denying vacation pay and have demanded congressional investigation. They point to other factories doing similar work where vacation pay has been given. Will appreciate your review of this matter.

"Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN."

NATIONAL WAR LABOR BOARD,
Boston, Mass., February 17, 1944.

Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN: I am replying to your telegram of February 16 relative to the Curtis and Diamond Shoe cases.

The Regional Board voted to deny the request by a vote of 4 to 2 for approval of the vacation pay for 1943 because the application for such approval was made in December 1943, 6 months after the vacation period. The Board reasoned that because of the lapse of time between the taking of the vacation and the request for payment for the vacation was so great that the matter was really a disguised wage increase which probably would not otherwise have been approved under the wage stabilization policy.

I have, however, just completed a conference with Judge Simoneau, representing the union; Mr. Curtis and Mr. Ruben, representing the companies, and Mr. Sugarman, counsel for the companies. During the conference, additional facts were elicited which accounts for the long delay for the taking of the vacation and the filing for approval of vacation pay. At my suggestion, the company and the union will jointly petition the Board to reconsider its decision and I have promised them that I will bring the matter to the Board within a few days after receipt of the petition. I have every hope that the matter will be satisfactorily resolved although the final decision rests with the Board.

Please be assured of my appreciation of your interest in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

SAUL WALLEN,
Chairman, Regional War Labor Board, Region 1.

Text of wire sent February 19:

"Dennis Maher, president, Marlboro Shoeworkers Union, Marlboro, Mass. Pleased to advise W. L. B. has responded to my strong intercession of last Wednesday asking for review of cases of your union regarding vacation pay and such review will be made within few days shortly after receipt of your union and company joint petition. I have urged expedition and favorable action and hope to be able soon to send you word matter has been satisfactorily adjusted.

"Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN."

LOCAL SHOE WORKERS JUBILANT OVER WAR LABOR BOARD EDICT—VACATION PAY CHECKS ISSUED AT CURTIS FACTORY YESTERDAY AFTERNOON; DIAMOND PAYS OFF NEXT WEEK

MARLBORO.—Over one thousand shoe workers employed in the Diamond and Curtis factories are jubilant today over the announcement that their union, the Marlboro Shoe Workers Associates Incorporated, has won its fight to have the New England War Labor Board approve the vacation plan agreed to by them and the manufacturers. Vacation pay checks were distributed yesterday afternoon to 330 workers in the Curtis plant while 675 in the Diamond factory will get theirs next week. The vacation pay will total approximately $22,000.

Workers entitled to the vacation pay were those employed continuously for 1 year as of July 1, 1943, 40 hours straight time and 20 hours straight time for those employed for 6 months continuously as of July 1, 1943. The vacation pay was based on the second quarter before the vacation of July 4, 1943, conforming with W. L. B. regulations.

Today the workers complimented their leaders and Congressman PHILBIN for their efforts in their behalf to obtain the approval of the War Labor Board for vacation pay.

The union and the manufacturers entered into a vacation-pay-plan agreement early in the fall. At the time the War Labor Board had approved vacation pay agreements between workers and about 40 manufacturers.

A few weeks ago the War Labor Board disapproved of the plan and the workers in these factories staged a 1-day walkout. A mass meeting was held in High School Assembly Hall where John Sullivan, of the Dispute Division of the War Labor Board, heard arguments put forth by union officials and members. They voted to return to work on the promise that every effort would be made to get the War Labor Board to reconsider the decision.

Union officials, President Dennis Maher, business agents Francis Cain and Henry Hanson and the union legal counsel, Attorney Edward T. Simoneau, worked hard on the case. Late in December, when the War Labor Board had not rendered any decision, the local union telegraphed Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN. He immediately contacted authorities in Washington and had the case transferred to Boston. A few weeks later the Board rendered its adverse decision.

Congressman PHILBIN again delved into the case and telegraphed Saul Wallen, Chairman of the War Labor Board, that in view of certain facts and concrete evidence, the local union demanded a reconsideration of the case or would seek a congressional investigation. A few days later Chairman Wallen held a personal conference with union officials, their counsel, and local manufacturers.

Congressman PHILBIN in a telegram informed the local union after that meeting the War Labor Board announced it would reconsider the case if the union filed a request. This was done and the union was promised action sometime this week. The War Labor Board took up the case again yesterday and approved the vacation pay plan between the workers and the manufacturers of the Diamond and Curtis companies.

HUDSON POWER DEPARTMENT SEEKS AID TO AVERT OIL SHORTAGE

HUDSON, March 31, 1943.—Faced with the threat of a serious curtailment in the fuel-oil supply, officials of the Hudson Municipal Power and Light Department today sought assistance from Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN and received notice tonight he will do all possible to have a sufficient amount of oil allocated to keep the plant in operation.

Thomas A. Walsh, plant superintendent, was notified by the company which supplies the plant that there will be a seasonal cut of 75 percent in the allotment it will have available. That does not mean a cut of that size in the amount the local plant would receive but would entail a serious cut, it was stated.

Mr. Walsh immediately contacted Congressman PHILBIN and was informed tonight the latter is doing all possible to get the oil company to allocate enough oil to supply the needs of the plant. Also, that he has contacted Washington authorities regarding the matter.

Oil-burning Diesel motors generate all electricity for the town, including the industrial plants, nearly 85 percent of which are engaged in war work. It was pointed out by officials that it would be impossible to convert the plant to use coal and the only alternative would be to purchase electricity elsewhere, a procedure that would be prohibitive because of the cost with no assurance a sufficient supply could be obtained to meet the complete needs of the town.

Early in February Congressman PHILBIN succeeded in having the normal quota of oil supplied to the plant for at least a month when the situation appeared serious.

LOCAL FUEL-OIL OUTLOOK BETTER—NEW, FIVE POINT PROGRAM TO BE ANNOUNCED—CONGRESSMAN PHILIP J. PHILBIN GETS O. P. A. ASSURANCE

WASHINGTON, May 20—In response to his repeated criticisms and demands for a revamped fuel-supply program for New England next winter, Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Democrat, of the Third Massachusetts District today was assured by Joel Dean, Director of the Fuel Rationing Division of the Office of Price Administration, that proposed changes in the rationing program would do away with much of the hardship and suffering of last winter.

As a result of persistent suggestions for improvement made to the O. P. A. by Congressman PHILBIN and other members of the New England delegation, a five-point program has been drawn up by the Fuel Rationing Branch, O. P A., the preliminary draft of which is ready for submission to top ranking officials in the O. P. A. hierarchy. Little inside opposition to the proposed changes is expected and formal announcement may be made in the near future to local rationing boards. The program includes the five following main points, Congressman PHILBIN was advised:

1. Simple honor system reapplication blank.

2. Consumers urged to fill tanks during the summer.

3. Simplifying coupon mechanics which will result in decreasing the number of coupons required.

4. Simplified plan for small users, mostly kerosene users.

5. Ration banking for the industry and for large consumers.

The second proposal is in direct line with suggestions made by Congressman PHILBIN as a result of correspondence with constituents in his district. In order to do away with the chaotic conditions that prevailed during the severe winter of last year, it was suggested that consumers be allowed to fill their tanks to capacity during the summer months so that, in turn, dealers would be able to face the coming season's first cold snap with full tanks and continue replenishing their supplies from the curtailed allotment of oil expected for this area during the winter months because of military needs.

Last winter, many dealers were caught short right in the middle of the season and were unable to obtain supplies because of the diversion of tank cars for military purposes and other factors. The "full tank" clause is intended to permit dealers and consumers to pile up full supplies during the summer. O. P. A. officials are also expected to grant larger rations to owners of small homes.

Representative PHILBIN is also strongly urging extension of the proposed pipe line from Albany, N. Y., to Worcester for servicing central Massachusetts. He has also appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, speaking in favor of the building of the New Jersey canal in order to accelerate the flow of oil to New England by barges, using an inland waterway system. In addition, because of Mr. PHILBIN'S special efforts, an uninterrupted flow of fuel oil was assured defense industries in Fitchburg and Hudson, and to many domestic users throughout his district when these firms and users were faced with severe shortages last winter.

Congressman PHILBIN today, in releasing a statement, made the following brief comment:

"The New England fuel problem is still certainly most critical. It must not be left again, as it was last year, to the vagaries of the trial and error method. The proposals of O. P. A. have some promise. Petroleum Administrator for War, with Secretary Ickes and Administrator Davies in charge, has exhibited good intelligent judgment and has given indefatigable attention to the problem.

"There is no speedy total remedy for New England oil shortages; in fact, next winter they may well be expected in some degree to extend to coal. But whatever relief can be given lies in the application of good, old-fashioned common sense and practical business judgment. The administration must lean more for guidance and assistance on established, experienced businessmen and less upon theoretical bureaucratic pay-roll sinecurists.

"The oil distributors, large and small, know this problem better than anyone through years of practical experience. They understand not only problems of distribution but also those of transportation which have been raised by the need of rationing. They are patriotic and anxious to serve the Nation by giving the Government fullest benefit of their broad experience and business judgment. They ought to be let in on the ground floor of this entire fuel shortage situation, which hinges so largely, we are assured by the Government, on the needs of the armed forces.

"Future large-scale military programs which we may assume to be fairly close at hand, will heighten these shortages. Let us all get together to solve these problems so vital to New England. Let the Government take us all into its confidence and service—consumers, oil and coal men, transportation, the press and radio, Members of Congress, and others anxious to help. Between us, if we are given the chance to work together, we ought to be able to get the best results for New England next winter. For my part, I will continue my cooperation with all these groups so that our consumers will be spared privation, our industries kept going. I hope the Government will do likewise."

MASSACHUSETTS DEMANDS COAL—WALSH AND PHILBIN SAY SHORTAGE IS SERIOUS

BOSTON, Aug. 18.—A serious shortage of coal in New England threatens to have worse effects than the shortage of oil last winter, Senator DAVID I. WALSH (Democrat, of Massachusetts) and Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN (Democrat, of Massachusetts) said today.

In a joint statement forwarded to Secretary Ickes and O. P. A. authorities in Washington, they emphasized that the situation was desperate and urged immediate shipment of "very substantial tonnages of anthracite coal into New England."

They pointed out that last winter many consumers converted to coal "in the belief and with at least implied assurance, that adequate supplies of coal would be available this winter.

"It is now apparent that this will not be the case, but, to the contrary, New England will be faced with greatly reduced supplies of coal, especially the kinds used by ordinary domestic consumers."

Senator WALSH and Representative PHILBIN said that "the stocks of distributors and retail dealers on hand at present are at the lowest point in many years."

They declared that the total amount of hard coal shipped to New England from January, 1943, to the end of July was almost 500,000 tons less than that shipped during the corresponding period of 1942.

"Facts are available which show that the supply of coal which went into New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and other States for the last coal year greatly exceeded shipments of the previous year," they added.

"It is stated by responsible authorities that the increase in New York alone was over 1,000,000 tons over the previous year.

"Neither the profits of coal operators, the activities of racketeering black market manipulators, the inertia of Federal bureaus or any other consideration should be permitted further to delay the prompt shipment of anthracite coal to our distressed people so that dealers' inventories may be replenished and the gravest crisis avoided."

UXBRIDGE'S MEAGER COAL SUPPLY TOLD SENATE AS FAMINE EXAMPLE

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 26.—Citing Uxbridge as one of the Massachusetts communities where an acute shortage of coal exists, Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN of the Third District, said today that the unusual low stock pile of coal in Massachusetts, as of April 1, 1943, was one of the contributing factors to the present critical situation.

Comparing 1942 stocks with those of 1943, PHILBIN presented voluminous data to the United States Senate special Maloney committee, investigating current coal and fuel shortage in New England, showing that Uxbridge had 126 tons of anthracite on hand on April 1, 1942, as compared to a new low of 66 tons on April 1, 1943, according to figures given him by Director John P. McBride of the division on the necessities of life of the Massachusetts Department of Labor and Industry.

Sixty-ton drop

"This is a loss of 60 tons for just one community," said PHILBIN, "and there are corresponding proportionate losses in every community in the Commonwealth."

Testifying before the committee, PHILBIN stated: "We have had strikes, some transportation troubles, some considerable increase in demand, and I am willing to make allowances for all these factors in a reasonable way.

"But I do insist as the representative of my people, that if these coal shortages exist, every possible, practicable measure be taken to relieve them and the available supply of coal be apportioned and distributed as equitably as it is humanly possible to do so among the consumers, large and small, and of every kind and character."

Makes suggestions

The Massachusetts Congressman made several suggestions, which are now under study by the Senate committee.

"I believe there have been certain omissions, discriminations, and faulty distributions made in the New England area which ought to be immediately corrected," said PHILBIN, in making the following proposals:

"First, if there is any question about the authority of the Solid Fuels Administrator to deal with all phases of this problem, let it be resolved at once.

"I understand that somewhat over 15 governmental agencies have something to do with the over-all fuel situation in Massachusetts, which presumably have parent organization in Washington."

Need practical directors

"Outstanding, well-known, capable, and experienced coal men who understand the particular supply and distribution methods of the New England area and who have the confidence of the people, ought to be put in charge of allocating coal and be given full and unquestionable authority to act to relieve our precarious situation. It is clear that theoretical bureaucrats cannot solve this problem.

"Secondly, I believe we ought to determine immediately to what extent, if any, overpurchasing of coal by the armed services has contributed to these coal shortages.

"We might well explore the posibilities of reallocating any excess or surplus coal now in possession of the armed services and also stop the building of unecessary inventories, if we find they are being accumulated."

Would pay more

"Thirdly, if miners wages could be adjusted and the ceiling prices on coal adjusted by O. P. A. our desperate consumers of New England would certainly be willing, in order to get coal, to pay this additional cost."

PHILBIN told the committee he was not in favor of rationing coal at this time. "I hope and believe the dealers can work out this problem," he said.

"But I likewise believe that the machinery ought to be set up by O. P. A. to ration coal whenever it becomes really necessary, and thus insure to all our consumers, irrespective of their station in life, an equitable and fair share of available coal supplies."

Rations, if necessary

"It is also my opinion that provision should be made at once to supply New England with additional soft coal so that the people may be saved from hardship if anthracite proves insufficient to meet their needs.

"However, may I add that I would regard both rationing and the use of soft coal to be justifiable only if all other measures should fail."

PHILBIN DEMANDS COAL BE RUSHED TO STATE

WASHINGTON, November 24.—Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN (Democrat), Clinton, Mass., rushed a plea to Petroleum Administrator Ickes, O. P. A. Chief Bowles, and Economic Stabilizer Vinson today to have whole trainloads of hard coal made up immediately and hurried to Massachusetts to relieve acute shortages.

At the same time, PHILBIN called on the three for an immediate adjustment of the coal price ceilings so coal may flow promptly into Massachusetts and New England.

Stating coal will not flow from the mines until the newer higher price ceilings are put into effect, PHILBIN said: "It is clear by now that the coal will not be moved until coal price increases are authorized and I urge you to do everything you can to bring about appropriate price ceilings at the earliest possible time. Senator WALSH (Democrat), Massachusetts, joins me in this request."

PHILBIN SAYS MORE COAL ALLOCATED—CONGRESSMAN WIRES OF ACTION TAKEN AT CAPITAL

Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN in a wire sent here today from Washington announced the allocation of more coal to Leominster to help relieve the current shortage. The Clinton Congressman has done considerable with solid fuels officials in Washington in seeking car allocations for Leominster.

The wire follows: "Solid Fuels in response to my intercession, today advised me that one carload of chestnut has been allocated to Leominster Fuel Co. to help ease the shortage in Leominster. This is in addition to two cars of coke diverted from Massachusetts stocks about which I advised city officials last Monday, January 17, and one carload of anthracite released from coal fields for shipment to City Coal Co. Am continuing my eoffrts and will keep you advised."

Some time ago Mayor Mathias LaPierre sought the assistance of Congressman PHILBIN along with that of United States Senator DAVID I. WALSH and United States Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., in relieving the coal shortage situation here.

REPRESENTATIVE PHILBIN URGES NEW COAL PRICES TO FILL NEW ENGLAND BINS—APPEALS TO THREE UNITED STATES AGENCIES FOR ACTION

WASHINGTON, November 16.—Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN (Democrat), of Clinton, Mass., appealed today to the three Government agencies handling coal price questions to fix a definite ceiling price on coal "with all possible speed" so that supplies may be replenished in New England.

"Now that the miners are back at work, it is of paramount importance that new ceiling prices on coal be established at once," PHILBIN wrote to Solid Fuels Administrator Ickes, O. P. A. Director Bowles, and Economic Stabilization Director Vinson.

"Adjustments ought to be made which will permit the general public to absorb the increased cost, as it is willing to do, in order to be assured of being supplied with coal as quickly as possible.

"If Economic Stabilization Director Vinson sits on the lid too tightly, it will surely explode and we will have the aggravation of black-market coal."

S. F. A. SET TO EASE NORTHEAST COAL SHORTAGE—BLACKSTONE TO GET FOUR CARLOADS AT ONCE

WASHINGTON, November 29.—Representative PHILBIN (Democrat), of Massachusetts, after a lengthy conference today with officials of the Solid Fuels Administration, disclosed that while there was no guaranty that dealer inventories of anthracite could be built up to avert widespread hardship in New England this winter, a program for meeting emergencies had been worked out.

PHILBIN said he was assured that action was being expedited in getting coal into distressed areas of Massachusetts, but he was told that soft coal would have to be used by New England consumers before the end of the winter.

Divert hard coal to northeast

Hard coal ordinarily scheduled for the West and Middle West, PHILBIN said, was being diverted to New England to help relieve the coal shortage there, and should be arriving today or in the very near future.

Adjustment of price ceilings on anthracite freed some of this coal, previously held back because of uncertainty over prices, the Congressman said.

PHILBIN said in a statement after his conference with Solid Fuels officials that the S. F. A. is fully conscious of the extreme shortage of anthracite coal needs for our people.

But, he added, the agency is handicapped by limited personnel and limited funds. He said urgent appeals of dealers and consumers numbering 1,500 in Boston and 1,000 in Washington were going unanswered because of this lack of personnel.

PHILBIN late today was informed that immediate steps were being taken to get four carloads of hard coal to the town of Blackstone, Mass., where the need for prompt action was certified by the O. D. T.-Solid Fuels advisory committee. The shipment was allocated at once to meet the hardship in the community which the committee found resulting from lack of fuel.

PHILBIN REPORTS ON COAL SITUATION

WASHINGTON.—Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN of the Third Massachusetts District has conferred at length with officials of the Solid Fuels Administration with regard to the desperate coal situation in Massachusetts. While he was given every assurance that action was being expedited in getting coal into distressed areas in the State, these officials made it clear that no dealer inventories of anthracite coal could be built up to meet the dire hardship he predicted when real cold New England weather sets in.

PHILBIN was told that probably before the end of winter, soft coal would have to be used by consumers in New England. He also received assurances that hardship cases would be given special attention by Solid Fuels regional officials working in conjunction with the State emergency board recently set up.

The Massachusetts Representative also received the encouraging news that anthracite coal originally scheduled for the West and Middle West was now being diverted to New England to help relieve the situation in that area.

PHILBIN was advised that on the day following Solid Fuels recommendation of adjustments of price ceilings, large shipments of coal were sent to Massachusetts from the coal fields, which should be arriving in Massachusetts coal yards this week. PHILBIN had previously recommended speedy adjustment of these ceilings to O. P. A., Solid Fuels, and Economic Stabilization Director Vinson on the assumption that New England families would be willing to pay higher prices for coal provided they could get supplies. While price discussions and interbureau wranglings were going on in Washington on these price ceilings for coal, processors were holdinp back shipments to New England, he said, thus preventing shipments of badly needed supplies.

PHILBIN commented as follows, upon emerging from his talk with Solid Fuels officials:

"I am satisfied that the Solid Fuels Administration is fully conscious of the extreme shortage of anthracite coal needs for our people. However, it is being handicapped in its action by limited personnel and limited funds With all the money that is being wasted by nonessential government agencies, it is paradoxical that some provision cannot be made promptly to set up staffs here in Washington and throughout the country to cope with this situation. So limited is present personnel that urgent appeals of dealers and consumers numbering into the thousands remain unanswered. On November 25, I was told, unanswered mail had over 1,500 pieces in the Boston office while is passed the 1,000 figure in the Washington office.

"To try to relieve this condition, I have taken the following action:

"First, I have requested Senator MCKELLAR, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations, to speed up consideration of additional appropriations for Solid Fuels Administration, thus permitting the hiring of additional personnel and, secondly, I have asked the Civil Service Commission to make a survey of some of the less essential government agencies here in Washington in an effort to have assigned badly needed stenographic, clerical and administrative help to Solid Fuels.

"For the information of coal dealers, Solid Fuels proposes to receive requests for coal through O. D. T. Solid Fuels advisory committees set up in each community in Massachusetts, which in turn will be approved and forwarded to Washington. The intention is to permit consumers and dealers to use this machinery to bring the more desperate needs to the attention of the Government, but I have suggested that red tape be cut and that so far as it is possible, the matter be handled by the coal industry and dealers with a minimum of Government interference.

"I also urged that compliance officials be sent to the mines so as to insure that none of the coal destined for New England is diverted to other parts of the country.

"The inability to procure personnel was particularly amazing to me. If sufficient help to answer letters, telegrams and do ordinary administrative work cannot be procured from other government agencies, then the Solid Fuels Administrator ought to call for volunteers from other government agencies in Washington and in Boston and in other cities where regional offices are located.

"Developments in the coal shortage situation have become so serious, in my opinion, that they are likely to have a direct bearing on the successful continuance of the war effort, and for that reason, I believe many patriotic women would be glad to offer their services in the event regular employees cannot be obtained.

"Another distressing fact disclosed at the conference was that no dealer inventories whatsoever may be built up. Consumers will have to be supplied virtually as the coal is received, according to officials. I do not believe that this method will work because at the height of the severe winter season the ordinary dealer will have the greatest of difficulty in serving consumer needs from arriving cars of coal. Yet I suppose half a loaf is better than none.

"The Solid Fuels Administration has refused to accede to my request that entire trainloads of cars be sent to Massachusetts to build up coal inventories, though I believe that this would be an excellent way of enabling coal dealers to get some supply ahead. This method was used to get oil to New England last winter and I see no reason why the same method cannot be employed to build up coal supplies for the emergency period bound to ensue when cold weather comes.

"I want to assure the coal dealers and consumers of the Third District that I am pressing daily for favorable action on their requests for inventory adjustments and additional coal supplies. I will continue to give personal and careful attention to the individual situations of the cities and towns of my district. So grave is the coal shortage we must give it unremitting service if we are to avoid real hardship."

A Good Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include an article written by Mr. Lowell Mellett, and published in the Washington Evening Star, June 22, 1944. The article follows:

HOUSE MERCHANT MARINE'S COMMITTEE PRAISED FOR PLANNING PEACETIME SHIPPING

(By Lowell Mellett)

SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND, of Virginia, and his House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries are rendering the American people another real public service.

This committee was the principal author of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, under which one of the greatest jobs of the war was made possible. Now, taking time by the forelock again, it is seeking to assure a merchant marine fitted to America's needs after the war, seeking to prevent another shipping debacle such as that which followed the First World War.

To this end the committee is receiving information and opinion from the Maritime Commission, from the men who man the ships and from the men who expect to own them, or considerable part of them, when war shipping gives way to peacetime commerce. There is reason to believe that the committee will come up with a bill calculated to promote the national interest and protect the private interests of all those properly concerned.

FOLLOWED MESSAGE

The act of 1936 followed a message of the President in which he said:

"In the event of a major war in which the United States is not involved, our commerce, in the absence of an adequate American merchant marine, might find itself seriously crippled because of its inability to secure bottoms for neutral, peaceful, foreign trade.

"In the event of a war in which the United States itself might be engaged. American flag ships are obviously needed not only for naval auxiliaries, but also for the maintenance of reasonable and necessary commercial intercourse with other nations. We should remember lessons learned in the last war."

By "lessons learned in the last war," the President had in mind that we were caught wholly unprepared at that time to move men and materials in our own ships; he must also have had in time the great shipyard at Hog Island and its delivery of ships—after the armistice.

The act of 1936 provided a ship-building program that would give this country 500 new modern vessels in the course of 10 years. By the time of Pearl Harbor 200 of these ships had been built and the Maritime Commission had acquired the necessary know-how that enabled it to shift to a wartime shipbuilding schedule almost overnight. Old yards were vastly expanded and new yards were built. Men and women—nearly 100,000 women—were recruited and training courses opened. Some 700,000 workers were presently on the job in yards that operated 24 hours a day, 7 days a week.

FREE OF STOPPAGES

In passing, it should be noted that this program has been carried through almost literally without a strike, sit-down, or lock-out.

The result was 728 ships, totaling 8,018,000 deadweight tons, built in 1942, and 1,949 ships totaling 19,297,000 tons, built in 1943. The rate of production in 1943 was five ships a day. The rate this year is the same.

Without these ships and the 140,000 trained seamen who man them, we would not have an army of millions overseas, completely equipped and supplied; without this achievement of American shipyards and merchant marine, our allies could scarcely have held out. It has been the greatest shipbuilding and ship operating job in all history.

Chairman BLAND and his committee now are thinking about the future, the problem of what to do with our ships and our seamen when the war is over. They have ideas of their own, and are listening to all comers. There is significance in the fact that nobody has come forward with a proposal to junk the ships, as was done in the years following the last war. Instead, there seems to be a general determination that the United States shall continue to have a great merchant fleet, one equal to our needs.

Wake Up, America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARION T. BENNETT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of Congressman FRED E. BUSBEY, which will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of Tuesday, June 20, on pages A3165 and A3166, should be read with a great deal of interest and concern by every Member of the Congress.

The subject matter of the speech, "Wake Up, America," is certainly very timely and should be taken to heart by every voter in the United States.

FRED E. BUSBEY is a Member of Congress from Illinois, and exceptionally well qualified to speak on this subject, as he is a Member of the House of Representatives' World War Veterans' Legislation Committee, a Member of the House of Representatives Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, and is a former Director of Americanism, American Legion, Department of Illinois.

A Mayor Looks at Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMMET O'NEAL

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from an address by Wilson W. Wyatt, mayor, city of Louisville, Ky., and president, American Society of Planning Officials, at the joint meeting of the American Society of Planning Officials and the National Association of Housing Officials, Stevens Hotel, Chicago, Ill., May 3, 1944:

We are developing ghost areas. We call it blight. Our oldest residential streets are now lines of boarding houses. Their value is half, a quarter, a tenth of what it was. Our business areas are gradually moving away from the sections our fathers knew as the centers of thriving commerce. And in the wake of this movement we see a dilapidated obsolescence. People are moving out, farther and farther. As values decline, taxes go up in order that the budget may be balanced, for most city treasuries are largely pegged to real estate. We are casting off our old buildings like old clothing, and leaving them to disuse and decay. We cannot shrug our shoulders and just call it fate. Some even put blinders on and call it progress. But however we name it, it's waste and extravagance. And here is something that private enterprise, unaided and on its own, can do nothing about. If this is permitted to go its decadent way to its inevitable result, it means, at the worst, the death knell of our cities. Or at the very best it would mean much more public housing than we care to contemplate.

At one time we regarded housing as coming only within one category—private housing. For the past decade we have dealt with housing in two parts—private and public. Actually housing, like Gaul, is divided into three parts—private, public, and urban redevelopment, the latter to be done by private enterprise, but with sufficient public machinery and assistance to make it possible. If the proper legal machinery is established by the Federal Government, the respective State governments, and our cities urban redevelopment contains the greatest conceivable promise for the post-war period—for private enterprise because of the billions of dollars of construction it would bring about; for cities because of the blighted areas which would be reclaimed; for people because of the modern, livable, convenient homes they would enjoy.

Urban redevelopment has reached an advanced stage of general talking. But the time for talking is past. We must have action if the job is to be done. The problem is so complicated and so vast that it calls for the active cooperation of several groups. Working together they can do the job. I suggest that one representative of each of the following organizations get together promptly and tackle this job: The National Association of Housing Officials, the American Society of Planning Officials, the American Municipal Association, the United States Conference of Mayors, the Council of State Governments, the Urban Land Institute, and the National Committee on Housing.

For decades we have witnessed gradual but fatal dry rot spreading in concentric circles from the hearts of our cities. The problem has been too much like the weather—everyone talks about it but no one ever does anything about it. And acting alone, not one of these organizations can get the job done. I am satisfied that if this group will tackle the job jointly, the solution can be reached. If this is done, the possibilities are limitless—for private enterprise, for our cities, for people.

Public housing has done a good job in this country. As evidence of this, it is gaining in public acceptance month by month and year by year. There are two suggestions, however, which I should like to make: First, that local management authorities should have the greatest possible local autonomy, more than they now enjoy; and second, that payments in lieu of taxes should be increased. Had the National Housing Agency at the outset adopted the present policy, public housing would have been spared many a headache and public acceptance would have come much sooner. The present policy is not too bad while abnormal wartime rents are being paid, but as these decline the present formula must be liberalized, with the objectives, as the minimum, that sums equal to pre-project taxes be paid local governments.

Situation in China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is a source of some encouragement that more and more nationally known writers are commencing to appreciate the gravity of Japan's latest moves in China, to which I made reference in remarks which appeared in the RECORD of April 19, 1944. Another writer, who has now come to see the picture in the same light, is Maj. George Fielding Eliot. In an article entitled "Situation in China," which appeared in the Washington Evening Star of June 20, 1944, Major Eliot said as follows:

SITUATION IN CHINA

(By Maj. George Fielding Eliot)

On June 11, Maj. Gen. Claire L. Chennault, commanding the United States Fourteenth Air Force in China, returned from an inspection of the bases under his command and made a statement which deserved far more attention from the press of this country than it received. General Chennault was discussing nothing less than the future of the war against Japan and was pointing out the course which Japan is taking in order to consolidate what the Japanese high command doubtless hopes will prove an impregnable position against future attack, even by the combined forces of the United Nations.

General Chennault points out that the Japanese, in their present drive on Changsha and south of that point along the Hankow-Canton Railway, are trying to build up a "west wall," based on the railway, for the defense of the Chinese coastal region and of "Formosa as a keystone of their empire." This is vitally important. Remember that our great amphibious efforts in the Pacific are directed toward the Chinese coast, and that domination of the waters between Formosa, the Philippines, and the coast of China is probably essential to our success.

Those parts of the Chinese coast still in possession of the Chinese armies and accessible to Americans coming from the sea are largely in the Province of Fukien, opposite Formosa. If the Japanese could obtain possession of the whole course of the Hankow-Canton railway, they could then, behind this shield, proceed to mop up Fukien and the coastal region generally, thus providing an adequate backstop for Formosa. So far, they have never been able to do this; but then they have never made any serious attempt to do so, because as long as Formosa was not menaced from the sea, it did not matter very much that the Chinese still held most of Fukien. Now it does matter, for it is of life and death consequence to the Japanese that American and British air power should be denied secure bases on the continent of Asia, the only secure base area from which the Japanese main islands can be subjected to continuous and effective air attack.

General Chennault further notes that the Japanese have resumed their endeavors to reopen the Peiping-Hankow railway, the northern half of the main trunk line across China. They had it once, but they lost a good part of it to Chinese counterattack while they were diverted by the powerful Chinese resistance at Loyang. Now Loyang has been taken, and they are back on the railway and seem to be retaking the lost portion fairly rapidly. The great importance which the Japanese now attach to possession of this railway is here apparent: For when this writer last had an opportunity to devote a column to the war in China, Loyang was holding out, Chinese counterattacks were pressing ahead, and it looked like the same old familiar story of Japanese successes followed by Japanese retreat.

The Japanese would not have it so this time. They put in more and more of their good troops from Manchuria. They seem determined to get that railroad, rebuild it and start it running, and they seem just as determined to carry on their success right down to Canton, thus establishing a rail line of communications from Manchuria to the coast of the South China Sea, capable of carrying up to 100,000 tons of freight a month, and of supporting considerable armies along its course—a line of communications far superior to anything which the Chinese can hope to command in the same area. The Japanese, in so doing, would make up (at least in part) for the severe losses to their merchant shipping, on which their forces in South China have hitherto been dependent, and they would cut off all access by land to the air bases which now attack that shipping along the coast, and which in future may support major attacks on the Japanese mainland.

The problem of our amphibious power on reaching the strategic triangle above referred to (between China, Formosa, and Luzon) would be not a landing and establishment of bases on a friendly coast, with Chinese aid all ready for us, but one of the most difficult forced landings that we have yet undertaken, immeasurably complicated by the vast problems of distance and of lack of strong friendly base areas close at hand.

It is not too much to say that in all likelihood the successful completion of the present Japanese drive for possession of the Chinese railways may prolong the war against Japan by a year or even 2 years.

In effect, the Japanese are trying to build themselves a secure continental stronghold backing up their island empire. They foresee, says General Chennault, the day when they will have to retire from the outer fringes of their present area of domination. They are being pushed back now from the Pacific islands, from Dutch New Guiana, from north Burma. Their dwindling merchant marine cannot much longer maintain, nor their dwindling naval and air power protect, the vast overseas lines of communication on which they are dependent. Therefore their final dependence must be on their Army, which has as yet not been seriously engaged with Allied forces except in minor detachments.

A Word to the Wise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I have just read with a great deal of interest an editorial entitled "A Word to the Wise" in the June issue of the Foreign Service magazine. As the membership knows, this magazine is the official publication of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and I commend to all of you the editorial to which I have referred. It will be well worth the time of Members of all parties to read this and to consider it most seriously and earnestly:

A WORD TO THE WISE

Delegates to the impending national political conventions will be wise if they resist the temptation to make the subject of post-war veteran welfare a political issue in the 1944 campaign. They will be fooling only themselves if they forget that neither of the major political parties can rightfully take exclusive credit for all the veteran welfare laws which the Congress has adopted since Pearl Harbor.

Those who frame the formal platforms should remember that this Nation's responsibility to its veterans represents a sacred obligation—one which should never be smeared by cheap politics or campaign demagoguery.

Most men in service know that their post-war welfare will be governed primarily by the economic conditions which prevail in the United States. They regard civil-service jobs, pensions, hospitalization, employment preference laws, unemployment insurance, vocational training and similar legislative benefits as relief measures only.

America's civilian soldiers, sailors, and marines are realists because of their military training. That's why they understand no factory can employ veterans to produce goods than can never be sold—that there can be no security for veterans who take up farming if farm products must be left to rot in the fields because prices are too low—that no firm can employ veterans as salesmen if the public lacks the necessary purchasing power.

The men serving in this war will never swap their votes for a synthetic prosperity created by public funds spent for boondoggling projects or leaf-raking jobs. They will not be fooled by candidates who promise them employment that smacks only of temporary relief.

On the contrary, they know that the welfare of the veteran, in the post-war era, will depend primarily upon the conditions which affect all citizens. In other words, the average G. I. Joe is convinced the preservation of the American system is his strongest safeguard and this means political and economic principles dedicated "to the greatest good for the greatest number."

Because he is sold on this basic idea—G. I. Joe knows his post-war welfare will be best served only when organized labor, management, and the Federal Government agree to work hand in hand for the common good.

Political strategists who nurse the notion they can buy the so-called veteran vote with fantastic ham and egg prosperity schemes are due for a rude awakening when the ballots are counted next November.

Extending Mail Service Through Parcel Post by Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, to permit intelligent planning for future expansion of aviation, in relation to postal services, legislation is necessary.

In 1918 Congress appropriated $100,000 to establish the first air-mail route. The courage of the Post Office Department to undertake the transportation of mail by air when the public had little if any knowledge of this magic flying machine, as it was then called, deserves the commendation of everyone. Congress can feel justly proud of its contribution in the past. There are men here in Congress today who by their support and encouragement of aviation legislation made possible the present great advancement.

Postmaster General Frank C. Walker recently stated that the whole country looks forward to profound changes in the transportation of mail as a direct result of this war. The recent enormous growth in the transportation of mail by air forecasts the shape of things to come.

After the war, the Nation will have vast numbers of highly trained and experienced pilots, navigators, and technicians. What are their possibilities of employment in the field they have now been trained for? It should be our business to utilize effectively this vast potentiality.

Many pages could be written on aviation's contribution to this war but at least we can all agree that it has changed the whole war picture and will change the peace set-up. It is obviously not possible for us to rest on the laurels of those farsighted Congressmen who made possible the first transportation of mail by air. It is our duty to discuss the new problems and propose new legislation to fit this new day.

World War No. 2 has made the airplane business one of the very greatest of all our industries, as indicated by a capital expansion from $160,000,000 to approximately $12,000,000,000 in a few years. Approximately 6,000,000 men and women are now engaged in the various phases of this great industry. In the pre-war years, we looked to the automobile industry as one of the greatest giants of our time but the aircraft industry is conservatively estimated as three times larger than the automobile industry was in its peak period. Let me add in passing that the automobile industry is probably the largest contributor to aviation. But what of the future? Any aviation legislation affecting this country as well as pertaining to foreign countries will vitally affect the airplane industry. There will be a great surplus of planes, and the natural question will be, how to use these planes after the war. Many engineers have speculated on the prospects of using military planes for commercial purposes. How successful they may be in converting them will depend to a great degree on the purpose for which they may be used. We shall undoubtedly have huge military airplane fleets for the protection of the country after the war, just as we now have battleships. But that will not begin to take care of all of our stock. An industry which in the month of March, according to the figures of Donald Nelson, produced 9,300 planes, must look to new markets to utilize its huge productive capacity.

I am advised that prior to the war, commercial air lines had in operation only 350 planes. If we were to ask the airplane manufacturer today how long would it take them to produce these 350 planes, undoubtedly the time would be in mere days. How then can more planes be used?

These commercial air lines are naturally planning for the future as to what they will carry in the way of cargo.

Recently, the War Department stated that 2,000 soldiers of the Air Corps have already returned from World War No. 2. These soldiers will be attracted to this giant industry for employment. Many also will look to the air carrier. One air line stated that they not only expected to continue the employment of some 7,500 men and women now on its pay roll and have jobs waiting for their former employees who are now in the armed forces, but, with the great expansion in this line, to have employment for 10,000 additional persons. These highly trained and experienced pilots returning from the war can be used by commercial lines, but it will take much planning, and they look to us for legislation.

Much has been said in favor of sending most of the first-class mail by air. In July 1942 the Postmaster General said:

> The Post Office Department must be in a position in behalf of the public to take immediate advantage of the new possibilities for better and more economical postal service which will be available at the war's end. Mail handling equipment facilities for the distribution or the dispatch of mail, location of terminals, and the mail handling operating methods must be planned so that these new resources available to the Nation may be intelligently integrated into the Nation's Postal Service. Changes will be produced as revolutionary in the transportation and handling of mail as came with the railroad. This is not a visionary prophecy, but it is the considered judgment of many thoughtful men of sound technical training and business experience.

All admit that at least a great portion of the mail will go by air. I am advised that some 30,000 postal employees are now in the armed forces and they, too, look to the Post Office Department for employment and to new methods of transporting the mail.

I have been making a study as to the possibilities of making use of at least some of these planes and surplus pilots to permit the industry to continue the production of planes, possibly smaller-type planes, especially to serve the needs of small communities. I wonder if you realize, for example, of the 42,680 post offices almost two-thirds of these, or, to be exact, 25,773 of the 42,680 post offices, are located in small communities. These offices are known as fourth-class offices. There are not a dozen States that do not have more fourth-class post offices than all the other classes combined.

If for no other reason than those I have mentioned, and, I repeat, so that some of these planes and men can be converted from war to peacetime activities and so that the industries will be ready, legislation should be considered now. However, it is our first duty as legislators to recommend legislation which will permit the Post Office Department to give our citizens better and faster service for all classes of mail. The post office is charged by Congress to transport the mail by the fastest means available. Air mail is already accepted by the public as a faster service. Some may have complaints on the air-mail service today, and I believe you are entitled to some explanation of the conditions in this regard.

In passing let me say that the air mail has been increased by 250 percent and there has also been a great increase in the passenger service, despite the fact that only one-half the number of prewar planes are now available to commercial air lines. The Army still has approximately one-half of the commercial planes they took over at the outset of the war. I noted in a newspaper recently that the Army now states that all of the planes will be returned. That is good news for the Post Office Department. There should not be 1 day's delay in returning these planes now that the Army feels they can be returned. Officials in the Post Office Department believe that when these planes are returned the air-mail service will again be what the public is entitled to.

There are 29,000,000 persons now living on the farms. Prior to the war they did not, and after the war they would not, receive the benefits of air transportation unless we consider legislation which will make air parcel post possible. The farmer has every reason to expect, for example, day-old chicks of special stock from any hatchery in any section of the country to be delivered to his door by rural carrier. The same is true for the quick delivery of repair parts for machinery and for any other items necessary to modern farming.

I am sure I need not dwell on the importance of air service to farmers who may be stranded at harvest time with a broken combine. He should be able to get the parts he desires quickly, directly from the manufacturer, and have them delivered to his door without making a special trip to town. Time is all-important to him. These farmers have surpluses of perishable foods which could be used if carried quickly by plane.

I mentioned perishables—fruits from the orchards of any section of the country. Time and heat are the enemies of perishable products. Refrigeration of the upper air can be put to work—already I understand it is possible to take a load into the upper air for quick freezing.

To complete aviation's contribution to our national transportation system, it must be extended to these rural communities as well as to many of these 25,000 small villages I referred to.

In 1912, when Congress passed the Parcel Post Act, it set up as its extent and usefulness as follows:

Domestic parcel post offers a convenient, quick, and efficient means of transporting mailable parcels to any post office in the United States or its possessions. The service reaches more places than any other transportation agency. It brings the producer and the consumer into closer contact, thus paving the way to reducing the cost of living and should be advantageous for the shipment of farm products.

Today we must add proper types of planes to serve these small communities if our Parcel Post Service is to be kept up to date. These small communities have every reason to expect the benefits of this faster means of transportation. Farmers today use the most modern machinery and devices manufactured. Recently the benefits of electrification have extended to these rural communities. They already have the finest schools with the best health programs and recreational facilities, and certainly they should have extended transportation by planes in the near future. The strength of any nation is particularly the vitality of its rural communities.

But how can these air carriers extend their service to small communities unless Congress proposes legislation for the convenience of the mailing public?

The Civil Aeronautics Board can prescribe a transportation cost on service basis only. The rate charged the public should be in keeping with the cost. The revenue on air mail over the expenditures would indicate that subsidy is not necessary. In the great industrial sections of our country, plans are now under way to take full advantage of air parcel post in selling their merchandise to all sections of the country. The larger department stores have already made application for helicopter service to deliver their parcels. The merchant in the smallest village can, if we enact legislation, have overnight service and access to the largest stock in the largest wholesale houses in the most distant point of our country. The market of today is but hours away from the smallest village. Legislation is necessary to provide this convenience to business houses throughout the country. It is necessary in order that the smallest town can be given the advantages of the large city near an airport. We shall have planes and pilots in abundance. We need imaginative legislation to put them to work.

Recently the medical profession developed a new drug called penicillin. This drug has been pronounced one of the greatest curers of all time. But, in order that the humblest dwelling or the poorest laborer may be able to take full advantage of this medical wonder, speed in transportation is of utmost importance. Every village in this country should be able to share in this great discovery as well as other benefits which the development of aviation has made possible.

As a member of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee and as chairman of the Subcommittee on Air Mail Service, I have been greatly interested in the promotion of the use of our greatly expanded air facilities to the needs of the people of America. The growth and use of first-class mail by air has been tremendous. In fact, the Postmaster General recently said that the pre-war volume of 20,000,000,000 pound-miles has now increased to approximately 80,000,000,000 pound-miles. Keep in mind that this has occurred with only one-half the number of planes which were available to the post office during the pre-war period! Also keep in mind that practically all this increase has been confined to first-class mail.

A great field for expansion of air mail exists in what is now the parcel-post classification. In order to develop this field, however, it will be necessary to establish competitive rates between air express, surface express, and the present parcel-post charges. At this point, I wish to insert a table showing a comparison of rates between these three services as now charged on a 10-pound package from New York City to various cities throughout the country. I chose a 10-pound package because in a recent Post Office Department report of 1943, the statement was made that 90 percent of all parcels mailed were under 10 pounds.

TABLE I.—Comparison of rates, 10-pound package, merchandise

From New York to—	Parcel post	*Surface express	Air express
Washington	$0.28	$0.41	$1.26
Chicago	.43	.75	2.84
Omaha	.77	.80	4.05
Los Angeles	1.17	1.50	8.40
Seattle	1.17	1.50	8.40

*Insurance included, value to $50.

According to these rates, therefore, we see that surface express is approximately one-third more than parcel post. Apparently this difference of rates is considered competitive as both parcel post and surface express do a thriving business. But now let us consider the present rates charged for air express. On further comparison we see that the air express rate is 7.1 times greater than parcel post and 5.3 times greater than surface express. Obviously, this great difference requires careful scrutiny. I have talked to several people who are interested in the development of air express service, both from the standpoint of progressive service to our people and from the standpoint of increasing the cargo loads of commercial planes. I do not pose as an expert on this subject, but I have confidence in the statements of these people who inform me that the present air express rate is excessive and that it must be lowered to a competitive basis if the people of America are to enjoy the benefits which the development of aviation has made possible.

I believe that further information on this important subject is in order. In view of the tremendous problem of unemployment which will face us when this war is over, it is my opinion that every phase of our industrial resources must be expanded. Certainly the expansion of the aviation industry in all its phases should be a component part of this industrial expansion. In order to promote the phase which deals with air express or air parcel-post service, I have introduced a resolution on this subject which I have asked to be included at this point.

H. R. 5070

A bill prescribing new postal rates for air mail other than the first class

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 (a) of the act of June 12, 1934, entitled "An act to revise air-mail laws, and to establish a commission to make a report to the Congress recommending an aviation policy," as amended, is amended (a) by inserting after "air mail" the following: "of the first class"; and (b) by inserting at the end thereof the following: "On air mail of any class other than the first the rate of postage shall be that shown in the following table:

If both the post office of delivery and the post office of mailing, or any portion of the municipality, town, or village in which such post office is located may be included within a circle the diameter of which is:

More than 0 mile but not more than 600 miles, the rate of postage for each pound or fraction thereof shall be 44 cents.

More than 600 miles but not more than 1,000 miles, the rate of postage for each pound or fraction thereof shall be 48 cents.

More than 1,000 miles but not more than 1,400 miles, the rate of postage for each pound or fraction thereof shall be 54 cents.

More than 1,400 miles but not more than 1,800 miles, the rate of postage for each pound or fraction thereof shall be 60 cents.

More than 1,800 miles but not more than 2,200 miles, the rate of postage for each pound or fraction thereof shall be 66 cents.

More than 2,200 miles but not more than 2,600 miles, the rate of postage for each pound or fraction thereof shall be 72 cents.

More than 2,600 miles the rate of postage for each pound or fraction thereof shall be 78 cents.

SEC. 2. The amendments made by section 1 shall take effect on the first day of the first month which begins at least 15 days after the date of the enactment of this act.

The reader will notice that I have included a table of distances and rates. I want to make it perfectly clear at this time that this table is included in the bill on a tentative basis—the basis for such rates has been reached through conversations with various interested individuals on this subject. It is my hope that hearings will be held on this bill during the latter part of this year. If these hearings are held by the subcommittee on air-mail service, it is my intention, as the chairman of this committee, to invite all persons interested in this matter to appear before our committee to testify regarding this important subject. It is my intention to give serious consideration to the feasibility of establishing this new classification of air-mail service on the basis of reasonable rates which would not require a Government subsidy, to the end that citizens of this Nation might be able to take full advantage of air parcel post, which I believe to be practical and possible immediately following the end of the present war. Upon the conclusions of these hearings, it is my hope that H. R. 5070, properly amended, can be started through the necessary channels for legislative enactment.

Collier's Magazine Calls for Continuation of Dies Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I herewith call to the attention of the Congress and the country an interesting and informative editorial clipped from the June 24 issue of Collier's magazine.

Collier's agrees with that vast majority of Americans who feel that the work of the Dies committee must go on in the years to come despite the unfortunate fact that its able chairman, MARTIN DIES, has been forced by ill health to retire from politics. The forces seeking to undermine our American institutions here at home have not retired, Mr. Speaker, but rather they have renewed and reenforced their efforts to foist foreign isms and concepts upon an American public whom they hope to lull into indifference.

The techniques of un-American groups and individuals are cunning and well concealed. Nothing contributes to their defeat quite so much as the spotlight of publicity being turned upon their objectives, their methods, and their political manipulators. Therefore, as Collier's magazine recommends, this country can well continue to keep a congressional committee on guard to make sure that termites of Government do not gain too much headway in their attempts to bore from within to destroy the foundations upon which the American concept of providing a fair chance for a free people is based in this great and good Republic.

The editorial from the June 24 issue of Collier's magazine follows:

DIES DEPARTS

Representative MARTIN DIES, Democrat, Texas, has announced that he will not try for reelection, after 14 years in Congress, many of them spent as chairman of the Dies committee on subversive activities. Maybe he really wants to go back to private life; maybe he's afraid he couldn't win. We don't know and don't much care.

We are convinced, though, that DIES' committee performed services which added up heavily on the black side of the ledger, in spite of all the times DIES hit some innocent person or group.

This country has freedom of speech and press, at least up to this writing. It also has a goodish number of disloyal or misguided persons who are forever trying to bludgeon or bemuse Americans into changing over to communism, fascism, nazi-ism, funny-money-ism or some other ism. Most of these persons make a virtual trickery, deceit, and hitting below the belt. Because of the Bill of Rights, they have every leeway short of treason itself. This is all very well and makes life in the United States that much more interesting than the straitjacketed countries.

We wouldn't change this state of affairs if we could. But the bulk of us need a watchdog of the type the Dies committee has been—a group of official vigilantes—to keep exposing the tactics, pretensions, and plots of the would-be destroyers of democracy, and thereby to keep them cut down to their correct size.

For these reasons, we think DIES deserves the thanks of the American people as he leaves the congressional stage; and we're in favor of Representative J. PARNELL THOMAS' (Republican, New Jersey) proposal that Congress establish a permanent Dies-type committee.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. JOHN J. DELANEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. THOMAS HENRY CULLEN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, the passing of TOM CULLEN while a Member of the House of Representatives was an irreparable loss. His membership in the New York State Assembly, as well as the State senate, was a picture of fine, loyal, and conscientious service to his district, city, and State.

His election to the House of Representatives in 1918 was another indication of the devotion of the people of his district and was a striking evidence of the faith and confidence they had in TOM CULLEN.

One of the occasions to which Tom often referred, and to which he pointed with pride, was his reelection to the Sixty-seventh Congress in 1920. It was with pardonable pride that he could look upon that election with satisfaction—he was the only Democratic Congressional candidate who was elected from Brooklyn in that year.

Like a true soldier, almost to the moment of his passing, he was actively engaged in his work as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, and was in daily attendance on the floor of the House.

He loved life and good companionship, and his fondest desire was to spread happiness to all through his cheerful and happy disposition. Those who knew Tom found a loyal and true friend, a sagacious leader, and a conscientious counsellor.

His colleagues will miss him, his district has suffered a great loss, and our sympathy and condolence go to his bereaved family.

Memorial Stones for Service Men and Women Missing in Action or Buried at Sea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOE HENDRICKS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to provide for the erection of memorial stones in national cemeteries for certain servicemen and women determined to be missing in action or buried at sea. The reasons I have introduced this bill is because some of my constituents have written me asking if such stones could be erected in the national cemeteries. Upon inquiring of the War Department if this could be done, they informed me that the law provided only for the memorial stones to mark the grave where a body was actually interred. If, perhaps, the erection of such memorial stones in the national cemeteries in memory of those who have been lost can be any degree of consolation to their relatives, I think there is no question but what it should be done.

This bill does not make it mandatory upon the part of the Secretary of War to erect these stones. It provides that they shall be erected upon request of a member of the immediate family of the deceased. I sincerely request that when this bill is referred to the committee which has jurisdiction that that committee will give it careful consideration, and I would appreciate the assistance of other Members of the House in bringing about its favorable report and enaction into law.

Service Activities of the D. A. V.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOE STARNES
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, this forenoon my good friend, Millard W. Rice, national service director of the Disabled American Veterans—with whom it has been a pleasure to cooperate while in Congress—told me about a dinner given in the Yale Club in New York City last Wednesday evening by the Honorable Percy C. Magnus, chairman of the Disabled American Veterans' national service fund. This dinner, attended by many social-minded civic leaders, inaugurated a campaign to raise sufficient funds to enable the D. A. V. to so expand its present Nationwide set-up of full-time national service officers as to be able to extend needed technical advice and assistance to the increasing thousands of the disabled dischargees of this war. Several speakers at this dinner, including Gen. Frank

T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and two of his able Assistant Administrators, Col. George Ijams and Maj. O. W. Clark, attested to the value of the D. A. V.'s service activities, particularly as effective attorneys-in-fact between the Veterans' Administration and its disabled-veteran claimants.

No veteran organization has any more extensive and effective Nation-wide service staff to take care of this essential post-war job than that maintained by the D. A. V.

FORMATION OF D. A. V.

Formed in 1920, and chartered by Congress in 1932, to render service to, for, and by America's disabled war veterans, the Disabled American Veterans has been generally recognized as the official spokesman for America's disabled defenders.

According to its congressional charter of incorporation—Public Law 186, approved June 17, 1932, as amended by Public Law No. 668, approved July 15, 1942—active membership in the D. A. V. is open only to those Americans whose bodies bear the scars of wounds or injuries, or the blight of ailments or disabilities, incurred during or by reason of active war service in the armed forces of the United States, or of some country allied with it, during time of war.

More and more wounded and disabled veterans of World War No. 2 are becoming active members of the D. A. V.

Had I been wounded while serving with our armed forces during World War No. 1, I would certainly have been proud to be a member of this select outfit.

During the more than 24 years of its service activities, the D. A. V. has sponsored and supported much liberalizing legislation on behalf of disabled veterans and their dependents. Liberalized application of such laws, too numerous and too technical here to set forth, has, each year, been brought about by numerous conferences with officials of the Veterans' Administration.

D. A. V. NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS

Located at 1423 East McMillan Avenue, Cincinnati 6, Ohio, the national headquarters of the D. A. V. takes care of all administrative matters and records, and publishes the Disabled American Veterans' Semimonthly newspaper, containing accurate, up-to-date information as to all existing and pending legislation, Presidential Executive orders, court decisions, Attorney General's opinions, Comptroller General's opinions, Veterans' Administration regulations, service letters, Administrator's decisions, and other instructions, as well as much other information of interest and of value to disabled veterans and their dependents.

The present national commander of the D. A. V. is James L. Monnahan, Esq., of St. Paul, Minn., who as a national service officer and department adjutant during the preceding 15 years, has had a broad background of experience which qualifies him to lead an organization composed exclusively of disabled war veterans.

Its national adjutant, Vivian D. Corbly, has been secretary-manager of the organization and editor of its newspaper since 1925. Capt. Cicero F. Hogan is his able assistant.

The largest bank in Cincinnati—the Fifth Third Union Trust Co.—has for many years been the depository for the funds of both the D. A. V., and of its incorporated trusteeship, the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation. Officials handling funds have always been adequately bonded by the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland.

NATIONAL SERVICE SET-UP

The national service bureau of the Disabled American Veterans has had offices in the Munsey Building in Washington, D. C., during the last 24 years.

It is headed by my good friend Millard W. Rice, as national service director, who is now the dean among the national legislative representatives of the several recognized veteran organizations, with energetic, affable, Thomas J. Kehoe as assistant national service director. The Washington office of the D. A. V. is now staffed by 14 service experts.

The activities of the nationally paid national service officers of the D. A. V., located in most of the regional offices of the Veterans' Administration and of its some 900 volunteer State and chapter service officers, also come under the supervision of the national service director.

All of these unselfish, self-sacrificing service officers are themselves disabled veterans, and therefore personally know of the difficulties and handicaps which have bafled thousands of disabled men.

These D. A. V. service officers know all about the technical complications that disabled veterans must overcome factually to prove the service connections of their disabilities to the satisfaction of rating agencies of the United States Veterans' Administration, under the limitations and restrictions of existing law, as legalistically interpreted and as administratively applied.

Understanding such vexatious problems by personal experience, these D. A. V. service officers are naturally more sympathetic and therefore generally more effective in helping disabled claimants to comply with technical requirements to prove legal entitlement to benefits which they have earned.

D. A. V. SERVICE ACCOMPLISHMENTS

The D. A. V. has freely rendered technical help to thousands of disabled veterans each year in obtaining compensation for service-incurred disabilities, medical treatment, hospitalization, insurance benefits, vocational training, civil-service appointments, private employment, and pensions for dependents.

During the past 15 years, for which records are obtainable, the paid national service officers of the D. A. V. have extended service as indicated by the following brief résumé: Claims handled, 852,006; hospitalizations and examinations obtained, 141,373; and total monetary benefits, $60,311,266.14.

Additional compensation payments thus obtained for more than 150,000 disabled veterans and their dependents, who might not otherwise have been able to procure such needed benefits, have converted such beneficiaries from local liabilities into community assets.

It is, of course, not practicable, in a brief statistical résumé, to indicate the many different types of service extended by service officers. Many liberalizing precedents have been established by the decisions obtained, which subsequently have proved of value to hundreds or thousands of disabled veterans having similar claims, the results of which cannot be computed for service reports.

DIFFICULTIES OF PROVING SERVICE ORIGIN

Most citizens agree with the D. A. V. that the Federal Government should bear the burden of providing for the Nation's defenders, but only when it has been established that the veteran's disabilities were incurred in or aggravated by his military service.

To prove service connection of a disability, however, is not an easy thing to do, except where official records show its inception in service. An equitable claim cannot necessarily be legally established.

Many different factors may make it extremely difficult, and in many cases impossible, for a veteran factually to prove that his disabilities were caused by his war service, even though actually service-incurred or aggravated.

AN INVESTMENT IN PATRIOTISM

It is definitely in the interest of all Americans that the fight for justice must be made for those who have sacrificed their youth and a part of their bodies or their health in our country's most hazardous occupation, its military and naval services during time of war.

The faith must be kept with those who have made such sacrifices in the past as well as with those who are now baring their young breasts to the enemy, so that other young men, who in the future may be called upon to make similar sacrifices, will have the assurance, on the basis of past performance, that if they, too, should also be so unfortunate they will not be permitted to become mere forgotten heroes.

The determination of the D. A. V. to see to it that America's disabled veterans are adequately provided for should be generously supported, as a public investment in the future patriotism of our youth, and as practical patriotism which brings huge humanitarian and financial dividends to every community, to every State, and to our country.

HOW D. A. V. SERVICE IS FINANCED

The D. A. V. has been able to maintain its extensive service program primarily out of funds contributed by disabled veterans themselves, by their payment of membership dues in the D. A. V., through its some 40 State departments and 900 chapters.

A national per capita tax of $2, plus a national service fee of $1, is paid each year to the national headquarters by every local chapter for each of its members.

Local D. A. V. chapters finance their own service and relief activities out of their portion of the annual membership dues, and by annual Forget-Me-Not Day drives, dances, and other projects.

Nationally, the D. A. V. has recently been endeavoring, with considerable but not enough success, to raise needed service funds through the sale of Ident-O-Tags—miniature automobile license plates—to be attached to one's key ring. The value of this key insurance is indicated by the fact that about 1,200 sets of lost key rings are returned each week to their owners.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS' SERVICE FOUNDATION

To make possible a much-needed expansion of its rehabilitation activities, the D. A. V. is hopeful that understanding fellow Americans will help to build up a needed trust fund of up to $10,000,000 by generous donations to its incorporated trusteeship, the Disabled American Veterans' Service Foundation, 546 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

This D. A. V. Service Foundation has seven trustees, five of whom each serve for 5-year terms, one expiring each year and replaced by another as confirmed by the national convention of the D. A. V., and the other two of whom automatically consist of the national commander and national adjutant of the D. A. V. These trustees serve without remuneration.

Donations received by the D. A. V. Service Foundation may be placed into separate State trust-fund accounts according to State of origin, for allocation to the D. A. V., when needed, for the expense of maintaining one or more full-time national service officers in each such State.

WHY D. A. V. NEEDS OUTSIDE HELP

Many eligible disabled veterans fail to become paid-up members of the D. A. V., and thus to help to maintain its Nation-wide service set-up on behalf of less fortunate disabled veterans, for varied reasons; some because they know very little about the D. A. V., some because of indifference, others because of selfishness, some because of negligence, and many others because they cannot afford it. If they all understood the implications involved, every service-disabled veteran would decide that he should belong to the D. A. V.

The American public is, I am confident, desirous of fulfilling its obligation that those who return from hazardous military employment in the armed forces of the United States, handicapped by some physical or mental scars incurred by reason of such active service, shall be adequately provided for by a grateful Nation.

Such a service program deserves the solid support of all service-disabled veterans and of all Americans.

COMMENDATIONS OF D. A. V.

Among many statements commending the D. A. V., and its rehabilitation services, the following are a few examples:

The purpose of your Nation-wide rehabilitation program * * * to extend needed assistance to members of our armed forces who become disabled, as well as to disabled veterans of the World War and their dependents, is, indeed, a worthy one and merits the full support of our citizens. (Franklin D. Roosevelt, President.)

Please express for me to the Disabled American Veterans my continued appreciation of their services to the country. (Herbert Hoover, former President.)

It is, therefore, particularly gratifying to me to learn of the plans of the Disabled American Veterans to expand its already extensive service program so as to make available to the handicapped servicemen of World War No. 2, who are coming out of the present conflict in ever-increasing number, the valuable advice and assistance it has long rendered their fathers of World War No. 1. These new veterans and their dependents also will need a helping hand, and I hope that the organization will meet with complete success in its campaign to provide now for the extension to them of its worthy activities. (Gen. John J. Pershing.)

During the last 24 years national service officers of the Disabled American Veterans have rendered valuable assistance to disabled veterans and their dependents and, incidentally, have facilitated the work of the Veterans' Administration and its contacts for such service claimants. Your national service officers, being themselves disabled veterans, can be most helpful in instructing and impressing claimants as to the necessary legal requirements and limitations under the laws enacted by the Congress. (Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.)

In spite of its small number, I feel that the Disabled American Veterans has, in the years since I have been in Congress, been the most effective organization for the benefit of the ex-servicemen. (Senator Bronson Cutting, deceased.)

The Disabled American Veterans are a heritage of proven patriotism. Let's serve God by serving humanity. (Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN.)

The Military Order of the World War passed a resolution endorsing the Disabled American Veterans * * * for the purpose of assisting disabled veterans in the preparation and presentation of their claims * * * a most important work. (Col. George E. Ijams, past commander in chief Military Order of the World War.)

I know of no organization that I can more heartily commend and support than the D. A. V., whose purpose is the rescue and helping of disabled veterans. Let us hope all loyal Americans will recognize the D. A. V.'s humanitarian objective and program as their opportunity to demonstrate loyalty and patriotism. The people of the United States must not and will not fail those who did not fail them. (Gen. Robert Lee Bullard.)

Be assured that we of the American Federation of Labor, who have long relied upon the principle that unity develops strength, look with favor upon the valuable service-giving activities of the Disabled American Veterans' organization. (William Green, president of American Federation of Labor.)

Labor's heart goes out to the disabled veterans, many of whom come from its own ranks, and we are eager to do everything we can to help these handicapped veterans and their dependents to secure the fair and generous treatment to which they are entitled. (Philip Murray, president, Congress of Industrial Organizations.)

It affords me real pleasure to heartily endorse the Disabled American Veterans * * * to assist individual deserving veterans in their local needs and in the technical prosecution of their equitable claims for compensation resulting from war-incurred disabilities. (James E. Van Zandt, past commander in chief Veterans of Foreign Wars.)

Helping disabled veterans to help themselves and getting the help of the Nation for those who need help, a big dividend-paying investment in real Americanism, is the self-appointed task of the Disabled American Veterans. (Representative ED. V. IZAC, of California.)

To see to it that worthy disabled veterans, of all of America's wars and their dependents, are enabled technically to establish their equitable claims for various types of benefits provided by existing legislation, the D. A. V. maintains the largest staff of nationally paid National service officers, one or more in nearly every regional office of the Veterans' Administration, of any veteran organization. (Hon. THOMAS E. MARTIN, of Iowa.)

The D. A. V. is striving to see to it that justice is extended to the Nation's disabled war defenders of the past, present, and future. (Hon. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER, of Indiana.)

Americans who help to provide security for America's disabled defenders thereby help to provide security for America. (Senator HOMER T. BONE.)

This comprehensive program of the D. A. V. is well integrated, looking to the welfare of our country, our communities, and our comrades. (Representative JAMES H. FAY, of New York.)

The D. A. V. is helping to protect and to promote the best interests of disabled veterans, and of the general public, by maintaining and further expanding its national service bureau in Washington, D. C., and its Nation-wide set-up of national service officers. To do the job properly, however, the D. A. V. needs to have at least three or four times as many full-time national service officers as it now has. (Representative WALTER G. ANDREWS, of New York.)

Letter From a Fighter Pilot

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, since this war began I have had the privilege of reading many beautiful and inspiring letters which men in the services have written home to their parents, but I have read none that surpassed in uplifting sentiment and patriotic fervor a letter that Capt. Tom Mutz, 24 years old, of the fighting marines, wrote to his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Mutz, of Indianapolis.

The letter was penned before Captain Mutz, a fighter pilot, departed for the far Pacific, where he was later wounded in action in the operations around Munda. With a piece of shrapnel still in his body he is now recuperating at Cherry Point, N. C., eagerly awaiting the time when he can return to active service.

Mr. Mutz, Sr., is president of the Peerless Foundry Co., of Indianapolis, and one of the prominent businessmen of our city. In my opinion, the letter Captain Mutz wrote to his parents is one of the classics of the war. Many citizens of our city have read it with admiration for the splendid qualities of mind and heart reflected by it. The letter is as follows:

DEAREST MOTHER AND DAD: Here is the letter that I both like to write and dislike to write. Tomorrow we are scheduled to board the ship which will take us wherever we may be going. I know how you must feel about my leaving the States. The following is the way I look and feel about it, and is the way you must look at it.

In my 22 years I have had everything a boy could want. I've had the love of the two parents and a wonderful sister, this love making a home which was everything a home should be. Then comes the love of two great grandparents, and four grandparents, followed by aunts, uncles, cousins, and more distant relations. All of these people combined to give me a name which I can be justly proud of. Through these people and through myself there comes a list of friends many of whom have gone further than that which friendship demands. I've grown up with the constant help and guidance of these people. I have gone to school and later, to college, with every advantage of heritage and surroundings. I've had everything which a boy needs to shape a life of usefulness. My eyes have seen much of this country of ours. So you see that up to this point, I've had a sheltered and easy life. If I do not come back there is nothing to be sorry about because I have had all of these things. I've done many of the things I've wanted to do. I've seen many of the things that I've wanted to see. And I've had a lifetime of fun already.

Now, here is the most important thing of all. Up to the present time I've given nothing for what I have taken. And now I am at the age when usefulness to our society and to the world at large is expected of me so that my life will be justified in the eyes of God and man. What better thing could a man ask for than a chance to fight for what he believes in, fight to give the coming generations and the generation not yet born a chance to live a life like my own has been; a chance to play, to go to school and learn about a world, not just one race and one creed; a chance to love and be loved; a chance to see that greatness of this world that God has given us, and a chance to add their names to the long line of names of great men and women who have made names for themselves in every line of endeavor? When I think of this my heart swells up and chokes me. Here, very early in life, I'm given an opportunity to serve, to make the living of my life not in vain. Some men live a lifetime and do not achieve this distinction. They cannot say they helped to make the world a better place to live. But this world conflict has given me an easy chance and a big opportunity.

This is the way I want you to look at it. You have given me everything that it is in your power to give me. Therefore do not be dismayed. And my last request of you, already put so ably in words by a typical United States serviceman, is: "Do not pray only that I shall return, but that I will have the power to do my duty."

Your ever-loving son,

TOM.

Resolutions Adopted at Meeting Held Under Auspices of New York Latvian Benevolent Society

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. J. MONKIEWICZ

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MONKIEWICZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions which were adopted by people of Latvian descent at a mass meeting held March 24, 1944, at New York City, under the auspices of the New York Latvian Benevolent Society:

Whereas the President of the United States on February 12, 1943, has stated: "It is one of our war aims, as expressed in the Atlantic Charter, that the conquered populations of today, the overrun countries, shall again become the masters of their destiny. There must be no doubt anywhere that it is the unalterable purpose of the United Nations to restore to conquered peoples their sacred rights. For the right of self-determination included in the Atlantic Charter does not carry with it the right of any government anywhere in the world to commit wholesale murder or the right to make slaves of its own people or any other people in the world"; and

Whereas as further stated by President Roosevelt, "And unless the peace that follows recognizes that the whole world is one neighborhood and does justice to the whole human race, the germs of another world war will remain as a constant threat to mankind"; and

Whereas the peoples of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia have been recognized de jure by all independent nations of the world; and

Whereas the Governments of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia have proved their abilities in administration of justice, in self-government, in establishing internal peace and material well-being on the principles of social justice and have carried out faithfully all obligations related to other nations; and

Whereas the peoples of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia have a deep respect for civil rights, for religious freedom, family life, cultural, political, and economic rights of all peoples; and

Whereas the people of the Baltic states are neither of Teutonic nor Slavic origin; and

Whereas the Governments of Germany and Soviet Union have disregarded and abrogated all treaties with Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia under changing disguises such as the "ethnic kinship of the population," "strategic frontiers," "security from attack," and other constantly varying shams; and

Whereas the Red Army, with its imported commissars from Moscow imposed by force farcial one-party elections in the Baltic states for setting up communistic governments made to order in Moscow; and

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union enslaved, murdered, and exiled many people of the Baltic states and Poland to Siberian prison camps; and

Whereas the brutal Nazi invaders have imposed puppet regimes of Nazi Quislings in the Baltic states, and have enslaved, murdered, and exiled many Latvian, Lithuanian, and Estonian people to Germany, and have cruelly persecuted loyal Latvian citizens of the Jewish faith; and

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union, aiming at the establishment of a European hegemony, has declared that Latvia is to be considered as one of the 16 Soviet states, thus disregarding the sovereign rights of the peoples of Latvia and willfully violating the principles of the Atlantic Charter; and

Whereas the Government of the United States, and freedom-loving nations of the entire world, have refused to recognize these transparent disguises of aggression and annexation as advocated by the Soviet Government; and

Whereas the Latvian nation and Latvians throughout the world remain unalterably opposed to all Soviet and German attempts to enslave them; and

Whereas the entire world knows that there are no civil rights or any autonomy for any individual or a nation under the totalitarian dictatorship of the Soviets: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we reaffirm our supreme confidence in the stated policies and leadership of the President, the Secretary of State, and the military and naval high commands of our country, and that we pledge our undivided support of the war effort and of the declared war-and-peace aims of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That we condemn the breaches of the principles of the Atlantic Charter perpetrated by the Government of the Soviet Union in regard to Latvia and other countries; and be is further

Resolved, That we appeal to our Government to exercise its offices with the Government of Soviet Russia, so that Russia abandon its ulterior designs against Latvia and other nations and return to the rule of justice and of law; that Russia liberate surviving Latvian, Lithuanian, Estonian and Polish hostages; that Russia dismiss illegal impostors from its service and abolish its puppet regimes held in store for Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia; ... that Russia live up to its promise of collaboration with the American and British democracies in establishing a just peace and international security; and be it further

Resolved, That we appeal to our Government to provide for the occupation of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia by naval and military forces of the United States and Great Britain; for the extension of joint United Nations relief and rehabilitation facilities to those countries, and for an unrestricted exercise by the peoples of the Baltic countries of their sacred right of choosing their form of government and of restoring their sovereign rights and self-government; and be it further

Resolved, That we appeal to the Executive Government and Members of Congress to reaffirm at this time the American determination to see the sovereignty and self-government of occupied countries, including the Baltic States, restored in the peace settlement and in the post-war international security system; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be mailed to the President, the Secretary of State, Members of Congress of the United States, and to the press.

JOHN LENOW, Chairman.
RICHARD HERMANSON,
Secretary.

Transportation Priorities for Furloughed Servicemen

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE HENDRICKS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to take just a brief moment to call to the attention of the Members of this House a situation which I feel is deplorable and of which I have been ashamed to some extent. I have introduced a bill authorizing and directing the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy to provide priorities on all types of transportation to members of their respective branches of the armed forces of the United States who are on furlough from overseas service—including service in Alaska—or on furlough from service in the United States.

It is from experience that I have come to the conclusion that such priorities should be provided for servicemen on furlough. I may say here that the two departments involved have established priorities in regard to commercial air transport. However, I must add also that the ordinary serviceman on furlough has the very lowest priority on this type of transportation.

There is no priority established for servicemen on furlough on other types of transportation such as railroad or bus lines. As an example of the reason why such priorities should be established, I want to point out that men in training in the United States are first alerted for overseas action and then they are given a furlough to visit their family for the last time before they embark and in many cases for the last time ever. But I have seen many of these servicemen whose destination is so far that travel by bus or day coach would be extremely uncomfortable and in many cases impossible. Owing to the fact that they never know when they will be alerted and when they are to receive a furlough it is impossible for them to make reservations in advance. Therefore a good deal of their time is taken in trying to get home and by the time they go home and return the trip has not meant very much because traveling has been so strenuous. Just recently a captain in the marines who had returned from active duty spent almost 3 days in Washington because he could get no reservation on the trains and his destination from Washington was a great distance; and each time he secured a reservation on a plane some higher priority took him off. These cases are more numerous than we think because it is only a few that we run into, many of these men doing the best they can without saying a word to anyone. Of course, the civilian who knows in advance when he proposes to take a trip, sometimes on business or sometimes for pleasure, has had ample opportunity to make his reservations far in advance.

This bill does not set forth the details of how the priorities should be worked out. It simply authorizes the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy to provide these priorities and they will have to work out the details.

It seems the very least that a civilian can do for these men who are fighting for us in the battle line is to give up his reservation when it is not absolutely necessary, that the men may have a few days in peace at home. May I request the assistance of every Member of this House who is interested in bringing about the passage of this bill.

Something More Than a Tree

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW L. SOMERS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, reports from the battle fronts are showing the world that something besides a tree grows in Brooklyn. Many of our boys in various services are distinguishing themselves, and at this time I would like to say a word about the Brooklyn boys who have been decorated for outstanding heroism serving in the Corps of Engineers.

The first news from the front on D-day describing the fighting in France stated that:

Men of the Corps of Engineers paved the way for the successful thrust. * * * Under fire of German 88's, the engineers cleared the way for the Infantry through the inundated areas, * * * enabling the Americans to reach high ground and push on.

In this war of movement—movement of mechanized equipment and vast tonnages of supplies over great distances—the Army Engineers clear the way. The principal engineer activities have to do with movement—with mobility—with keeping the Army moving up to and on the field of battle. They build and they fight.

Engineers remove from the path of the Army obstacles that destroy or limit its ability to move. They help other units across the beaches in invasion. Engineer units are included in every division and other big ground and air combat teams. They do whatever is necessary to remove or make a safe route through minefields, ditches, walls, barbed-wire entanglements, and other obstructions which the enemy puts in the way of our own troops.

Engineers drop out of airplanes, with demolition equipment tied to them. Troops like these made the interior of Sicily sound like the Fourth of July a few minutes before our landing boats hit the coast. This was repeated on a larger scale in France. Engineers blast our enemy underwater barriers to permit landing boats to hit the shore in invasion. They locate and remove other obstacles to enable the assault infantry to snake through. Putting ashore in the first waves, with bulldozers and other equipment, they lay wire mesh over the beach to permit the vehicles of war to move, and they knock down bunkers to permit their passage away from the beach. They build roads, bypass destroyed bridges, and build bridges to keep the Army moving.

Above everything else, Army Engineers are soldiers. They have a glorious tradition as fighters. When necessary they move into battle and fight shoulder to shoulder with the Infantry and other troops. In New Guinea, they drove a Jap counterattack back into the sea, and they stopped the Japs' last suicide mission on Attu. They are especially trained in the assault of fortified positions, the hardest of all man-made obstacles for armies to overcome. Clearing minefields is another specialty of the Engineers.

Ernie Pyle said:

Scores of times during the Sicilian fighting I heard the expression by everybody from generals to privates that "This is an engineer's war." And indeed it is. Every foot of our advance upon the gradually withdrawing enemy was tempoed by the speed with which our engineers could open the highways, clear the mines and by-pass the blown bridges.

In his book reporting his observations on a globe-girdling tour, Senator MEAD, of New York, said:

This Engineers' war is nothing less than history's greatest construction job.

The Airborne Engineer battalions are equipped with light-weight machines for transportation by air. When the First Air Command Force carried Allied troops over the Japanese lines in Northern Burma, Engineers came in with the gliders to build the airstrips which served the troop-carrying and supply planes. Col. Philip G. Cochran, commanding officer, said:

The Engineers had a terrific loyalty and devotion to duty. They could have griped a little, but they didn't. They were always ready to go. We felt like they were part of our unit. The aerial engineers built eight fields where cargo and troop-carrying planes could land and approximately 100 strips for the light liaison planes.

Months before the invasion of France engineers in a daring scientific Commando raid conducted a private invasion to collect samples of French soil to be tested in England in order to prepare the way for landing of heavy material. This was necessary because tanks and guns are heavy and because the sands of Normandy can be treacherous.

The Corps of Engineers has come a long way since it was founded June 16, 1775, when Congress authorized Gen. George Washington's appointment of Louis le Begue du Portail, of the French Army Engineers, as Chief Engineer of the Revolutionary Army. Today it can be found all over the world—doing practically every job required by war.

Engineers build and operate portable pipe-line units which largely have taken over the tremendous job of moving fuels to combat areas. They fight fires, supply water wherever the Army goes, build and repair ports through which move the vast and unending flow of supplies that must keep apace a moving army.

In the river and harbor business, in war and in peace, since 1824 the engineers know boats. They handle a wide assortment of floating equipment, including port repair ships, seagoing dredges, assault boats, and rubber pontons.

Engineers are the Army's mapmakers. They are in the camouflage business. They operate utilities, run sawmills, rehabilitate oil wells. They are the earth-movers for the Army—moving dirt faster than it has ever been moved before. They clear the way.

General MacArthur tells us:

Engineer troops finishing an airport at Milne Bay to defend Port Moresby and Australia abandoned their equipment, unslung their guns and drove a force of attacking Japs back into the sea. * * * These are the same gallant Engineers who are building advance airdromes under fire as our operations press the war to the heart of the Jap Empire.

Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower states:

Land mines have been used so extensively in north Africa and Sicily that they are practically a new weapon. The Engineers—those unsung heroes of our antimine units—are mastering this trickiest of instruments from the armament of modern warfare.

Gen. H. H. Arnold declares:

I commend the magnificent work that aviation Engineer troops are doing in combat theaters overseas, in providing field airdromes in a hurry for our rapidly growing Air Forces.

Lt. Gen. Carl Spaatz informs us:

The Engineers did a magnificent job in north Africa. They built airfields faster than we could use them.

While Air Forces Capt. Richard C. Roderick relates:

If it weren't for the swell work of the Army engineers, I doubt that Attu would ever have been taken. The Engineers, with bulldozers, tractors, and every type of mechanical equipment, repaired our fields as fast as the Japs could bomb us.

It was General Pershing who said:

The scientist said it couldn't be done, but the damn fool engineer didn't know that—so he just went ahead and did it.

The Corps of Engineers is a wrecker of dire prophecies and a master of situations not in the books.

First "it couldn't be done" job was the Panama Canal. Entering the scene of dashed hopes, the Corps of Engineers built the "big ditch" in record time.

When the Alaska Highway was proposed a chorus of discouragement went up, "What about snow, muskeg, year-around frozen earth, mud, forest?" Army engineers rolled up their sleeves. "It shall be done," they said—and it was; 1,700 miles of it, months ahead of schedule.

Give an Army engineer enough mud, preferably waist deep, and he will do the impossible every time. In 17 days under fire engineers built more miles of roads over the squashy muck of Attu than the Japs had built in 11 months.

It used to take weeks, months to build landing fields. Engineers fixed that. They developed steel landing mats. Landing in Sicily with invasion troops, Army engineers built a complete airfield in 24 hours.

In 12 days Army engineers partially dammed up the mouth of a creek on the edge of Adak Island in the Aleutians, 'dozed a heavy fill into the lagoon, covered it over with steel mat, and turned it over to the Air Forces.

Other engineer developments to speed the war—demountable hangars that can be transported by plane, knock-down landing boats that save 50 percent of transport space, portable pipe lines to supply fuel to distant places and conserve motor vehicles.

Scratch an engineer and you will find a first-class miracle worker lugging around a neat bag of "enginuities."

Here are a few of the Brooklyn men of the Corps of Engineers who were given Army awards. This list is not complete by any means.

AWARD OF LEGION OF MERIT

Howard J. Hamann, technical sergeant, Engineer Topographical Company: For exceptionally meritorious conduct in the performance of outstanding services at Bizerte, Tunisia, from May 17 to June 7, 1943. While his organization was preparing a hydrographic survey of the port and lake at Bizerte incident to the planning of embarkation operations from that area, Sergeant Hamann, in charge of the project's field office, displayed qualities of resourcefulness and technical ability far above those expected from one of his rank. Assuming complete responsibility for the manifold details of field and office procedure, he performed the administrative phases and much of the actual technical work with a proficiency which enabled maintenance of a seemingly impossible rate of progress, and successful completion of this urgent mission well in advance of the schedule.

SILVER STAR MEDAL

George Biggert, private, first class: For gallantry in action at New Georgia, Solomon Islands, while courageously advancing under fire toward an enemy ambush, to safely evacuate a wounded comrade on July 27, 1943.

William H. Welch, private, first class: For gallantry in action near Tambu Bay, New Guinea, on July 20, 1943.

SOLDIER'S MEDAL

Edward Touhey, sergeant: For heroism displayed in Alaska Department on October 30, 1943. On this date, while engaged in dock construction, one of the members of the crew fell from the dock structure into rough sea below. Reacting instantly to the emergency, the two enlisted men named below [one of whom was Sergeant Touhey] leaped through a maze of temporary scaffolding and braces into the nearly freezing water and reached the unconscious soldier in time to prevent his drowning. The prompt action of these enlisted men in effecting the rescue with utter disregard for their personal safety reflects great credit on themselves and the military service.

Vito Saccente, private: Following an air raid, these men [one of whom was Private Saccente] discovered that an air-raid shelter, full of civilians, had received a direct bomb hit. The shelter was full of carbon monoxide gas from the explosion, but without thought of their own safety and at great personal risk, these men at once began rescue work and succeeded in bringing out 11 dead and 21 injured before they themselves became gas casualties and were removed to the hospital. The prompt and heroic action of these men reflects the highest credit to themselves and the military service.

Frank D. Calabro, private (first class): For heroism at Bougainville, Solomon Islands, on February 18, 1944, when he extinguished the flames of burning gasoline on the person of a soldier. By his presence of mind and unhesitating action, Private Calabro saved the life of his comrade at the risk of being seriously burned himself.

Salvatore DiScalfani, technician (fifth grade): For heroism at Ile Rousse, Corsica, on December 22, 1943. Several members of a boat crew were washed overboard by high waves. Technician DiScalfani was passing along the beach when he heard the one remaining member of the boat crew calling to him to help one of the men in the water who was in grave danger of drowning. Without regard to his personal safety Technician DiScalfani plunged into the sea fully clothed and went to the assistance of his fellow soldier who lost consciousness just as help reached him. Battered by the rough sea and weighed down by the limp body of the soldier, he fought his way to shore.

Peter J. Giambalvo, technician (fifth grade): For heroism at Monterey Bay, Calif., on June 23, 1943.

BRONZE STAR MEDAL

Charles M. Boye, technician (fifth grade): For heroic action in combat on January 6 and 7, 1944, during the battle for Mount Porchia, Italy.

PURPLE HEARTS

Alexander M. Fiedor, private (first class); Herbert I. Cohen, private (first class); Walter N. Syvertson, private (first class); Vincent J. Conselva, corporal; Louis G. Gonzales, corporal; William T. Lonngren, private; Abraham Hochstein, private (first class); Salvatore J. Laurice, private (first class); John A. MacIntosh, corporal; Samuel Sontag, private; Paul Bodner, technician (fifth grade); David J. Matthews, private; James Wells, private; John J. Urban, private (first class); Louis W. Donowski, corporal.

The Farmers of Puerto Rico Urge the Immediate Removal of Governor Tugwell

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BOLÍVAR PAGÁN

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. PAGÁN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House, I present for insertion in the RECORD a copy of a resolution recently adopted by the Farmers' Association of Puerto Rico urging the immediate removal of Governor Tugwell. Also I include another resolution of the Farmers' Association of Puerto Rico protesting against the disapproval by Governor Tugwell of bills approved by the Legislature of Puerto Rico to foster the coffee agricultural industry. Also I desire to include a resolution adopted by the same association demanding of Congress the solution of the political status of Puerto Rico:

Resolution to demand the immediate removal of the Governor of Puerto Rico, Rexford G. Tugwell

Whereas the Governor, the Honorable Rexford Guy Tugwell, since he took charge of the Governorship of Puerto Rico, has not shown himself to be interested in the improvement of the sources of agricultural wealth of this country; and

Whereas the said official, Rexford G. Tugwell, has vetoed several bills tending to rehabilitate the coffee industry without giving any cause or reason which might have compelled him to take such a decision; and

Whereas we farmers of Puerto Rico are firmly convinced by the actions of this Governor that it is not his intention to help protect the development of our agricultural wealth; and

Whereas the farmers of Puerto Rico have the right to feel justly alarmed at this attitude of their Governor, which may lead to the misery and destruction of our economic life: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by this meeting of farmers, assembled in San Juan, P. R., this 21st day of May 1944:

1. To request, as we do hereby request, from the Honorable President Roosevelt the removal from office of Gov. Rexford G. Tugwell, Governor of Puerto Rico, inasmuch as if this gentleman continues in the governorship of this country, the longer he holds said office of Governor the more possibilities there will be for agriculture, our chief source of wealth, to suffer a collapse as a consequence of the actions of this Governor.

2. That copies of this resolution be sent to President Roosevelt, to the President of the National Senate, to the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to the chairmen of the congressional committees.

Resolution to protest against the disapproval by the Governor of the coffee bills passed by the legislature

Whereas the Legislature of Puerto Rico passed house bills 321 and 696 and senate bill 315, which, had they become laws, would have marked the beginning of a plan to cooperate in the rehabilitation of the coffee wealth of our island; and

Whereas it is generally known that the only forests that we have in Puerto Rico are our coffee plantations, which are necessary for agriculture in general and for the industrialization, electric power, and irrigation program, due to their retention of moisture in the soil; and

Whereas it is also generally known that most of the inhabitants of the disgraceful slums of our principal cities are made up of emigrant laborers from the coffee districts; and

Whereas the Chief Executive of Puerto Rico, unheeding the mandate of the people, as expressed by their legislature, pocket-vetoed the said bills without even deigning to offer excuses or reasons which, in his judgment, had prevented his signing such bills: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by this meeting of farmers, assembled in San Juan, P. R., this 21st day of May 1944:

1. To protest, as we do hereby protest, at the inexplicable and most reprehensible attitude of the Governor of Puerto Rico, the Honorable Rexford G. Tugwell, in vetoing house bills 321 and 696 and senate bills 315, remaining deaf to the mandate of the people as unanimously expressed by their legislators, and thus leaving more than 20,000 coffee growers in a state of uncertainty which will hasten their total ruin.

2. To condemn, as we do hereby condemn, the indifference, the neglect, and the forgetfulness which our chief executive and his counselors maintain toward our coffee agriculture, without weighing the responsibility that they undertake by this procedure, and the serious damage that they are causing to our agricultural wealth, which represents the means of livelihood of more than one-fourth of our total population, and which guarantees the conservation of our forests and, with them, the water currents whose conservation our country so badly needs.

3. That copies of this resolution be sent to the Chief Executive, to the members of his Cabinet, to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the chairmen of the Chavez and Bell committees of the Congress of the United States.

Resolution to ratify resolutions of previous meetings demanding the solution of the political status of Puerto Rico

Whereas the Puerto Rico Farmers Association has for many years been demanding, by its sovereign meetings and lengthy resolutions, from the authorities and from the Congress of the United States, the solution of the political status of Puerto Rico, considering that the present system of colonial government from which we are suffering creates uncertainty and prevents our energies from being directed along firm paths in the financial development of our country; and

Whereas despite these demands of the Puerto Rico Farmers Association and other similar petitions made by other financial, political, and social entities of Puerto Rico, it has not yet been possible to have the Congress of the United States define once and for all what our future is going to be with regard to our final political status; and

Whereas this situation prolongs the uncertainty under which we have been struggling for many years, stagnates individual activities, and every day complicates more our financial situation to such an extent that the present situation, which threatens to throw us into chaos along all lines, has already become unbearable; and

Whereas should the intention of Congress with regard to our political future, which is so intimately related to the social and economic future of this country, be clarified, our activities along all lines could be directed with a more certain orientation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by this meeting of the Puerto Rico Farmers Association, assembled this 21st day of May 1944, in San Juan, P. R.:

1. To ratify, as we do hereby ratify, the resolutions of sovereign meetings previously held, demanding from the Congress of the United States the final solution of our present political status by abolishing the colonial system—from all points unfair—and to again demand, as we hereby demand, from the Congress, the authorities, and the people of the United States, that they define their intention with regard to our political future, radically abolishing the present colonial type of government from which we are suffering, and granting us the rights to which we are entitled as citizens of the United States.

2. That copies of this resolution be sent to the Presiding Officers of the National Congress, to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the press.

Faith in the West

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to include the following release from the Bureau of Reclamation at Coulee Dam, State of Washington.

Nothing can destroy faith in the West—the faith of peoples in all parts of the country—so much as incidents like the sale of land by unscrupulous persons.

The release follows:

Advised that an aged couple recently had been induced to purchase land in the Columbia Basin reclamation project in eastern Washington on false pretenses, Frank A. Banks, regional director of reclamation, at Coulee Dam, Wash., today warned local people to obtain all the facts about the proposed development before buying.

"Anyone approached to purchase land in the project, to be irrigated by the Grand Coulee Dam, should write to the Bureau at Coulee Dam, Wash., to learn whether the land is actually in the project area, whether it has been classified as land that will be irrigated, and what the Government considers its true worth to be," Mr. Banks said. "There is no charge for this information."

The persons who were bilked by an unscrupulous land salesman—their names were not made known—reported they were told the land they purchased would be irrigated immediately after the war, when, as a matter of fact, it may be a long time before water can be made available for it.

Mr. Banks said that while reports of misrepresentation in the sale of Basin lands are few, the Bureau of Reclamation is anxious to nip speculation attempts in the bud.

"The Columbia Basin project will become one of the finest irrigated areas in the Nation, but it will probably be many years before it is fully developed," Mr. Banks stated. "In March 1943 Congress passed the Columbia Basin Project Act, and anyone contemplating the purchase of land should be thoroughly familiar with it. Our new pamphlet, Settlement of the Columbia Basin Reclamation Project, available free, explains the law in understandable language."

Mr. Banks emphasized that there is no good reason to hurry in the purchase of Columbia Basin land for irrigation purposes. Even though Grand Coulee Dam has been completed, a large pumping plant, reservoir dams, and an elaborate canal system must yet be built. It will probably be several years after the war before water will be available for any of the land, and some of it may not be irrigated for 20 to 25 years.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PETE JARMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, on last Armistice Day I was deeply impressed by the song, Hymn to a Hero, on Fred Waring's radio program. At its conclusion I learned that its author was a comrade of mine of World War No. 1, Joseph S. Lovett, of Brewton, Ala. He had written the hymn in memory of his hero son, Lt. Joseph S. Lovett, Jr., a pursuit pilot who was killed in action at Port Moresby, New Guinea, on May 4, 1942. Several days thereafter I wrote Comrade Lovett to express sympathy in his bereavement and congratulate him on this excellent hymn. In replying at about Christmas time he mailed me an equally excellent poem addressed to his son, It's Always Christmas Up There.

Sad though they be I have derived so much pleasure from reading them that I wish my colleagues and other readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to also enjoy doing so. Hence I include them both in these remarks:

HYMN TO A HERO

Tonight beside the Coral Sea,
Where crosses stand so silently,
A boy is sleeping.
No more to fly, in rain and sun,
Through hail of death from bomb and gun;
His day is o'er—his work is done.
We are not weeping.

For through the days of war and strife,
Of these, for which he gave his life,
A boy was dreaming.
Was dreaming of God—to worship as we may,
Of home—where children sing and play,
And love—that makes our life each day
So bright and gleaming.

And now, beside the Crystal Sea,
Where peace shall reign eternally,
A boy is waking.
No more to fight, in rain and sun;
His night is o'er—his day begun.
And soon that road which he has won,
We will be taking.

—Joseph S. Lovett.

IT'S ALWAYS CHRISTMAS UP THERE

With songs of peace, good will to men,
Our hearts this day are filled.
We think of you up there, and then
Our fears for you are stilled.

We like to think of you, up there
With all that gallant band
Of heroes at the home base, where
The Lord is in command.

Where serving Him is full of joy,
And you can be the host
To show His wonders, to each boy
Arriving at the post.

Up there—'Tis not so far away—
As you have made us know;
For often, when we try to pray,
You're with us here below.

You're with us now, and through your eyes
A glimpse to us is given
Of peace, good will, that never dies
At home up there—in heaven.

We should be glad that you're not here,
Where we can see the gleam
Of Christmas light but once a year,
And heaven's just a dream.

—Joseph S. Lovett.

Labor's Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS E. SCANLON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SCANLON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the following editorial which appeared in the overseas edition of the Stars and Stripes calling attention to the excellent record of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, C. I. O. This editorial indicates that our armed services are not being fooled by the attempts on the part of the newspapers to create division between our soldiers and sailors and the war workers who are beating all production records to supply the men at the front with the weapons of war, but our men and women in the service are proud of the tireless efforts of union labor to prevent any interference with war production:

LABOR'S RECORD

Bad news travels fast. Labor strikes and lock-outs are no exception, for in time of war such news is sometimes sensational.

The loyalty of American labor, on the other hand, seldom makes the headlines, for in time of war such loyalty is expected and often taken for granted regardless of circumstances; but in fairness we would like to give you a report from the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America.

Recently this union issued a report to its members in the armed forces. Those on the job at home felt that those in the service should be told what they were doing to increase production and strengthen and stabilize the entire home front in their effort to back up the Commander in Chief in policies that would lead to the speediest victory and the establishment of a lasting peace.

Topping their long list of achievements was a record of no strikes since Pearl Harbor, for the electrical workers had given their solemn pledge to produce the war goods you would need without interruption, and they have kept their pledge. And while you G. I.'s may all be proud of your record in training and battle, the men you left behind on the production line are equally proud of the recent tribute paid them by the Under Secretary of War, Robert P. Patterson, who said: "As we turn toward the tougher struggle ahead, it is gratifying to note the excellent record made by your union in observance of its no-strike pledge. With that kind of backing our soldiers will move into the decisive phase of the war with an overwhelming superiority of fire power and equipment over the armies of Hitler and Hirohito."

The record of America's electrical workers has been supported by the vast majority of all labor in America. Strikes have been the exception, not the rule, and working men and women at home have broken every production record in their all-out effort to provide weapons of war on time to fill every need.

We are proud that we have been asked to pass this report on to you by those serving loyally on the home front.

U. A. W.-C. I. O. Reconversion Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement adopted by U. A. W. war-policy division and released by President R. J. Thomas, June 21, 1944:

U. A. W.-C. I. O. RECONVERSION PROGRAM

I. THE NEED FOR ACTION

Everybody is talking about full employment. We propose to do something about it. The way things are going at present we are rapidly getting away from it.

The peak of war production is passed. Unless our armies experience reverses on a scale which none of us expect, the output of war equipment will decline from now on.

Employment in munitions industries has already dropped by 800,000 since the peak last fall. It is expected to drop by another million by the end of this year. The airplane industry alone, including subcontractors and suppliers, will drop off by at least 300,000, shipbuilding by some 200,000, steel and aluminum by perhaps 150,000, etc. In 1945, as everyone knows, the reduction in employment will accelerate even faster. Only large-scale military reverses can change the trend.

And from now on, with inductions into the armed services on the decline, reductions in war employment will be translated into unemployment or, in the case of some women, into withdrawal from the labor force completely. In either case we shall be moving away from our goal of full production and full employment. Preparations must be made now for prompt resumption of nonmilitary production.

II. BASIC ASSUMPTIONS OF THE U. A. W. PROGRAM

1. Winning the war is our most immediate task. There is nothing inconsistent between continued emphasis upon the overriding necessities of the war program and the need for the development of a reconversion plan. Uncertainties about the future are hindering war production. Workers, concerned about their future employment, are shifting out of war industries into what look like more permanent jobs. The development of a reconversion and post-war plan is a war necessity.

2. To achieve full production and full employment, it is necessary to plan ahead for the difficult period of shifting from war production to civilian production. I don't like the term "reconversion." It implies a return to an earlier situation. But a return to prewar production levels would mean unemployment amounting to fifteen to nineteen million. The type of planning that I think is necessary is not planning for reconversion but planning for full utilization of our material and human resources.

Such planning requires centralization of basic economic controls in a single governmental agency. There is no such agency now. The Kilgore bill and the George-Murray bill, both under consideration in the Senate, would establish such a central office for both war mobilization and for the handling of reconversion and post-war problems.

Such planning requires also a central planning agency. Congress tossed out the National Resources Planning Board; it is necessary to have in its place something similar. The Bureau of Programs called for by the Kilgore bill is such an agency.

3. Control over the reconversion process must be in the hands of a civilian agency. In connection with cut-backs, the armed services should, of course, have the final say as to their extent and timing, but the W. P. B.—presumably the Production Executive Committee—should determine which plants are to be cut back and in what localities.

4. Cooperation among labor, industry, and Government is essential to an orderly handling of the problems involved in reconversion and the post-war period. Labor should have representation on the Production Executive Committee of the W. P. B. In addition, the C. I. O. is on record as favoring joint industry-labor committees to advise on reconversion problems. The present W. P. B. set-up of separate industry committees and labor committees is not satisfactory. In addition, there should be regional joint committees. The Kilgore bill provides for joint industry and regional committees.

5. We do not question the central role of free—really free—private enterprise.

This does not mean, however, that industry should have the freedom to restrict output. What has made American industry great has been the initiative displayed in developing new products and improved methods, with resulting large national output. Tendencies toward restriction of output are contrary to the essence of the American tradition.

There are several corollaries to this point:

(a) We favor vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent any restraints upon production whether resulting from cartels, monopoly agreements, or patent licenses which exclude or suppress competition and new production.

(b) The interests of small business must be protected. Small business should have access to surplus war materials, tools, and facilities, and should receive Government credits when necessary.

(c) It will be necessary to retain Government controls over prices and to continue necessary rationing restrictions.

III. SPECIFIC STEPS

1. After notification by the armed services of impending cut-backs in war production, the Production Executive Committee should notify management and labor at the earliest possible moment—preferably 90 days in advance—of the precise location of the cut-backs.

2. Work on scheduling the resumption of nonmilitary production for both domestic and foreign markets should begin at once in order that actual production may begin by not later than January 1945 on a scale adequate to reabsorb the workers displaced by curtailment of war programs.

Within the framework of an adequately planned program consideration should be given in the termination of war contracts to privately owned plants and to plants in loose labor market areas—thus expediting the resumption of civilian production with a minimum of dislocation.

Wherever it will not interfere with the war effort the War Production Board should authorize under appropriate controls the manufacture of machine tools necessary for the resumption of civilian production and should permit the employment of tool and dye makers and designing engineers—many of whom in the Detroit area are now, to all intents and purposes, idle—in planning civilian products.

3. Special emphasis must be put upon the development of a sound export program to facilitate the reconstruction and rehabilitation of war-torn areas and the industrialization of relatively undeveloped countries. Full production and full employment in this country after the war depends in large measure upon the successful development of a large export program. Such a program will be expedited by the development of trade agreements with other countries.

4. Even with adequate planning there must be provision for tiding workers over during the reconversion process. Both dismissal wages and an improved system of unemployment compensation are necessary. Any change in the unemployment compensation set-up to be satisfactory must recognize the national character of the unemployment problem. The extension of Federal control is essential. In this respect the Kilgore bill provides the most satisfactory solution. Dismissal wages are not an alternative to unemployment compensation but are better obtained by collective bargaining than by legislation.

5. It is necessary to develop a full-scale program of public works and housing to supplement if necessary private industrial activity. It is difficult to see how an adequate program can be worked out without the creation of a Government planning agency of the sort recommended in this program.

IV. LEGISLATIVE ACTION

We recommend the immediate passage by the Senate of legislation which embodies the principles expressed in the Kilgore bill, S. 1893. This bill, as I have indicated, would provide for a coordinated governmental set-up for handling both continued war production and the change-over to nonmilitary production; it would provide for a central planning agency; it provides for labor participation throughout at all levels; it offers an improved unemployment compensation system to help workers during the change-over period and to establish a floor to purchase power.

We are urging upon Senator MURRAY and Senator GEORGE the desirability of their agreement with Senator KILGORE upon a bill which will have acceptability. The Kilgore bill is already sponsored by eight members of the Senate Military Affairs Committee and by several others, including Senator PEPPER, who is a member of the Post-war Committee. I should like to call attention to the fact that the George committee in its most recent report (dated June 12, 1944), after discussing the various problems involved in reconversion, concludes with the following statement:

"Congressional attention to these matters cannot wait. Prompt action on them is of transcendent importance, and this committee feels most strongly that no extended congressional recess should be considered pending their disposition. The very destiny of the Nation may depend upon wise and prompt decisions in respect to them."

Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, an active member of Senator GEORGE's committee, has stated publicly that he favors along these lines "before any consideration is given to a summer Senate recess." (Letter to Governor Kelly, May 12, 1944.)

I am in complete accord with this expression of urgency on the part of the George committee and am hopeful that the members of this committee will be active in furthering legislation of the type which now finds its best expression in Senator KILGORE's bill.

Three Years Later

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., issue of June 22, 1944:

THREE YEARS LATER

At dawn on this day 3 years ago, heady with the wine of his immense victories in the west and dreaming a wildly vaulting dream of world conquest, Adolf Hitler turned suddenly to the east and let loose the lightning upon his whilom ally.

Though months earlier they had been warned by American officials that such an attack was coming, the stunned Russians were sent reeling back by its first awful impact. On to Leningrad. On to Kiev. On to Kharkov. On to Taganrog. On to Smolensk. Violence and more violence. Death and more death. Victory and more victory. There seemed to be nothing that could stop the mighty, the precise, the all-powerful Wehrmacht.

By summer's end in that fateful year, one could count on the fingers of one hand the number of British and American military experts who did not believe that Russia would be forced into an ignominous surrender within the next 60 or 90 days. Indeed, less than 4 months after he had opened his assault, Hitler himself exultantly proclaimed that "this enemy is already broken and will never rise again." Who does not remember those days? Who does not remember how in December, after Japan had struck at Pearl Harbor, the potential prospect for America was one of being eventually encircled by enemies holding sway in both the great oceans washing our shores—enemies in a position to use all of the British Isles, all of the continent of Europe, all of the Eastern Hemisphere against us?

The prospect, however, never materialized, for with unforgettable heroism and sacrifice, pouring out rivers of their best blood in defense of the land they loved, the Russian people somehow managed to hold on. But that was not the end of it: When the first agonizing winter was over, the Nazis struck again, this time in a fashion more deadly than ever—down into the Crimea, deep into the Caucasus, clear to Stalingrad astride the Volga. Now came the Red Army's blackest hour.

But now, too, came the turning of the tide, starting in September 1942. The Russians hit back at Stalingrad; Montgomery smashed Rommel at El Alamein; British and American armies invaded north Africa; and all the while our allied air power in Britain was striking with ever-mounting violence at the heart of the Reich.

The rest of the story is too fresh to need reviewing. A glance at the map is enough to remind us of all that has happened since Hitler reached the floodtide of his conquests at Stalingrad. Today, with a new front expanding ominously against him in France and with other fronts in the making, everything is in such swift ebb for this man—this man who planned never to fight anything but a one-front war—that no matter where he casts his eyes, whether up or down or around him, he can see nothing but catastrophe bearing relentlessly down on him.

As for the German people, on this third anniversary of the invasion of Russia, they must begin to realize that Hitler has led them at long last to the edge of a fearsome abyss and that millions of their youth have died for nothing better than his warped ambition which, in its wreckage, adds up to one of the most wicked and appalling futilities in the history of the world. This day, then, while a fit time for mutual Russian and allied congratulations, is for the Reich a time for the deepest kind of contrition and remorse. Never, certainly, was it better or more grimly demonstrated that they shall perish by the sword who live by it.

Recognition of Yugoslav Government of Liberation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY M. JACKSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, the valiant people of the Balkans have been suffering under the domination of the Hitlerite Fascist's boot since the Nazis came to power in Germany. From the very first day when the Nazis came to power, they have been pouring agents through the Balkans intent upon dividing and conquering the little brave people of these small countries and converting them to slavery under the "master race." Of all the peoples of the Balkans, one group more than any other has resisted from the very first the Hitler intimidation. It has fought back inch for inch, foot for foot, and yard for yard against the terror and torture of the Nazis. That group is the free people of Yugoslavia.

Mr. Speaker, Yugoslavia, like so many other countries, has had its "quislings."

There have been many in Yugoslavia who are not averse to kneeling and groveling before the Fascists; boot lickers for a pound of silver for the blood of their neighbor's veins. There are some, Mr. Speaker, who first saw fit to fight and later on, wearying of the struggle, weak at heart and weak of mind, sold out to the would-be conquerors. But the very weakness of its leaders seemed only to add strength to the people's movement for the liberation of Yugoslavia, and out of the chaos which rose from Hitler's invasion of the Balkans in 1941 has come one man and one group which has never swerved from its determination to carry on the good fight against our common enemy. That is the partisan movement of Marshal Tito, the dynamic, brave, fiery leader of the free peoples fighting fascism in the mountains, the cities, the villages, and the fields of Yugoslavia today.

At this very moment, side by side with our own boys, uncounted numbers of whom have parachuted into partisan territory to take up the fight, and side by side with our heroic British allies, Marshal Tito's forces continue to plague the Nazis at every point.

Who are the people who fight with Tito? The people who fight with Marshal Tito are the free people of Yugoslavia. The National Liberation Army banded together under Tito is composed of Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Montenegrins, and Macedonians. It is composed of members of the Christian Socialist Party, the Social Democratic Party, the Communist Party, the labor unions, and the Slovenian Catholic Party. In its ranks are Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in proportion to the relative strength of each of these groups throughout all Yugoslavia. Its members know no party, know no race, know no separate creed, but only the common struggle against the common enemy.

While the traitors of the King Peter government have been busy carrying on continued collaboration with the enemy, Marshal Tito and his National Liberation Army have never ceased to fight and fight hard; yet our Government still permits agents of the proven traitor, Mihailovich, to use funds of the King Peter government to propagandize against this great hero, Tito, in the United States.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, there are still those in our State Department who try desperately to rescue the discredited Mihailovich clique from the oblivion into which it has so correctly sunk.

We must demand, Mr. Speaker, that the funds of the Yugoslav Government in the United States be transferred at once to the representatives of Marshal Tito and the national army of liberation which so valiantly fights our common enemy.

While our own fighting sons, brothers, and loved ones are dying on the beaches and the hills of France at the hands of the Nazis, we are making a mockery of the crosses which lie over their heads by permitting the continuance of the anti-Tito propaganda machine which has trafficked so viciously with the enemy under our very nose.

In my own State of Washington, reside many thousand Yugoslav Americans. They are a splendid, hard working, patriotic people—the finest type of American citizens. Those Yugoslav Americans are unanimous in their support and faith in the government of liberation in Yugoslavia. They are united in calling upon our Government to freeze the funds held in this country by the royal government in exile. They demand that these funds be diverted to the use of its partisan armies under Josip Broz and to the restoration of their country after the war.

Mr. Speaker, let me point out further that the Senate in the State of Washington has unanimously passed a resolution urging recognition by our Government of the liberation government of Yugoslavia, and the freezing of the funds now held by the royal government in exile.

Mr. Speaker, I submit we should join our efforts with the Yugoslav Americans of our country in bringing about full recognition to the liberation government of Yugoslavia.

Importation of Food Grains Duty-Free

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to express my views on H. R. 4788, a bill extending for 180 days the period during which certain grains and other products may be imported from foreign countries free of duty. At the conclusion of my own remarks I am placing in the RECORD two letters written by Marvin Jones, Administrator of the War Food Administration, one addressed to Hon. R. L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and the other to Hon. HIRAM JOHNSON, Senator from California, both under date of June 20, 1944.

On December 8, 1943, the House passed House Joint Resolution 171, which permitted the importation of certain grain free of duty for a period of 90 days. Later this was extended for another 90-day period by H. R. 4410. The pending legislation would extend the time for another 180-day period. At the time this legislation was before the House I stated that the approval of this legislation would not be of assistance to the livestock, dairy, and poultry producers of the Nation. Six months' trial has demonstrated that my statement was correct. Enactment of H. R. 4788 would not only extend the legislation previously approved, but greatly expand it. Therefore, I am opposed to its enactment. There can be no argument over the fact that there is a great need for feedstuffs for livestock and poultry producers, but enactment of this legislation would not solve the problem. The Commodity Credit Corporation is actively purchasing and importing large quantities of grains and feed. They have sufficient funds and an effective organization to make these purchases. The tariff is no factor. The importations are limited only by the quantity of grain available and transportation. Six months operation of H. R. 171 have proved these facts. Our livestock and poultry producers have not received additional grain and feed, but under present legislation our Government has been forced to pay millions of dollars to foreign countries who increased the price of these imported feeds the full amount of the tariff. For instance, on the importation of flax the Canadian Wheat Board increased its selling price by 30 cents a bushel and the Mexican producers increased their selling price the full 32½ cents per bushel. There is absolutely no justification for taking money out of the Federal Treasury to pay increased prices to foreign farmers when it does not bring in additional grains.

It seems to me that the taxpayers of our Nation are entitled to some consideration and therefore I must oppose this legislation.

The letters referred to follow:

WAR FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, June 20, 1944.

Hon. R. L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: Reference is made to your letter of June 9, transmitting two copies of H. R. 4788, a bill extending for 180 days the period during which certain grains and other products may be imported from foreign countries free of duty, and requesting our comments and recommendations in connection with this proposed legislation.

In examining this bill we note certain major points of difference as compared with House Joint Resolution 171, which was approved December 22, 1943, and H. R. 4410, which was approved March 29, 1944, the latter extending the duty-free period to June 20, 1944. Among such difference the following may be mentioned:

1. The proposed duty-free period which would extend through December 17, 1944, is twice as long as in either of the other bills which were approved.

2. The list of duty-free products is extended to include many items of relatively minor importance as feed.

3. The use provision for feed "for livestock and poultry" is dropped except with respect to wheat. This is particularly important in the case of rye, barley, and oats which have other uses than for feed. Oats for food use was included as a Senate amendment to H. R. 4410 before it was adopted.

4. The wheat import quota is removed.

Of these changes by far the most important is the removal of the import quota. It is the opinion of this Administration that it would be unwise to take this action, particularly in view of the prospective record 1944 United States wheat crop. It should be noted that the present regulations governing the import quota on wheat exempts imports by the War Food Administration and thus makes it possible to import wheat in such quantities as may be needed in particular feed deficit areas. The removal of the quota would permit indiscriminate wheat importation.

We also believe it would be unwise, in case the duty-free entry period is extended, to specify a period longer than the 90 days included in previous legislation, in view of prospective uncertain marketing conditions confronting United States producers of the commodities specified in H. R. 4788.

With respect to the actual experience under duty-free legislation on certain grains and feed products, which has now been in effect for nearly 6 months, the following observations may be of interest to your committee. The War Food Administration realized at the outset that the legislation might not fully accomplish the desired objectives, but in order that everything possible might be done to help the feed situation, the enactment of the original bill for a 90-day period was favored. In March, when H. R. 4410 was under consideration, War Food Administration officials testified before the Senate Fiance Committee regarding the effects of Public Law 211. It was pointed out at that time that the results of the legislation had not been fully effective from the standpoint of increased supplies and reduced prices to farmers in the United States.

Transportation and the availability of foreign supplies have been the principal factors limiting feed imports. The foreign selling price has been correspondingly increased in some cases, notably for barley, oats, and flaxseed from Canada, and on flaxseed and oilcake and meal from Mexico. With particular reference to flaxseed, there is attached a copy of a letter recently sent to Senator JOHNSON of California. This letter points out that the duty-free importation on the specified commodities has, in some instances, represented the transfer of moneys from the United States Treasury to foreign countries instead of reducing costs to users of feed in the United States.

For the reasons given above, we are not in favor of the enactment of H. R. 4788.

We have been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

Sincerely,

MARVIN JONES,
Administrator.

JUNE 20, 1944.

Hon. HIRAM JOHNSON,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: This is in reply to your letter of May 25 with which you enclosed a letter from the Pacific Vegetable Oil Corporation regarding flaxseed.

The statements contained in this letter are substantially correct. Public Law 272, Seventy-eighth Congress, provides for the duty-free importation of flaxseed and several other commodities, with the announced intent of increasing the supplies of feed available to American producers from foreign sources. Officials of the Commodity Credit Corporation representing this administration were asked to testify before the Senate Finance Committee at the time this bill was under consideration.

They testified at that time that the removal of the duty on flaxseed would neither increase the quantities of oilseed meal available nor make such meal available at reduced prices. The demand for flaxseed in this country was such that with or without the duty every available bushel was being imported for which shipping space could be found. It was, therefore, pointed out that the net result of the cancelation of the duty would be a proportionate increase in the selling price of flaxseed asked by foreign producers. As a matter of fact this is exactly what has happened. The Canadian Wheat Board increased its selling price on flaxseed by 30 cents per bushel, and Mexican producers increased their selling price by the full 32½ cents per bushel. (The cancelation did not affect the Argentine market as purchase program).

Public Law 272, Seventy-eighth Congress, expires on June 20 and the Department has been requested by the House Ways and Means Committee for a report on H. R. 4788, to extend for an additional 180 days the period during which certain grains and other products may be imported from foreign countries free of duty. Enclosed is a copy of our adverse report which is being forwarded to you for your information.

Sincerely,

MARVIN JONES,
Administrator.

A Union Educates for Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article from the Milwaukee Journal:

A UNION EDUCATES FOR DEMOCRACY

The United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, C. I. O., has published for its members a Guide to Political Action, which is one of the most intelligent bits of political education that has come to our attention.

This 160-page booklet, simply written, stresses the need in a democracy for participation in politics. It tell union voters that political activity is not necessarily dirty activity; that when it is, the voter must get in and clean it up—not just run away.

"Politics is the science of making democracy work," says the guidebook. "The days of a labor boss promising to deliver labor's vote are over. Nobody delivers labor's vote. Labor does not seek to control the Government or influence governmental action out of proportion to labor's own democratic strength. The cause of labor and the Nation is identical."

Typical of much of the sound context of the booklet is this paragraph:

"Organized labor must find the closest possible working relationships with all business interests who are today working wholeheartedly for the winning of the war. Labor must join hands with all sections of patriotic industry and business, large as well as small, regardless of past differences, if it means adding strength to the move for victory during and after the war."

That is pretty good counsel. So is the admonition to union members that they must work for a better deal for Negroes in the field of labor, and must combat anti-Semitism and other types of racial prejudice.

The only partisan touch is contained in a few paragraph favoring reelection of President Roosevelt. This is not out of place in the booklet since this C. I. O. union has officially endorsed the President. Otherwise, the Guide to Political Action is broadly educational in the working of democracy. It explains the election laws of every State; maps the congressional districts; lists the Congressmen, the congressional committees, and the membership of various governmental agencies.

American Government would be better if voters as a whole were given the same kind of political education that this union attempts for its members.

Freedom for the Man on a Furlough

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following article which appeared recently in the Atlantic City Press, written by Ruth Milett:

FREEDOM FOR THE MAN ON FURLOUGH
(By Ruth Milett)

Some time ago I wrote a column urging parents to let their sons spend their own furloughs, instead of spending the furloughs for them by lining up family dinners with all the distant relatives included, dragging the tired men around to see people they don't care about, and so on.

Today a letter came from a marine in the South Pacific saying: "Thank you for explaining something to our parents that we could not very well explain to them ourselves." He went on to say he thought he would get a furlough soon, but that there were so many things he wanted to do, and the time would go so fast, he was hoping against hope his family wouldn't have a lot of things lined up for him to do.

He was anxious to get home—but he wanted home to be the way it was when he was a part of it. He didn't want a lot of extra fuss made. Most of all, he didn't want to be paraded around and made to talk about the fighting he had been through.

It is kind of pathetic to think that men who have dreamed of home for a year or two get afraid when their leaves are about due, that somehow those leaves won't be just as they want them.

A family can make it all right if it will remember just one thing: "It's Johnny's furlough—and nobody ought to try to spend even a small fraction of it for him. It's his to do with exactly as he dreamed he would."

Stop Crippling Dairy Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MERLIN HULL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, for weeks past, Members representing the dairy districts of the Northwest, whence comes more than half the dairy products needed for our armed forces, the civilian population, and lend-lease shipments, have been receiving hundreds of letters as to the plight of the dairy farmers in their endeavors to comply with Government demands for greater and greater production. The lack of farm labor grows more and more acute as the War Manpower Commission continues to press for more young men for the armed forces, and for war industries.

Coupled with this dairy farm situation is that created by the drafting of young men from the creameries, cheese factories, and milk condensaries. Wisconsin produces one-eighth the Nation's supply of butter and more than one-half its cheese. Crippling of the operations of these dairy plants by taking their essential workers from them, not only shortens the Nation's food supply, but it also involves the waste of the precious milk which Wisconsin cows are so bountifully providing. These dairy plants are essential industries, just as vital toward the winning of the war as other war industries. Without them farm production cannot be carried on in sufficient volume to win the war. To cripple their activities by unwise manpower policies is just as detrimental to our supreme war effort as any other policy directed to that end.

It is not possible for me to publish all the letters of protest which I have received. With other representatives whose districts are vitally affected, I have entered repeated protests without avail. A letter from Milton H. Button, director of the Wisconsin Department of Agriculture, recites some of the many endeavors of that great State department to direct attention to the serious situation which grows more serious daily, without its protests receiving deserved attention.

More than 2 months ago, Warren W. Clark, associate director of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture, made a survey of the situation in the cheese industry and sought to obtain the intervention of General Hershey, without result. In a letter regarding the conditions in the cheese factories, Mr. Clark says:

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN,
COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE,
Madison, April 14, 1944.

You have no doubt already had your attention called to the very serious situation which faces the Wisconsin cheese industry through the operation of the recent policy of National Selective Service headquarters in drafting all men between the ages of 18 and 26 for military service, with certain exceptions. My purpose in addressing you is to provide information on this situation which you may not have conveniently available and which you may find helpful in considering the problem.

Much of the following information has already been transmitted to General Hershey by Col. John F. Mullen, State director of Wisconsin selective service, but up to the present time no relief has been provided. I am also furnishing Judge Marvin Jones, of the War Food Administration, with this information. My feeling is that this situation needs to be remedied, not because of the results which the drafting of young cheesemakers would have on individuals, important as these may be, but because of the very serious effects which widespread drafting of young cheesemakers will have upon the production of milk and cheese for the national war effort.

In the 1,623 cheese factories in Wisconsin there are 1,475 men, 18 through 25 years of age. One hundred thirty-five of these men are the sole operators of one-man factories. Their drafting will close most of those factories. About 400 men, 18 through 25, are employed in two-man factories, and about 900 men of the same ages in larger factories.

This morning I was told of an operator in a one-man factory in Clark County who was ordered to take a pre-induction physical examination. His absence for the day left absolutely no one in his community who could take care of the milk delivered to his factory. The report is that farmers located a State cheese inspector in another part of the county, surrounded him and insisted that he make the cheese for the day in their factory to prevent the loss of the milk.

About 75 percent of our cheese factories are located in sparsely settled rural communities. The established custom is to use cheesemakers' sons and young, healthy and strong farm boys as trainees in the plants. Factories are unable to hire labor from urban areas or from older-age brackets due to the generally prevailing low-wage scale, the long work schedule (7 days and 70 to 80 hours a week), and the heavy physical labor involved. Women are not generally adapted to this work for the same reasons. (Cans of milk weigh around 115 pounds, cheddar cheese around 75 pounds, and Swiss cheese drums 175 to 225 pounds.) Single men are generally employed because they can board and room with the cheesemaker in the living quarters above the factory. Married men are not attracted to the industry as helpers because of the absence of living quarters for families and the inconvenience and difficulties of daily transportation from urban centers.

There are absolutely no replacements available for trained cheesemakers included in this group and a considerable portion of the experienced helpers cannot be replaced for the reasons stated above.

State selective service headquarters estimates that of the nearly 1,500 young men now working in cheese factories it is imperative that at least 550 be deferred to prevent loss of food and reduction in milk production. My own judgment is that unless an even larger number is deferred there will be serious difficulty in handling milk in the cheese areas through the flush season which is now coming on.

I am receiving reports from county agents and others in various parts of the State indicating material increases in the rate of milk production over the same period of 1943. For example, the county agent in Pepin County has collected figures showing that farmers in that locality are producing 11 percent more milk than they did at the same time a year ago. A condensery operator in Door County is receiving 12 percent more milk from fewer patrons then he had a year ago. The Badger Consolidated at Shawano reported 2 or 3 weeks ago that over the previous 30-day period they had received 6 percent more milk per patron than they did a year ago. Other less definite reports indicate that in many sections of the State there is a material increase in milk production. Professor Froker of the College of Agriculture estimates that our plants are now handling 40 percent more whole milk than they did in 1939, of which about half is due to an increase in production of milk and the other half due to shifting from farm separated cream production to delivery of whole milk.

This situation is significant because it means that milk which is now going to cheese factories could not be manufactured in other plants in this State during the coming flush period, even if it were desirable to do so. In fact, I have reports of condenseries which are unable to handle all the milk which they are getting now and are shipping part of their normal receipts of milk to other condenseries for processing. With the spring flush coming on, this situation will become more serious due both to the normal seasonal increase in milk and the removal of young men by draft from the other milk-processing plants.

I need not include to you a statement as to the importance of the Wisconsin milk industry in the national food program, but many other people, including, I presume, General Hershey, may not realize that Wisconsin produces one-eighth of all the milk in the United States and half of the cheddar cheese produced in this country. Approximately one-half of all the cheese bought by the Government for the Army and lend-lease purposes comes from Wisconsin.

Of course, if nothing is done to retain these young cheesemakers in their factories, there will still be cheese made in Wisconsin, but the production of this type of food will be badly disrupted and considerable amounts of milk will spoil or will be fed to livestock. I sincerely hope the National Selective Service headquarters can be convinced that this situation should be handled with judgment and not find it out by experience when it is too late.

Respectfully yours,

W. W. CLARK,
Associate Director.

Mr. Speaker, among others of prominence in Wisconsin much concerned with conditions which are growing worse instead of better, is Kenneth W. Hones, of Chippewa Falls, president of the Wisconsin Farmers Union, a farm organization whose membership rolls embrace the names of thousands of dairy farmers. Mr. Hones is a farmer, living in the heart of the dairy country. He knows of conditions first hand. He set forth his views in an emphatic letter to General Hershey. It is a fair statement of what must be expected in the way of lowered production of dairy products unless prompt relief is afforded.

The following copy of the letter of President Hones to General Hershey may well receive attention and consideration by our administration directors:

WISCONSIN FARMERS UNION,
Chippewa Falls, Wis.

Gen. LEWIS HERSHEY,
Selective Service Administration,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL HERSHEY: No doubt by this time you know about the dairy plant help situation in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Michigan, Iowa, and the other dairy States. There is great pressure for me to come to Washington, but work here makes it impossible at the present time.

Unless dairy plants are classified as essential war plants, and skilled workers (such as cheesemakers, buttermakers, intake and testers, pan operators, dryer operators, truckers) are classified as essential war workers and given a nondraft classification, there will be millions of pounds of milk that will spoil and never be processed if production comes through, as all indications point that it will.

There are no men left here to take their place. It takes many months to train these men, and only young healthy rugged men can stand this kind of work. As we farmers understand it, dairy products are the most vital food product today. Farmers are, more than ever, being forced to produce a higher quality and more of it. We have prepared to do it at great expense of increased herds, machinery, and extra feed acreage. But what good is it going to do to produce the milk, when we have no one to haul it—or when it reaches the plant have it sour before it can be processed, or of course not processed at all after it spoils? A man can only do so much in a day. These men are at their peak load right now.

Plants are taxed to capacity now. Who is going to pay the farmer for the lost milk? How can a quality product be made to ship around the world without the essential skilled help in the plants? If the dairy plants and cheese factories are going to be dismantled of their men, why don't you announce it now and tell farmers to sell their cows so we won't have all this lost milk?

If the skilled help in the plants are going to be taken, then every plant will have to reduce its processing volume to the available manpower, and farmers will have to deliver on a reduced percentage quota so all can deliver some milk. Dairy plants are much different than any other food processing plants. It may be hard for the Army and Navy Departments to understand that not even they could convince "bossy" to produce only at such times and in such quantity as they see fit to give her the men to take care of her highly perishable product. The four spigots under a cow cannot be turned off or on at the command of a general.

Most of these skilled men are unfortunately under 26 years of age, but that is of no consequence because the selective service is now inducting them over that age right along.

The whole question is—do we want processed dairy products, or don't we?

If not, which is the assumption now, then it is your duty to so announce it to the farmers right now. We know all about the importance of the men for the armed services. We know all about the need of manpower for the Southern Pacific, India, Italy, the invasion, and all that—but what we who are producing from daylight to long after dark want to know is, Do you want our boys over there to eat or not?

If not, tell us, and tell them, too. We cannot produce and process dairy products without the barely essential manpower.

An appropriation had better be set up now to pay the farmers for lost milk or the manpower policy had better be changed before it is too late. It certainly does not look patriotic to us to set up a manpower program which threatens to waste the food that is produced. It is far from fulfilling the obligation to the farmer to have him produce it and then lose it. This is not the same consideration, which has, at all times, been given the manufacturers of all other war goods. They get their pay plus a guaranteed profit.

We farmers are asking now for a showdown on the whole question of production. This also takes machinery and other farm supplies into consideration. The current practice of changing Agriculture's status every 24 hours is getting beyond reason of any sound business judgment. Farmers cannot change their production plan to meet such type of operations on a moment's notice.

Hoping we may receive the necessary consideration before the trouble starts out here, I am

Sincerely yours,

K. W. HONES,
State President.

Bureaucracy Versus Democracy in the United States Today and Tomorrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1944

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith a speech made by Lawrence Sullivan, noted writer and author of the current best seller Bureaucracy Runs Amuck. This address was delivered April 3, 1944, before the Economic Club of Detroit. Mr. Sullivan was introduced by Mr. Waldo C. Granse, president of the Detroit Bar Association. Mr. Granse's introduction of the speaker and the address follow:

Mr. WALDO C. GRANSE. Members and guests of the Economic Club, the subject to be discussed today, Bureaucracy versus Democracy, in the United States today and tomorrow, bears a rather legal sounding title. Of course, a lawyer (with customary brevity) would have contracted the printing of versus to vs. However, since the title connotes a controversy our speaker might feel more at home with a brief general introduction of the case. At the outset, I want to make it clear to you members of the jury that, like Mr. Sullivan, I also appear for the defendant.

Next to winning the war as soon as possible, no other national development in progress during recent years is more alarming to millions of Americans than the apparent changes which are taking place in our concepts and in the form of our Government. While it is natural for some persons to question and resist so-called progressive reforms which interfere with established practices, I believe most of us recognize that changes in our democratic processes of government are inevitable and ofttimes beneficial. But to those who are close to the present picture, and who are experiencing first hand the shackles, waste, delay, and duplication of American energy, half bureaucratic, half free enterprise, there can well come a sense of futility and despair.

I think that you can never do anything effectively by halves. I have no doubt that in waging war—totally bureaucratic Germany and Japan are more efficient than democratic America. But who wants total bureaucracy in the United States? That is exactly what we are fighting against on foreign soil. Are we going to permit it to seep in on our own soil? Nor do I have any doubt that Americans working cooperatively under the uniform and unified direction of our Government, on a basis of mutual trust, free to develop their proven genius and capacity for production and distribution of materials and foodstuffs, are far more effective (even in times of war) when unhampered by myriads of governmental bureaus, commissions, regulations, and Executive and administrative orders which have the force of law.

Most of our citizens have but a comparatively small and circumscribed direct contact with such governmental agencies, and consequently little chance of realizing their far-reaching effect on our present, and possible future way of life. But when an elevator operator commented to me the other day on the phase of O. P. A. rationing that the Government is making cheaters and liars of the American people, I see a ray of sunshine in our common thinking.

Fortunately, there are some men in and out of Government service who have the ability to ascertain the broad scope of bureaucratic control now in vogue, its motivating forces and its implications, and who also have the independent position and courage necessary to bring the facts home to our people. Our speaker today is one of those men. With 25 years' experience as a journalist, writer, and publisher, most of them in Washington, he has displayed a knack for getting the facts on economic problems and national and international relations. He now directs his own economic news service, National Business News from the National Press Building, Washington.

Mr. Sullivan has written a number of books and his most recent book, Bureaucracy Runs Amuck, is one which you certainly should read. It is selling so fast that you might have a little difficulty in getting a copy locally, but the book can be obtained through the publisher, Bobbs-Merrill Co., New York. A condensed summary appears in the April issue of the Reader's Digest on page 104, under the title "The World's Biggest Payroll."

By the way, Mr. Sullivan, I hope that Mr. Crow has forewarned you that we in Detroit are captivated by the charm of names and clans. We expect great things from men with well-known names, and since your name looms heavy in both the journalistic and pugilistic fields, you should have a Detroit audience convinced before you start.

So, with confidence that all of us are eagerly awaiting to hear from you in person, I am pleased to introduce Mr. Lawrence Sullivan. [Applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE SULLIVAN. Thank you, Mr. Granse.

Gentlemen of the Economic Club of Detroit, you gentlemen honor me with your mere presence here today in the midst of a busy day in the Arsenal of Democracy, and I shall hope to return the compliment twofold—first, by being brief, and secondly by confining myself to matters of public records which may be verified from official documents in the "arsenal of bureaucracy." [Laughter.]

After about 18 years of intimate daily contact with the Government agencies in Washington—but never having been on the Government pay roll aside from a brief turn in the Army 25 years ago—I still approach this living reality of bureaucracy with something approaching awe, for I have found that bureaucracy is a many-sided monster. He can come at you from a dozen directions all at once—as all of you well know who fill out the production reports, the tax returns, inventory forms, and material questionnaires, or who must answer the antitrust suits. No question is too inconsequential or too trivial to find a place in the Government questionnaire, and it must be answered in triplicate.

Strange as it may appear to you men who are straining every energy in the battle for production, antitrust suits are very much a part of the war picture and war activity in Washington today.

I could cite the record of one great industrial concern—one which is liberally loaded with millions of dollars in vital war contracts—which has received 47 Army and Navy E awards for excellence in production since the summer of 1941, and in the same period this company has been called upon to appear and answer 10 antitrust suits initiated by the Department of Justice.

Well, those men are developing a sort of complex about it. Every time they get a fourth Army or Navy E in any one plant they begin to look around for their legal fox holes, for they know on averages another antitrust suit is coming over the hill pretty soon. [Laughter.]

And that, gentlemen, is the experience of the E. I. du Pont Co. of Delaware.

Bureaucracy is a practical beginning toward absolutism in government. Here is the way the chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary puts it, and I quote from his reports:

"Contrary to all our philosophy of government, we have placed in one appointed personnel all three powers: they make the rules, they construe the rules, they enforce the rules. When one of these people goes to an ordinary private citizen he goes to him with all the powers a king ever had. The citizen has no power to resist, practically speaking, the mandate of an agent of these bureaus."

Those are the words of a man who has been in the House of Representatives for more than 35 years, and he is chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. And that, gentlemen, is the first challenge of bureaucracy versus democracy today.

Let me say at this point that I have assured your cordial and energetic president,

Mr. Crow, that I propose to present a constructive discussion.

I begin with the assumption that we all look forward to the same great ends in national policy—to keep these United States a going concern, solvent, strong, free, unafraid, and, above all, at peace with itself.

If we achieve these things, we need have no concern about secondary issues and policies in Government. To a free and solvent America, to an America no longer throttled and distracted by the demoralizing pulling and hauling of imported class warfare and alien doctrines of collectivism—to such an America all things will be added.

I say this because I am convinced that our prevailing American bureaucracy is deeply infected by a systematic infiltration of alert and aggressive job holders who are sincerely sympathetic toward various forms of European collectivism and that this group, entrenched in every department, are warping and distorting some of the primary powers and authorities of Government to their own ends—ends concerning which the great body of the American people have not the slightest or remotest conception.

Now, all this has been going on for about 10 years. The resulting administrative confusions and social bewilderments present a challenge, not only to the whole concept of free enterprise but also to the very roots of our constitutional tradition of checks and balances in public power.

And this challenge, unless it is met by an informed and intelligent public opinion, may become grave and menacing in the post-war period; because the record shows clearly that while our military services are smashing through to a certain and conclusive victory in this stupendous global war, many of our civilian bureaus and boards and commissions and offices and administrations in Washington already are digging in for post-war permanency. We see that on every hand in the Capital today—plans to continue this or that program or agency indefinitely.

Bureaus die hard—and the war agencies, as the recent Baruch report warned us, almost certainly will stretch themselves to find essential and inescapable peacetime functions, just as we saw the relief agencies of 1933 to 1939 continued as war agencies long after all need for the original programs had disappeared. This was true particularly of the W. P. A. and the N. Y. A.; and it still is true of some of the crop-control programs—several of which even today are being maintained intact, despite the fact that every former urge toward limited agricultural production now has given way to a crying world-wide demand for more and more food of every sort.

Thus does bureaucracy tend by instinct to move in ruts and rigid routines. It simply cannot adjust itself to sudden and unexpected developments. It operates largely by what it calls national planning, and by the time the master plan is discovered to be a mile or two wide of the mark, the administrative machine still must grind on and on until a new plan may be devised, approved, and established.

To illustrate this, as recently as February of last year the Labor Department reported that we still had 158,000 youngsters employed on relief programs of the National Youth Adminisration. But a very small footnote at the bottom of the page observed, "Beginning in July 1942, the N. Y. A. was considered a training program for war work rather than a relief program."

That is the formula—the relief program of yesterday is the war program of today, and tomorrow by a swish of the pen it will again be a relief program.

I hope that you gentlemen will not be dismayed by this volume. I am not going to read it all.

It comprises about 2,000 pages of testimony before the House Naval Affairs Committee regarding some difficulties encountered at the Brewster Aeronautical Corporation, on Long Island, in the production of naval planes.

I brought it along because I want to read a passage from the testimony of Mr. Thomas V. De Lorenzo, president of Local 365, U. A. W.-C. I. O., at Brewster.

I think this testimony bears pointedly on this whole subject of "Bureaucracy versus Democracy," because it illuminates a problem which it seems to me lies at the very core of the discussion—the diffusion of administrative authority among 10 or a dozen agencies all in the same general area of national policy.

You all know the story of delayed production at Brewster. It has been told many times in the press. There have been six changes of management since November 1940, but never any change in the labor picture. And now we hear rumblings of another change coming over the hill.

Well, the Naval Affairs Committee decided to have a look-see; and in due course called Mr. De Lorenzo as a witness. He appeared on November 4, 1943, about 5 months ago.

This record shows that during the summer of 1942 the Navy decided to stop producing dive bombers at Brewster and switch to fighters.

Mr. De Lorenzo testified that his men did not like the idea of switching from one type plane to another. They urged management to head off the change.

The president of the company responded that he could not tell the Navy what type of combat planes it should order. Whereupon, Mr. De Lorenzo set out—as he put it—to "raise a little hell."

Here is the testimony (hearings, p. 2978):

"The CHAIRMAN. To raise what?

"Mr. DE LORENZO. To raise a little hell.

"The CHAIRMAN. A little hell?

"Mr. DE LORENZO. Yes, sir; anyhow, to make a long story short, we came down here again and we got the same brush-off. This time, to be sure that we were absolutely on the record, we wrote a number of letters. We wrote a letter to Chairman VINSON, July 22, 1942, protesting the change from the dive bomber to the fighter. We wrote a copy of that letter to the Truman investigating committee, to Donald M. Nelson, and also Secretary KNOX, DAVID I. WALSH (chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee), and to President Roosevelt."

Nevertheless, Rear Admiral John H. Towers, then Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, insisted that the dive bombers were obsolete under the new plan of strategy, and that he wanted fighters for the new carriers that were coming off. So, the switch was made, but not before Mr. De Lorenzo had received the written promise of Admiral Towers that lost time incident to the change-over would be held to an absolute minimum.

"That is what you were mainly interested in, wasn't it?" the committee chairman asked (hearings, p. 2982).

The witness responded: "No, sir. Two things I was interested in: No. 1, employment of the members, and No. 2, production."

"The CHAIRMAN. You put the first one, the employment of the members, and second, the production?

"The WITNESS. Well, it would be a very hard choice for me to make in my official capacity as a president of a local union. I put the employment of the members first. Perhaps as a citizen and not as an officer of the local union, I would put production first.

"The CHAIRMAN. You don't think because you are a union president, Mr. De Lorenzo, that that relieves you of your obligations as a citizen of the United States, do you?

"The WITNESS. They are both the same, sir. You couldn't have one without the other.

"The CHAIRMAN. But you thought that the union situation came first?

"Mr. DE LORENZO. That is what I am being paid for, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is what I am asking. Do you think you should put the union above your country?

"The WITNESS. They are inseparable, sir; you cannot put one above the other because you cannot have one without the other in this country. In other countries you can't have either.

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, of course, if that is your view, there is nothing more I can say about it.

"The WITNESS. It is my view, sir."

Now, there you have it. Just a shade of doubt, if you please, whether the interest of a particular local on Long Island is on a par with the national interest in wartime.

This, I contend, is the second great challenge of bureaucracy in America today.

The administrative system in Washington which made such a congressional inquiry even necessary is a quick thumbnail epitome of the whole problem of government by Executive order.

What in the world has happened in this great country of ours that the United States Navy in time of war, must first obtain the approval and consent of a local union chief before it may change from one type of plane production to another?

Now this Brewster case is not an isolated incident. There have been many congressional inquiries into Federal labor policies as they touch war production—notably by the Smith committee, the Truman committee, the Senate Small Business Committee, and the Byrd committee.

As long ago as November 1937, Admiral William D. Leahy, then Chief of Naval Operations, and now White House Chief of Staff, submitted in his annual report to Congress the observation that strikes were delaying the naval rearmament program. He pointed out that 53 destroyers were under construction during that year, but only 2 of them, 2 out of 53, had joined the fleet. Then his report went on:

"Twenty-three of these vessels have been delayed in joining the fleet by strikes, late delivery of material, and necessary changes during construction."

Another report from the Navy covers a strike here in Detroit in August to October 1939, precisely coincident with the outbreak of the war in Europe.

Inquiry disclosed that this strike had halted production on airplane bearings and castings for both the Army and Navy. After the strike call, management was not permitted to ship even the parts already completed and packaged.

So, the Navy sought permission to ship the completed parts in its own trucks. But this permission, too, was also denied by the C. I. O.

This strike began on August 29, and work was resumed on October 8, a delay of 41 days.

The Navy's report added that this delay hit not only aircraft production, but also several parts for a special type of marine engine then being developed in the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

Failing to obtain permission to ship the completed parts, the Navy next asked permission of the C. I. O. to ship its own secret dies and patterns to another plant, to avoid closing down production lines on both aircraft and marine engines at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

And here are the words of the Secretary of the Navy on the results of that plea:

"The representatives of union local 208 were given full access to the files of the Navy contracts and they were informed that the delay in releasing patterns for delivery was seriously jeopardizing the manufacture of airplane engines at the naval aircraft factory.

"At the end of the discussion the union representatives stated that as the strike situation stood at the present time their answer was emphatically 'No,' and they would not let patterns or inspected castings be removed."

That strike continued for 11 days longer.

Now, this sad spectacle of the United States Navy grovelling before local union chiefs for permission to move its own dies and jigs from a struck plant, or pleading with another local for permission to switch from one type of production to another—these things demonstrate with great force what is almost certain to happen in any given field of public administration when the authority of government is scattered or spread too thin. This diffusion of authority, the inability of the bureaucratic system to center real decision in one competent and experienced administrator, is the crowning weakness, the darkest sin, of the bureaucratic method.

Let us look at this whole area of labor administration to see how the principle of diffusion has worked out there during the last 10 years.

Today we have the greatest army of Federal labor administrators and boards and committees in all our history. Yet it is safe to say that never have our industrial-relations policies and programs been in a more unhappy muddle.

Up to 1933 the labor policies of the National Government were administered through a single Cabinet department—the Department of Labor. This centralization of authority established a degree of administrative responsibility and public accountability. But today there are no less than 17 different Federal agencies charged with various phases of labor and manpower administration.

The Labor Department still carries on with 6,000 employees, but now we have the National War Labor Board with 3,000; the National Labor Relations Board with 700; the Railroad Retirement Board with 1,700. Next we have the Employees' Compensation Commission with 500, the President's Fair Employment Practice Committee with 100, and the National Mediation Board with 89.

This gives us altogether about 12,000 Federal employees engaged exclusively in labor administration.

But this is not all. We also have the Labor Policy Committee in the War Production Board, and a Labor Policy Board in the Department of the Interior, and the Labor Standards Division in the Department of Labor. There is the Labor Supply Committee in the War Manpower Commission, and the Management Labor Policy Committee in the War Production Board, and the Labor Advisory Committee in the National Research Council. Next we have the Petroleum Labor Policy Board in the Department of the Interior, and the Advisory Committee on Standards for Employment of Women, and the Building Trades Stabilization Board of Review, and the Committee on Economic Security, and the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training, and finally the Liaison Office for Personnel Management in the Office for Emergency Management.

On might be inclined to say that this would be about enough labor agencies in any one government. But on top of all this we also have the War Manpower Commission, and on January 31 of this year the War Manpower Commission employed 25,957 full-time workers.

Thus we now have about 38,000 Federal personnel engaged in the formulation, administration, supervision, and enforcement of the several facets of national policy touching manpower and labor.

Now, 38,000 people, gentlemen, is more than normally would be gainfully employed in a city of 100,000 population. So, you just take a city of 100,000 people and wipe it off the map and say, "They are down in Washington administering our labor problems." That is what it amounts to economically; and this does not include, of course, the 23,000 full-time civilian employees of the Selective Service System, who administer the military draft.

If we include these selective-service people, the total administrative personnel handling our labor and manpower programs adds up to 61,000 full-time paid civilian employees, exclusive of the military personnel assigned to these various activities throughout the country.

That is the up-to-the-minute picture of bureaucracy running amuck in the field of labor administration, and the broad, general results we all know.

But what we are likely to forget, as we examine the details of administrative machinery in any one area, is that precisely the same runaway expansion has been recorded during these last 10 years in every other major field of Federal authority.

Everybody knows from his daily experience what has happened in the realm of agricultural production, and food processing, and distribution. To a greater or lesser degree, we have seen the same thing in social security and public welfare; we saw it for a time in the handling of the synthetic rubber program, in petroleum, coal, transportation; we have seen it in aviation, in radio, and in the almost unmeasured expansion of Federal functions in the field of Government loans to industry, agriculture, housing, and public works.

The most complex holding company structure in the world today is wholly-owned by the Government of the United States. One Cabinet member in Washington now is director of 33 Government-owned corporations.

Putting this all together we see that in 10 years we have created about 200 new Federal agencies. The combined pay roll of the civil government has expanded from 560,000 in 1933 to 3,300,000 on February 1 of this year, and all this expansion is exclusive of the military personnel, although it does include, of course, the civilian employees of the Army and Navy Departments.

Now these figures mean that today we have 1 full-time Federal worker on the Government pay roll for every 41 people in the national population, against only 1 for every 200 in 1933.

Or we may make this comparison: Over the last 10 years the population of the country has increased by roughly 10,000,000 people and in those 10 years we have put 2,500,000 on the Federal pay roll.

I submit that no nation can go on very long adding every fourth member of the population increase directly to the Government pay roll.

That is the third immediate and urgent challenge of bureaucracy versus democracy.

Now, of course, it is necessary to increase the Federal working staff in wartime, particularly in the military departments.

But the Byrd Committee on Nonessential Federal Expenditures has pointed out in an official report that only 46 percent of our Federal civilian pay roll, less than half, are actually employed in activities directly connected with the prosecution of the war.

Here is what the Byrd committee reported:

"It can be said unequivocally that our own Government is the chief offender in the entire country from the standpoint of wasting and hoarding manpower."

Maybe this would be a good place to start on this terrific manpower problem which confronts us. The Byrd committee thought so, for they added in their report:

"Excluding those engaged in mechanical and construction work, one may say that fully one-third of the entire remaining civilian personnel of the Federal Government could be dismissed. Rather than impairing the necessary functions of government, this action would result in greater efficiency, provide manpower for industry and the armed forces, reduce the cost of government, and aid substantially in the successful prosecution of the war."

So it simply is not the truth to say, as do some defenders of bureaucracy, that all this headlong expansion and bureaucratic spending is in pursuit of the war effort. One instance will illustrate what Senator BYRD is driving at. In the last 12 years our Federal appropriations for Indian Affairs have increased roughly from $17,000,000 to $35,000,000. Now this is an increase of 106 percent in a 10-year period which saw an increase of only 10 percent in our Indian population.

If time permitted we could review comparable figures for every major peace-time activity in Washington. This is not a war of Red skins. The Indians are not fighting the war alone. [Laughter.]

Now all this headlong expansion of the Federal Government far beyond either the practical needs or the economic resources of the country, is bad enough in its own right.

But there is yet another aspect of the problem. Many of these new Federal workers, particularly in the so-called Executive order agencies, are known to be identified with or active affiliates of, or sympathizers with, Communist-front and party line organizations in the United States, or red-fringe organizations in the United States, and many of these people in the Federal service are convinced and sincerely believe that the American Constitution is outmoded and that the American system of free enterprise is all washed up.

As long ago as January 1940 a committee of the House submitted the names of 563 of these people who had been identified.

The President of the United States denounced that committee report as "cheap" and "sordid."

About 2 years later the same committee submitted another report and sent it directly to the Attorney General, and this list carried 1,124 names. This is the original certified copy of that letter to the Attorney General and here is a list showing the distribution of those fellow travelers in the different departments of the Government. [Showing letter.]

I will not read them all, but a few will indicate the disbursion: In the Department of Agriculture, 207; Federal Security Agency, 145; Department of Labor, 98; War Department, 45; Navy Department, 40. And so it runs through every branch of the Government in Washington. Wherever you turn, whatever your line of activity, you are sure to find there in the agency a loyal cell of fellow travelers, watching operations, warping programs, thinking up those damnable questionnaires which it will take busy men a day or a week to answer.

Now 5 people on this list were getting salaries of $10,000 a year or more, and a total of 370 of them were getting salaries of over $3,000 a year. So, this is not a list of elevator operators and custodians. This list to my mind explains a great deal of what has been going on in Washington these last 10 years.

Our Government is a bureaucratic surrey with a red fringe on top. [Applause.]

Several years ago another committee of the House discovered that the Chief Economist for the National Labor Relations Board was a member of the executive committee of the Conference for Progressive Political Action.

The letterhead of this organization carries this arresting slogan:

"It aims to inspire the workers to take control of industry and Government, abolish the present capitalist system and build a workers' republic."

Now when this evidence was presented to the committee, the Chief Economist for the National Labor Relations Board denied ever having subscribed to such a program, but here is the letterhead with his name on it—and the quotation I have just read to you—as a member of the executive committee; and there are on that list two other men who are now with the Government—one of them in the O. P. A. at $5,600 a year and the other one in O. P. M., now W. P. B., at $5,600 a year.

Well, this proved to be pretty strong meat for Congress and the next time the N. L. R. B. appropriation bill came by, they just abolished that job. They said, "We cannot have men like that in the National Labor Relations Board making labor policy, making labor decisions all over the country."

So, he was dismissed, but where do you think he is today? On January 16, 1943, he was appointed Assistant Chief of the Labor Division, in the War Production Board. And he is still there.

Now I hope that you gentlemen will not misunderstand what I am saying about this fellow traveler infiltration. I am not saying that a majority of the United States Government or even a considerable minority are Communists or Fascists or in sympathy with any other form of European statism.

But what I do say is that there is in the Federal establishment today a closely knit network of aggressive communism, which reaches to every branch and department of our Government, and that these cells, if you please, of Euro. ean collectivism look forward to, and plan for, a wholly new structure of government and economic life in these United States.

They look forward to an economic system rationed and regimented to the last shoe lace and the last ounce of tapioca.

They look forward to, and plan for, a national system of completely socialized medicine, universal labor conscription, a regimented agriculture, and absolute Government control of both production and distribution through labor-management plant committees and industry advisory committee in O. P. A., W. F. A., and W. P. B.

To sustain all this set-up financially, they are developing a new theory of economic perpetual motion, which teaches that the more you spend the richer you are, and the greater the Government deficit the less the people owe—because they owe it only to themselves.

Now after 10 years of all this, we are going to end up sometime in the next year or two facing a national debt of $1,500 or $2,000 per capita. That means $7,000 for the average family, and on the long-pull, we shall face a contraction of perhaps 6,000,000 to 8,000,000 in our total gainfully employed, and there will be a tremendous reservoir of savings. We might have to be fighting off inflation if we do not get into production quickly when the war job is done.

I feel perfectly certain that this Nation has the energy and skills and resources to cope successfully with these post-war problems.

But I insist that if we are going to pull out, we must give America her head. We must release once more the unmeasured driving power of free enterprise, freedom of contract and security of individual thrift against wild and reckless government spending. We must face the reality that Social Security reared on the quicksands of Federal deficits are neither social nor secure; and finally we must root out of our legal structure forever that absurd, demoralizing and utterly un-American law which begins with the premise that employer and employee are natural enemies who may not even speak to each other except under the tutelage and watchful eye of a Federal agent. [Applause.]

The solutions which we bring to these post-war problems must be American solutions sprung from the instincts of freedom and the unquenchable aspirations of liberty. Our programs must be practical, they must be stated clearly so that people will know where they are going and what they are supposed to do; and they must be honest.

If we try any other approach, we will gamble needlessly and dangerously with the richest heritage and the brightest promise for human welfare that the Almighty God ever has entrusted to the guardianship of a people.

Specifically, we must have tax policies designed to raise revenue, not to remake and reform America.

We must restore a monetary system which will encourage investments in the future of America.

We must set down the principle in law that the right to work is more sacred than the right to strike. [Applause.]

And, finally, we must uproot the spendthrift bureaucracy—this Frankenstein monster—and re-affirm in Government the ancient virtues of prudence, thrift, and the honest day's work.

Let us have the courage to set America once more on these, the true paths of her national character and greatness.

Thank you. [Applause.]

Farm Security—C. I. O. Political Action—Pegler

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks and print two editorials, I am inserting the two written by Westbrook Pegler, appearing in the Washington News of June 20 and 21. This is an interesting and startling statement of facts, which confirms the suspicions of many and vindicates those who prophesied that Mr. Baldwin's association with Sidney Hillman meant an effort to inveigle as many farmers as possible into that perniciously active communistic set-up to aid the fourth term and to help Russianize the Congress:

[From the Washington News of June 20, 1944]

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, June 20.—Long distance telephone records subpenaed by the Dies committee have revealed a close relationship between the political action committee of the C. I. O. and the following:

The White House and Mrs. Roosevelt, Vice President HENRY WALLACE, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Justice, and various regional directors of the Farm Security Administration having power to exert strong political and economic pressure on farmers.

Numerous calls to regional F. S. A. offices were made in most cases by C. B. Baldwin, assistant director of the political action committee, who resigned his job as Chairman of the F. S. A. in Washington to become actual manager of the P. A. C.'s campaign to elect President Roosevelt for a fourth term and Mr. WALLACE for a second term and to defeat a select list of aspirants for the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Sidney Hillman, P. A. C. chairman, is president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, C. I. O., and recently has been denounced by David Dubinsky and other right-wing union radicals, as leader of the Communist Party in New York, now known as the American Labor Party.

Baldwin has held various key jobs in Washington ever since 1933, when he caught on as Assistant Secretary of Agriculture under WALLACE. He became Director of the Farm Security Administration in October 1940. The phone calls indicate a strong continuing interest and influence in the F. S. A., while he is on leave serving with the political leader of the New York Communist faction of the union movement.

The slips showed 28 calls from the New York headquarters of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee direct to the White House, including one from Hillman to Mrs. Roosevelt and another from Hillman to David Niles, formerly Nyhus, of Boston, one of the President's selfless assistants with a passion for anonymity and for left-wing politics. Hillman also called Vice President WALLACE. Baldwin is recorded as having made three calls to WALLACE'S office.

The Hillman-Baldwin-Communist group of the C. I. O. has defeated for renomination both MARTIN DIES, of Texas, and JOE STARNES, of Alabama. STARNES is a member of the Dies committee.

Records show, according to the Dies committee, hundreds of calls from the P. A. C.'s New York headquarters to various Government officials, particularly in the Department of Justice, and in the Department of Agriculture, which controls the Farm Security Administration and the fortunes of many farmers through its local agents scattered everywhere.

[From the Washington News of June 21, 1944]

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, June 21.—Yesterday I reported that the Dies Committee had subpenaed long-distance slips of the telephone company which showed that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee had been carrying on conversations with Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and two of the President's anonymous political secretaries at the White House, with Vice President HENRY WALLACE and his secretaries, with Attorney General Biddle, and with Farm Security Administration regional directors. These telephone slips showed further that C. B. Baldwin, a New Deal farm bureaucrat from the beginning of the administration in 1933, and now Political Action Committee assistant director, had telephoned several of his old subordinates in the F. S. A. in regions where the P. A. C. was opposing the renomination of Congressmen and Senators whom it had marked for defeat. Until recently, Baldwin was F. S. A. chief.

The factual report was long and left no room for interpretation. Today we may study the meaning.

Chairman of the P. A. C. is Sidney Hillman, president of the C. I. O. Amalgamated Clothing Workers. Hillman came to the United States in 1907 as a Russian refugee from the Czars and if he ever worked at all at any laborious trade, his experience was brief for he acquired the sedentary, political job of union president in 1914 and has held it since. He had preoccupations which made it inconvenient for him to take part in World War No. 1. In May 1940, President Roosevelt appointed him to be the "labor" member of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense. Later he was appointed to a position in the Office of Production Management.

A few months ago Hillman allied himself openly with the Communists of the C. I. O. in New York in a fight for control of the synthetic, left-wing political organization known as the American Labor Party. The right-wingers fought him but Hillman and the Communists won. The A. L. P. thereupon became the successor to the Commuist Party, which announced its own dissolution. Meanwhile, Hillman, proceeding with the organization of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, had proposed that in New York State all workers be compelled to join unions and pay a political income tax to the committee for use in the fourth-term campaign.

In his years in the Farm Security Administration, Baldwin built an organization within the Government which reaches into every farm county. It is organized and equipped for political espionage propaganda and coercion. Its regional directors were Baldwin's subordinates, and would be his subordinates again should Mr. Roosevelt be reelected and should Baldwin care to resume the job from which he has technically resigned. Practically, he is merely on leave and on loan to the C. I. O. for the duration of the campaign.

The long-distance calls discovered by the Dies committee were not personal calls. They were official calls made from the headquarters of the P. A. C. and charged to the committee. Hillman, Baldwin, and others made 28 such calls to the White House alone and many other calls to F. S. A. regional offices. Yet the Roosevelt Party and the P. A. C. would maintain that there is no connection between the White House, or the F. S. A., and the committee. The C. I. O., for its own part, insists that the P. A. C. is a gratuitous and independent organization, unconnected with the Roosevelt party.

Mr. Biddle, one of those who was called by long distance from the P. A. C.'s headquarters, has given an opinion that its "educational activities," are legitimate and contrary to no law, although thus far it has raised $700,000 for the fourth term campaign, has access to millions more, and is campaigning for him and his chief throughout the country.

The seizure of the telephone records was a high-handed operation. In total effect, the information thus obtained, however questionable the method, plainly shows that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, heavily infested with Communists, is an auxiliary of the Roosevelt fourth-term party on terms of intimate consultation with Mr. Roosevelt, David K. Niles born Nyphus, and Jonathan Daniels, the President's confidential political agents in the White House, with Vice President WALLACE and with the Departments of Justice and Agriculture.

To Clean the River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared in the June 21, 1944, issue of the Chicago Daily News:

TO CLEAN THE RIVER

All up and down Lake Michigan high water is tearing out beaches, undermining bluffs and banks, encroaching on property and threatening shore-side buildings. The lake was very high last year. It is still high, and may go higher. But in Chicago, the river that should flow fresh and clear through the heart of the city lies stagnant, an open sewer, disgusting no less to smell than to look at.

The river is stagnant because locks have been built to keep it stagnant; otherwise, more water might flow through it out of the lake than the 1,500 cubic feet per second fixed by the Supreme Court in 1938, on complaint of the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and others who claimed that Chicago was lowering the level of the lakes.

It has never been proved that reversing the Chicago River appreciably lowered the lake level. Compared to the vast volume of water involved, the Chicago flow seems insignificant. The rise and fall of the lakes seems rather to be vaguely governed by some kind of long-term weather cycle.

The question we wish to raise again is this: Whatever the Supreme Court has said or may say, does it make any sense, does it help anyone, does it satisfy to any degree Wisconsin, Michigan, and the others, to condemn Chicago to live by an open sewer, when the lake water is at a level so high it is actually destroying property? We do not see how any fair-minded person can answer this other than in the negative. We think that the plaintiffs should waive their legal rights while the water is high, and allow Chicago to flush out the stagnant river.

Another Launching Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article which appeared in the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., June 22, 1944, relative to the launching record at the Neponset yard in connection with landing craft infantry:

ANOTHER LAUNCHING RECORD—WELDERS' RACE PUTS LANDING CRAFT AFLOAT IN 7 HOURS

BOSTON, June 22.—An LCI (landing craft infantry) was launched today 7 hours after 300 workmen started assembling the prefabricated 150-foot vessel, to break the previous record for this type of construction by several days.

"We could do it all over again right after a couple of hours' rest," said a spokesman for one group of welders at the George Lawley & Son Corporation's Neponset yard.

Only the yard's regular crew worked on the craft. Officials, who had hoped to make the launching within 18 hours, expressed amazement.

While the prefabricated stern section, standing alone on the ways, the section immediately behind the bow was lowered into place by a huge crane at 7:03 a. m. Twelve minutes later the bow was laid in place, and 15 minutes after that the middle section was hoisted down.

Each of the sections immediately was fitted perfectly together and the welders went into action. Other workmen installed piping, wiring, and other equipment. As each welded seam was completed, water was pumped into finished compartments to test their tightness, then pumped out again.

At 1:57 the craft slid down the ways.

The Truth in Regard to the Yugoslavian Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, there has been much in the press in recent weeks in regard to the Yugoslavian situation, and particularly in regard to Tito.

Under present war restrictions, news in regard to our allies—or, for that matter, any foreign country—is not printed unless it has the approval of the Office of War Information, of which Hon. Elmer Davis is Director.

I have followed with a great deal of interest the releases in regard to Yugoslavia, and I cannot understand why the Director of War Information is feeding Communist propaganda to the American people in regard to the conditions in Yugoslavia.

The American people are led to believe that Tito and his Partisan army has the support of the people of Yugoslavia, whereas, as a matter of fact, that is not so—General Mihailovich, the commander in chief of the Yugoslavian Army and also the minister of war of the Yugoslavian Government in Exile, has the support of the people of Yugoslavia.

Yugoslavia was overrun by the Nazi hordes on October 6, 1941, and under the magnificent leadership of General Mihailovich, the people have been bravely fighting the savage invader since that time.

It would appear from recent international political incidents that the United States has forsaken two of its oldest allies in this war—Poland and Yugoslavia. Poland was the first country to be invaded by the Nazi, and since September 1, 1939, has been valiantly fighting the Germans. Certainly, Poland and Yugoslavia, which were among the earliest to suffer the devastation of Axis aggression, deserve to be honored by every member of the United Nations, and particularly by countries which did not experience the blow of the Axis aggressor until much later, such as our own Nation, on December 7, 1941, and the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. However, that does not appear to be the case, and is a matter to be greatly deplored and one which deserves the protest of all honest men who seek nothing of selfish gain for themselves out of this terrible Global War.

I wish to call attention to a sequence of events, with respect to Yugoslavia, which will correct the false impression given the American people by the propaganda released by the Office of War Information.

On May 5, 1944, General Velebit, chief of Tito's military mission to England, said that Tito had an army of 300,000 fighting men and that Tito has liberated and now controls two-thirds of the territory of Yugoslavia. We have been given to understand through public anouncements made by such authorities as Prime Minister Churchill that because of the vast army Tito has, it is the basis on which Great Britain, primarily, and the United States, secondarily, has switched their support from General Mihailovich to Tito. In brief, the fact that Tito is supposed to have liberated and now controls the major portion of the territory of Yugoslavia and that he has a larger and a more active fighting force opposing the Nazis than General Mihailovich, with some 300,000 men as against 16,000 under General Mihailovitch, as charged by Tito, or 40,000 as claimed by General Mihailovitch.

The only honorable reason which the American people and the Allies can accept for abandoning General Mihailovich, who organized and maintained Yugoslav opposition to the Nazis ever since May 20, 1941, and for switching our support now to Tito who did not emerge as a leader of any opposition to the Nazi until the middle of 1942, would be only if it were true that Tito has won the support of the Yugoslav people, and General Mihailovich has lost the support of the people to such an extent that he is now able allegedly to muster no more than 16,000 men under arms, and that he has ceased—or practically ceased—to fight the Nazis, but the facts are just the opposite as have been revealed by recent events.

On May 25, 1944, a German broadcast reported a surprise raid on Tito's headquarters by a few hundred Nazi parachutists. For 3 weeks this report remained unconfirmed by Allied sources. Then in a dispatch by Reuter's, the semiofficial British news agency, there came confirmation that Tito had fled his mountain retreat. The Reuter's said that the sudden German attack necessitated the transfer of Tito's headquarters from one part of Yugoslavia to another. But finally the truth came out as to Tito's whereabouts; it was established that he had fled to Bari, Italy. Coincidently, Reuter's reported that Tito is conducting negotiations with the new Yugoslav Premier, Dr. Ivan Subasic, somewhere in Yugoslavia. That also appears to be not so. The fact appears to be that the negotiations are being conducted in Italy.

This sequence of events now raise questions which go to the very heart of the publicly announced reasons for switching Allied support from General Mihailovich to Tito.

The Nazi raid on Tito's headquarters exploded the myth of Tito's claim that he had 300,000 followers. No sensible person, whether they had military training or not, could be lead to believe that 300,000 men, secure in mountainous terrain, in a country where they knew every mountain pass and trail, could be dispersed—yes, annihilated—by a few hundred enemy parachutists. It also raises the question as to how it would be possible for a few German troops to drop from the skies and recapture the liberated territory claimed to comprise two-thirds of Yugoslavia, causing Tito to flee from his liberated territory and take refuge under Allied guns in Bari, Italy.

In reality Tito's army never did consist of more than a band of Communist followers, and because of Great Britain's wish to appease Stalin, they have been supporting Tito and have withdrawn their support from General Mihailovich, and the United States has apparently acquiesced to Great Britain's wishes in the matter.

In view of Tito's claims as to the enormous size of his army and the territory he is supposed to have liberated, which propaganda has been disseminated to the American people by the Office of War Information, there arises now in the mind of any fair-thinking person doubt as to whether any of the claims made by Tito or in his behalf are true or ever were true.

This is obviously a most important question, and if Tito's claims are not, or never were true, what are the reasons for switching Allied support from General Mihailovich to Stalin's satellite, Tito? There is no need to exaggerate the import of these questions. There is no need to go to the extreme of denying or questioning the probable fact that Tito has been engaged in some military activities against the Nazis, and that he has helped to harass the foe, and there is no reason to belittle what Tito has actually done, and on the other hand, there is no need to exaggerate.

It is, indeed, unfortunate that the American people have been led to believe by releases of the Office of War Information and with statements of so-called facts which appear to support their contentions that Tito is the "whole show" in the Yugoslav opposition to the Nazis and that he has the unqualified support of the people of Yugoslavia.

It is reasonably clear, however, to anyone who takes the time to examine the facts, that Tito's activities against the Nazis have been grossly misstated—small skirmishes were exaggerated into great campaigns—small bands of partisans were exaggerated into great armies, negligible hit-and-run raids against minor villages and uninhabited places were exaggerated into great military triumphs, and the passage of a handful of partisans through some tiny village was exaggerated into the imaginary capture of hundreds of great towns and thousands of miles of territory.

In fact, there is still fresh in our memory the reports released through the Office of War Information from time to time as to how Tito had invaded Hungary, Austria, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Italy—of all these reports, the only one that now bears the faintest semblance of truth is the report that Tito invaded Italy. We now know it was not at the head of a victorious army, but as a refugee under the shelter of American and British arms, a leader who deserted his followers after a few hundred German paratroopers landed in their midst and captured two-thirds of his men; then by some means, the so-called great Tito was able to escape, leaving a greater portion of his followers to be either killed or captured by the Germans.

The only explanation for the wild exaggerations of Tito's activities against the foe and the withholding of news from the American people as to the true situation in Yugoslavia is the desire of the O. W. I. to play ball with those who are charged with the responsibility of dishing out propaganda as to the British foreign policies. All that the American people know of what has been going on in Yugoslavia are through releases of the O. W. I., which come to us principally from London, or from Cairo and Bari—all three of which are centers of British control and British censorship.

It is indeed most significant that when the United Press attempted to send one of their correspondents to Yugoslavia at the invitation of General Mihailovich so that the American public could obtain direct information, that the British detained the United Press correspondent in Cairo for 3 months until the United Press abandoned the effort in exasperation.

It is equally significant that when two correspondents were sent from Cairo to Yugoslavia, that they were John Talbot, representative of Reuter's, the semiofficial British news agency, and Stoyan Pribicevich, Life and Time magazines correspondent who had for over 2 years been one of Tito's leading propagandists in this country, and, incidentally, Talbot and Pribicevich were sent not to both General Mihailovich's and Tito's headquarters in Yugoslavia, but only to Tito's headquarters.

General Mihailovich, as commander in chief of the Yugoslav armies, has extended repeated invitations and requested that Allied correspondents be permitted access to his headquarters and to the Yugoslav territory which he controlled, but to no avail. These facts tend to impress the fair-minded observer that a deliberate effort has been and is being made to obscure and minimize the efforts of the duly designated field commander of the legitimate Yugoslav Government, while, at the same time, false propaganda is being spread for the purpose of building up Tito's prestige.

We know what has happened since the exposure of the Tito hoax. Even now, the new Yugoslav Premier, who was recently appointed by King Peter under British pressure, continues to negotiate with the discredited Tito in Bari, Italy, with a view to saving Tito's prestige and position.

We note that the new Yugoslav Premier, Dr. Ivan Subasic, himself is unable to obtain the support of the Yugoslav people. We note that for more than a month he has been attempting to form a cabinet and that none of the political parties of Yugoslavia will permit their representatives to enter that cabinet.

Who is Dr. Subasic whom Churchill has forced upon King Peter? One of the most significant answers is provided by The Bulletin, published by the Communist pro-Tito propaganda machine in the United States, which even before—and after—his appointment as Premier carried his name as an honorary member.

Recently a United States military mission returned to the United States from Yugoslavia. This mission was comprised of two American Army officers who spent 6 months with General Mihailovich. The American officers were able to make first-hand inspection tours of areas comprising about three-fifths of the territory of Yugoslavia, all under the control of General Mihailovich.

I understand on reliable advices that the American military mission reported that General Mihailovich obviously had the support of the Yugoslav people in their fight against the Nazis, that he was energetically opposing the enemy in the field and harassing the Nazis throughout the length and breadth of that unfortunate land.

There is more than an inference that the report of the American military mission has been suppressed because when a request was made on the floor of this House that the two American officers who had spent more than 6 months with General Mihailovich in Yugoslavia be summoned to testify and render a report to the Military Affairs Committee of the House, both officers were cautioned against speaking on the subject, and one of them was almost immediately thereafter transferred to duty in China. The fact that these officers were not permitted to testify and the circumstances surrounding the suppression of their report as to General Mihailovich's activities, whereas the O. W. I. has been consistently issuing releases as to Tito's activities and his prestige should be explained to the Congress and the American public.

The surprise raid of a few hundred German parachutists with one pin thrust completely exploded the Tito hoax and myth, and has demonstrated that the "Partisan army" of 300,000 is a fantasy of someone's fevered imagination, and it follows that the alleged "liberation" by Tito of thousands of miles of Yugoslavia is one of this war's tremendous lies which has been broadcast to the American public by the O. W. I. for the purpose of building up Tito's prestige and his communistic following.

The true facts expose the real situation in Yugoslavia—that the majority of the people of Yugoslavia do not support the partisans and that Tito does not have the support of the Yugoslav people.

Why, then, does the American Government policy, complaisant and compliant under British pressures which cannot bear open and honest scrutiny permit itself to be used to foist an odious Communist regime upon an unwilling people and to force Tito down their throats?

Why, also, does a compliant American foreign policy, tied as a tail to a British kite, permit the idealistic motives of the American people in this war to be twisted and perverted by the ruthlessness of power politics of other nations into serving ends that the American people, if they knew the truth, would never sanction?

Now that the Tito hoax has been exploded, is there some other reason why we continue to permit the American people to be misled as to what is really going on in Yugoslavia? And why does the United States find it necessary to abandon the valiant General Mihailovich, under whose leadership the brave fighting men and women of Yugoslavia have been fighting the Nazis since their country was invaded?

If there is any reason why our Government should cast aside General Mihailovich, the American people have a right to know what it is. If there is none, we have no reason to permit the continuing betrayal of the Yugoslav people and their Government-in-exile at the behest of the secret policy of another nation. The situation involves the honor of our Government's foreign policy, based upon the provisions of the Atlantic Charter, and in the coming days of peace may affect our own national interests.

This is an all-out war effort—we should give every assistance to all of our allies because they are fighting the Germans and every effort that is being put forth against the Germans—it matters not how small it may be—will save the lives of American fighting men. The people in the occupied countries—Poland and Yugoslavia—cannot fight barehanded—they must have supplies and materials, and when our support is withdrawn from these recognized governments, the war effort is being handicapped. The eyes of the people of Poland and Yugoslavia are turned towards America for aid and assistance—they are depending upon America to bring about their deliverance—yet with more than 4 years of warfare behind them, they have not had delivered to them supplies and materials. It is true that the underground in both Poland and Yugoslavia are doing excellent work in harrassing the Germans and sabotaging their military machine, but they could do far better work if they were given supplies and materials, and despite the many promises, they are becoming disallusioned because the supplies and materials promised have not been forthcoming. I am at a loss to understand why, and, in my opinion, the Congress and the American people should be given an explanation.

Challenge in Tennessee to the Republican Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Captain Lowe, of Knoxville, Tenn.:

Tennessee has a glorious history. Heretofore our citizens have assumed leadership in the affairs of the National Government. Business interests because of T. V. A. influence and the general awakening to the industrial value of the South are beginning to locate manufacturing plants within our boundaries. We sprang from and were reared by the purest American stock. We are expected to lead in formulating policies for the democratic way of life. Also this is a time when subversive interests are seriously challenging our democracy and when New Dealism and Government bureaucrats are talking about the outmoded "horse and buggy days."

We have just passed through a period which is fast leading us toward a socialistic Government.

Such is the view of Malcolm McDermott, a lifelong Democrat, former dean of the University of Tennessee Law School, and now dean of the Law School at Duke University, when he said in a condensation of a speech delivered in the fall of 1943 before members of the North Carolina bar:

"We are having foisted upon us national socialism, that is none other than the German system of government."

Dean McDermott points out in his speech that while delivering lectures in Germany he closely studied the German system and points out 12 steps in governmental activities which brought on socialism in Germany and then proceeds to say in substance that our Government has taken the most of these socialistic steps. If his conclusions are correct, unless we soon stop these trends, we will also become a socialistic nation which would swallow up the common man and make us all slaves to a system that we do not want.

The Democratic Party is responsible for these socialistic trends. It has sent swarms of New Deal carpetbaggers to meddle into our purely local affairs. Government agents and bureaucrats legislate, regulate, order, and direct.

This socialistic New Deal party organization is supported and partly kept in power by the Tennessee New Deal party, which is owned and directed body and soul by a political dictator. This dictator has the power to, and does, crush all effective oppositions in the party, much to the disgust of the rank and file. The Democratic Party in Tennessee has lost to the New Deal political dictators and bureaucrats, its soul and will to fight.

The Tennessee dictator has made it necessary for the citizens desiring to continue constitutional government to support the Republican Party if they expect to get relief. These citizens are hopeful that the Republican Party will accept the challenge and make a vigorous campaign. The State is one place where these socialistic trends can be defeated.

The independent voter, the real American in Tennessee needs, can have, and should have, a party in power that has a practical program which will save democracy, save free enterprise, and save individual initiative, and, at the same time, meet the needs of the people.

Our way of life is at the crossroads, one road leading to democracy, the other to socialism. Whatever has been the previous attitude of the Republican Party, they cannot now afford to be timid. Our citizens cannot be timid when democracy is in the balance.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men.
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and misery.
On such a full sea are we now afloat;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures."

John Sevier was not timid when our way of life was threatened.

George Washington was not timid when our way of life was threatened.

Andrew Jackson was not timid when our way of life was threatened.

Will Republicans be timid when our way of life is threatened?

We are in the middle of a change and unrest.

We are about to enter into the post-war period when currents of thought and action will be clashing, sometimes involving individual or group security which if not soberly and intelligently but emphatically handled, may entirely change our way of life.

If these different currents of thought and action are to be fused into a progressive, unified program, the next Government must be directed by men who through experience can sense and understand the way our people feel about their individual and group problems which are different, depending upon the different circumstances surrounding their rearing and the duties of their daily activities.

Those gains made in recent years which meet the needs of the people and improve the American way of life must not be discarded or abandoned. We all realize that government should progress, that we need to make many new improvements, but we do insist that while making these improvements it is not necessary to destroy free enterprise, individual personality, or the American way of life.

The Republican Party, if it expects to win, must be able to sense the change in the philosophy of our citizens returning from the battlefield. "There are no atheists in fox holes." The same stimuli that prompts this statement also causes the soldier to see through the sham in many of our practices. They are impatient with the greediness and selfishness and with the amateurish way of practicing the Golden Rule. Their experience of being face to face with death brings a new and deeper concept of the meaning of life. The soldier gets a new meaning for brotherly love, service, and cooperation for progress. If their problems of readjustment are approached with understanding, their reentrance into civilian life can be made easier and their experience more valuable to the state.

The Republican Party, if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the problems of the farmer during the transition or change from an agricultural to an industrial society. The farmer loses his employees to industry because of higher wages. He must pay high prices for machinery and commodities to satisfy his daily needs. For these he needs cash. He is all tangled up in reports and directives. He longs to be let alone.

The Republican Party if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the relative value of a school teacher as compared with other vocations of life, their yearning for an adequate program to abolish illiteracy in Tennessee, and their disappointment because of our low standing in educational circles.

To the child, the teacher is the hero or heroine. What the teacher says goes, even over what the parents say. Proper child training requires a teacher well trained professionally. The school teacher feels the injustice of providing social security for other walks of life but no retirement system for teachers.

The Republican Party, if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the indignant feeling of an employer who must employ some people whose primary interest is putting in the time and drawing a check instead of doing a good job. Many feel rebellious to a system which encourages a standardization of work instead of one which encourages in each individual a desire to achieve as much as possible. The business executive has no hours. His staying in business depends upon production and service. He feels he is considerate of his employees and pays many of them more than they are worth. He is worried and harassed by many of his employees, the Government administrative agencies, and red tape. He lies awake at night trying to devise ways and means to stay in business, to continue to pay his faithful employees and satisfy a group of stockholders and a board of directors who demand profits. He longs for the freedom from worry and the physical strain which in many instances cause premature death.

The Republican Party, if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the anxiety and the worry of the small businessman over his future prospects. He is now hampered and hamstrung with reports, regulations, and directives, which he does not understand. It must believe that the future of democracy depends upon the independent small businessman and that his prosperity is of paramount importance.

The Republican Party, if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the soul of labor organizations and labor leaders who strive to make it possible for laborers to obtain the necessities of life for themselves and children. These leaders want the children of laborers to have an equal opportunity for an education. They want the laborer to have some reasonable security from want during unemployment, accidents, sickness, and old age. The laborer wants a reasonable amount of time for recreation and self-improvement. He feels the sting of his economic instability.

The labor movement feels that it represents a large block of our citizens and that it should have effective representatives in the formation and execution of governmental policies, much in the same manner as other groups now have.

The Republican Party, if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the feeling of the criminal and know something of the causes of crime. He should know the feeling of a man who tries to keep up with the Joneses, who tries to keep the respect of his neighbors but, because of his inability to cope with our economic system in the orthodox way, through weakness, seeks a short cut by unsocial acts in order to reach his goal. Our scientific knowledge should be utilized to rehabilitate the criminal, both for his own good and for the protection of society.

The Republican Party, if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the anxiety and worry from trying to rear children in a society where they are many times tempted beyond their ability to overcome. Those who have tossed on a bed at midnight and wondered where was their boy or girl, know how parents yearn for wholesome environment and recreational centers.

The Republican Party if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the deep desire and determination of all our citizens in whatever group or economic level, to preserve democracy as we know it, the capitalistic system and free enterprise. No one wants more than just compensation in proportion to his ability, his energy expended and services rendered. Given equal opportunities with a minimum of security, we are willing to accept personal responsibility for our status.

The Republican Party if it expects to win, must believe in the ability of our people when properly informed, to govern themselves.

The Republican Party if it expects to win, must demonstrate it has the ability to sense the willingness of our people to fully cooperate and endure anything to win the war and at the same time sense the yearning of the people for the influence of the State in helping obtain modification of unfair regulations and directives now sometimes imposed upon some of our citizens. The party must sense the desire of our people for the help of the State in movement to return after the war to a fair and understanding democracy.

Only such an understanding can successfully chart a program through the changes now taking place and the post-war problems which will preserve free enterprise, individual initiative, and democracy, all of which all of us are willing to defend to death.

The independent voter in Tennessee wants the opportunity to vote for a party which cares for our way of life, and which has a practical progressive program that dignifies personality, has an unshakable belief in the supremacy of the right, and the determination to see it through.

The independent voter—and these are votes upon which the Republicans must depend for election—want a candidate who is capable of and will pitch his claim upon issues transcending party politics. Good American citizens realize the issues are too fundamental, and too serious to be handled through the narrow vision of any group, be it a political organization or otherwise.

The issue is: Socialism or democracy; rule by dictators or the people.

Citizens may think we Republicans are weak, but the issues require that we take long chances. "Let us then be up and doing with a heart for any fate." Will inaction make us stronger? By quitting will we be stronger? When will we be stronger? Not when the New Deal has finished sending great swarms of agents to meddle into our every activity of life. Not when bureaucratic government has enslaved us. Not after inch by inch our individualism has been destroyed. Not when free enterprise is destroyed. Not when a bureaucratic government directs our daily activities. Not when socialism has us by the throat and choked out our will to fight.

We are not weak if we make use of our God-given right as a citizen. Armed with the righteous cause of democracy we can succeed. A retreat means submission to socialistic slavery. God forbid that American citizens would take this lying down.

The battle does not go to the side with the greater numbers. It goes to the vigilant, to the energetic, to the strong willed, to the right side. God still directs the destinies of men. Being in the right, I, for one, have absolute confidence that ways, which at the beginning are not discernible, to bring about victory will appear as we go along.

Republicans of Tennessee we must realize that we are now face to face with an opportunity to save the American way of life. There is no other group willing to carry the banner. Where does the individual American citizen stand; for New Dealism or Americanism? What are individual Republicans willing to do that democracy may be preserved?

A small amount of work upon the part of each Republican or each citizen in Tennessee, would bring tremendous dividends—save us from slavery. Are you willing to do the work necessary to inform every citizen in Tennessee of the issues and the result of failure? Are you willing to assume the responsibility imposed upon you as a citizen in a democracy?

What would the soldiers at Runnymede do if they stood where you stand today, with an opportunity to accomplish so much by doing so little?

What would our forefathers do if they stood where you stand today, with an opportunity to accomplish so much by doing so little?

What would the soldiers of the Revolutionary Army do if they stood where you stand today, with an opportunity to accomplish so much by doing so little?

What would the soldiers of the Blue and the Gray do if they stood where you stand today, with an opportunity to accomplish so much by doing so little?

What would our soldiers in England, in Africa, in the Pacific, in every place in this global war do if they stood where you stand today, with an opportunity to accomplish so much by doing so little?

We know what they would do. They would work until every citizen in Tennessee knew the issues of this campaign. They would know that democracy had a chance. They would have the will and determination which brings success.

What will we do with our opportunities? In proportion as we love our democracy, as we love the American way of life, as we love our families, let every Tennessee citizen resolve to give every spare moment from now until the election in the interest of democracy. In this battle for democracy and free enterprise against New Deal socialism we must do our best or the forces of socialism and destruction will break through and the battle will be over.

In the face of such fundamental issues, we Republicans dare not be afraid. We dare not hesitate. In the words of Mordecai when he challenged Esther to save her people, the individual voter challenges the Republicans of Tennessee to save our people when they say, "Who knoweth but thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this."

Review of Out of Debt, Out of Danger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include with my remarks herewith a review of my book Out of Debt, Out of Danger, which appeared in the June 1944 issue of Land and Home, the official publication of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference:

A splendid critical analysis on a much controverted governmental problem—National Financing. Not only is a readable and wholly satisfactory history of our national debt delineated, but also is lucidly exposed the complex ramifications of the workings of the Federal Reserve Banking System. That this system has aided, abetted, and increased our national debt is clearly proven; that it should be replaced by a system of coinage in the hands and under the direction of Congress where the Constitution properly and rightfully puts it, follows with inexorable logic.

Thus by history and by destructive and constructive criticism, Congressman VOORHIS admirably accomplished the threefold purpose of his book: (1) To show that it is wrong for the Government to borrow money by "selling" interest-bearing bonds to banks in return for demand-deposits credits newly created upon their books for the express purpose of purchasing these bonds; (2) to show what can be done to keep down very substantially the increase in the interest-bearing public debt; (3) to show how the public debt can and ought to be reduced after the war.

Supplying Civilian Goods to Liberated Italy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave granted to me, I am including in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following letter which I received from the Honorable Leo T. Crowley, Administrator of the Foreign Economic Administration, relative to the work done by the Army in supplying civilian goods to liberated Italy.

It is to be noted that the supplies which have been sent by the Army command have been sent as a result of its military operations. Liberated Italy has not yet had extended to it the benefits of the Lend-Lease Act and it is obvious that the early designation of liberated Italy as a lend-lease country will go a long way oward improving the plight of the Italian people.

It is sincerely hoped that conditions will soon be such as to justify the early designation of liberated Italy as a lend-lease country.

The letter follows:

FOREIGN ECONOMIC ADMINISTRATION,
OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR,
Washington, D. C., May 29, 1944.

Hon. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI,
House of Representatives.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CAPOZZOLI: I am writing you in response to your request to Mr. E. E. Hunt, Chief of the Italian Division, for information concerning civilian supply in Italy.

The primary responsibility for supplying civilian goods to Italy rests with the Army. The F. E. A. has a staff which assists the Army in planning and to some extent in the procurement of needed supplies. I have taken a deep interest in the economic aspects of the Italian situation, and, in December, I sent a mission to Italy to report to me on conditions there. To date, quantities of flour, meat, cheese, sugar, milk, medical supplies, and clothing, some soap, some newsprint, and a few other miscellaneous supplies have been sent from the United States to Italy for civilian consumption. Other supplies, including fuels, have been sent from the United Kingdom. I understand that the food problem has been quite acute as a result of the extreme disorganization of the internal economy of Italy caused by Fascist maladministration and military operations, and a harvest which was smaller than anticipated. However, I believe every effort is now being made to bring in the essential minimum needed.

The exact quantities of food and other supplies shipped are confidential since they tend to reveal the amount of shipping available and the success of our supply lines. If you want the exact figures you might request them from Maj. Gen. John H. Hilldring, head of the Civil Affairs Division of the War Department who will be able to supply you with whatever information is no longer restricted as a military secret.

The responsibility for civilian affairs in Italy is concentrated in the Allied Control Commission, a joint British and American organization subject to the theater commander, which advises and supervises the activities of the Italian Government. Requests for essential supplies for the Italian civilian population originate in the Allied Control Commission and are referred through military channels to the United States or Great Britain. The American share of the supply responsibility is borne principally by the Army in accordance with the President's letter to the Secretary of War dated November 10, 1943. The bulk of the necessary supplies, including such important items as food, and medical and sanitary supplies, are procured and paid for directly by the Army out of Army appropriations as a measure of military necessity. With respect to certain other items which to date have been of lesser importance, the Army has requested the F. E. A. to make procurement. To finance these purchases, which so far have not reached any substantial dollar volume, the F. E. A. uses funds which were made available by the last Lend-Lease Appropriation Act for the needs of liberated areas. It should be noted that all that F. E. A. does in this connection is to act at the request of the Army and to make purchases on the basis of requisitions submitted by the theater commander.

The total value of the American share of civilian supplies provided to date, exclusive of these minor F. E. A. purchases, is in the neighborhood of $75,000,000. When these supplies arrive in Italy they are paid for in lire by Italian distributors or by the Italian Government.

Although the benefits of the Lend-Lease Act can be extended to foreign governments engaged in common struggle against the enemy, Italy has not yet been designated a lend-lease country, and is therefore not entitled to the benefits of the Lend-Lease Act. The supplies which we send there are requested and controlled by the Army command as part of its military operations.

Sincerely yours,

LEO T. CROWLEY,
Administrator.

Emergency Medical Service of New York City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave granted to me, I am including in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter which I received from one of my constituents, Dr. O. I. Bloom, relative to the efficient work performed by the emergency medical service in New York City in connection with a recent incident in that city, in which nearly 500 people were overcome by chlorine gas.

I agree with Dr. Bloom that the results achieved by the emergency medical service in New York City, in connection with the named incident, speaks volumes for the patience exercised by the members of that service in the frequent practice drills which it had undergone since its establishment.

Dr. Bloom's letter follows:

NEW YORK, June 19, 1944.

Hon. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The recent incident in New York in which nearly 500 people were overcome by chlorine gas from a leaking cylinder will be, we hope, the closest that our country will ever get to an enemy attack from the air. Yet the incident served as a demonstration of how well our great city is prepared for such an enemy attack.

Within a few minutes after the leak was detected and struck its first victims, the emergency medical service of the city of New York was mobilized and in action. Doctors, nurses' aides, stretcher bearers, and ambulances were at the scene of the incident; every affected individual received first aid and about 400 were taken to hospitals. With the cooperation of the other protective services of the city, the incident was handled with a smoothness and dispatch that were the results of scores of practice drills which the service had undergone since its establishment. The fact that no deaths resulted from this incident is a tribute to the emergency medical service which was organized before Pearl Harbor and which has been brought to its present peak of perfection under the continuous direction of the Honorable Edward M. Bernecker, M. D., commissioner of the department of hospitals of the city and chief of its emergency medical service.

Very truly yours,

O. I. BLOOM, M. D.

Fair Employment Practice Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. SCANLON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SCANLON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the statement made by me before the House Labor Committee in support of my bill, H. R. 3986, to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry.

Chairman NORTON, gentlemen of the committee, I am appearing before you today in behalf of H. R. 3986, a bill which I introduced in the Congress. This bill prohibits discrimination in employment because of race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry. This is the first time the committee has had before it the unlimited opportunity to make plain to the American people that a man's race, creed, color, or where he came from has nothing to do with whether he will be allowed to earn a living.

There are nearly 1,000,000 Negroes in the Army, Navy, and Marines. The men on Bataan were largely of Mexican origin from Arizona and New Mexico. The first heroes of our war were of many religions, colors, and national origins. Their names tell the story dramatically. We all remember Kelly, Levin, Gentile, and Dorie Miller. If our returning servicemen, who fought side by side with these heroes, are barred from jobs because of color, religion, or national origin, what a hollow thing our victory will be.

If there is any more vicious denial of American democracy than discrimination in jobs because of a man's race, creed, or color, I cannot imagine what it is. The only thing worse than discrimination against a man because he belongs to a union is discrimination because a man is a Negro, a Jew, a Catholic, or because his ancestors came from another country. This gnawing evil is a slap in the face to every decent American who believes in American fair play. The Supreme Court, in the case of New Negro Alliance v. Sanitary Grocery Co., in 1938, said:

"The desire for fair and equitable conditions of employment on the part of persons of any race, color, or persuasion, and the removal of discrimination against them by reason of their race or religious beliefs is quite as important to those concerned as fairness and equity in terms and conditions of employment can be to trade or craft unions or any form of labor organization or association. Race discrimination by an employer may reasonably be deemed more unfair and less excusable than discrimination against workers on the ground of union affiliation."

The man who spoke for the Supreme Court in those words was Mr. Justice Owen J. Roberts, who can certainly not be called a radical.

On 23 different occasions in the last 10 years, the Congress of the United States has outlawed racial and religious discrimination in legislating for public-works projects, the Civilian Conservation Corps, unemployment relief, civil service classification acts, the training of civilian aircraft pilots, the National Youth Administration, the Selective Service and Training Act, the training of defense workers, the building of public works necessary to the defense program, and the Cadet Nurses Corps for Government and civilian hospital service.

This is the time for the Congress of the United States to say to the people of America that their Government guarantees their right to jobs, regardless of their color, race, or their form of divine worship. This is the time to say to the world that we in America mean what we say when we tell them that this is a land of opportunity in which a man can go as far as his ability can carry him. This is the way to show the people of the world that we practice what we preach. Unless and until we guarantee by law that a man's ability is his only restriction, just so long will everyone hold extreme reservations about our real democracy.

Everyone knows that today, as in the past, large groups of Americans are prevented from earning a decent living and improving themselves solely because their skin is dark or their forefathers came from overseas or they worship God in different ways. This is the situation my bill is designed to change.

My bill, H. R. 3986, has 16 sections. Section 1 sets forth its findings and declaration of policy. Namely, that the Congress finds that discrimination in employment because of race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry foments domestic strife, prevents full use of manpower, and burdens interstate commerce; and that it is the national policy to eliminate such discrimination in employment relations, subject to the control of the Federal Government.

Section 2 provides that the right to work without discrimination is a constitutional privilege and immunity which cannot be abridged by any State.

Section 3 defines the unfair employment practices which are the heart of the bill. Employers are forbidden to discriminate against any person because of his race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry with respect to the hire, tenure, or terms and conditions of his employment. Labor unions are likewise forbidden to refuse membership and otherwise to discriminate against any person because of his race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry. Both employers and labor unions are forbidden to discriminate against any person because he has filed a charge, testified, or assisted in any proceeding or because he has opposed a discriminatory employment practice.

Section 4 defines the scope of the bill, the jurisdiction covered by the bill. This bill applies to any employer who employs more than five persons and who is engaged either in interstate commerce or in performing work under a contract or subcontract with a United States agency. It applies also to any labor union having five or more members in the employ of one or more employers subject to the act.

Section 5 of the bill creates the Fair Employment Practice Commission, composed of seven members appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, for 7-year terms. The original seven members hold office for terms from 1 to 7 years. Each member receives $10,000 annually.

Section 8 provides that the personnel, books, records, and funds of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice, created by Executive Order 9346, are transferred to the new Commission. And section 9 provides that the Commission may investigate cases and conduct hearings anywhere in the United States or any Territory or insular possession thereof.

Section 10 sets forth the procedure by which the Commission handles cases. After a charge is filed alleging that an unfair employment practice has occurred the Commission will begin an investigation. If the investigation reveals that the charge is substantially true, and an informal adjustment cannot be made, the Commission may hold hearings at which all parties may produce evidence, issue orders based on the record of the hearing, and petition a United States Circuit Court of Appeals to enforce its orders.

In this respect the Commission would function in the same manner as other administrative agencies, such as the Federal Trade Commission, the National Labor Relations Board, and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Commission may take an appeal to the circuit court. The Commission may award back pay and compel the reinstatement or hire of employees, in the same way as the National Labor Relations Board.

Section 11 gives the Commission the power to administer oaths and compel by subpenas the attendance of witnesses or the production of evidence. These subpenas are enforceable in the Federal district courts. Under section 12 the Commission may issue rules and regulations, including those further defining its procedures, which become effective 60 days after transmission to Congress, unless Congress amends or nullifies such rules by appropriate legislation or adjourns within 10 days after their submission.

Section 13 requires all firms contracting with the United States to include in all their contracts a provision obligating the contractor and his subcontractors not to discriminate in employment. Unless the Commission directs otherwise, no contract may be awarded to any person found by the Commission to have violated the act for 3 years from the date of such finding.

Section 14 prohibits willful interference with agents of the Commission. Such interference is punishable by a year in jail or $5,000 fine, or both.

Section 15 sets forth the definitions of terms used in the act. Interstate commerce is defined to include commerce in the District of Columbia or any Territory.

Section 16 states that this act shall be known as the fair employment practice act.

This is a summary of my bill.

As you gentlemen know, there is presently in existence the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice, which was created under Executive Order 9346 a year ago. The F. E. P. C. was first set up in June 1941, and for the past 3 years has been buffeted about from pillar to post. Since last August it has set up regional offices throughout the country. This marked the beginning of real operation of the agency. During the 10 months ending April 30, 1944, it has received 3,419 complaints, which, together which the 1,016 cases inherited from the former committee, made a total case load of 4,435 cases. During the 10-month period ending April 30, 1944, it has closed 2,286 cases. Of these, 879, or about 40 percent, have been classed as satisfactorily adjusted. Six hearings have been held. Its case load as of May 1, 1944, was 2,149.

All this represents a very creditable performance, for the agency has no power of any sort. Everything is done on the basis of persuasion. The F. E. P. C. has no subpena power and no enforcement powers. It cannot go to a Federal court for the enforcement of its directives. As a matter of fact, its directives are simply recommendations to the parties. When the parties refuse to follow the recommendations, the F. E. P. C. has only two courses of action open. It can recommend to other Federal agencies that certain privileges be denied to the violating party, privileges such as priorities. This it has never done. Even if it so recommended, these other agencies could simply refuse to follow the recommendation. Lastly, the F. E. P. C. can certify the case to the President. This it has done once, in the famous Southern Railroad cases. These were certified in December 1943. The matter was given by the President to a special commission to attempt to adjust the matter. This commission has held several meetings, but nothing has been announced in the way of adjustment.

Gentlemen, let's not deceive ourselves or the public. Without a statute carrying definite powers of investigation and enforcement, no agency can do much more than attempt informally to adjust ugly situations. If someone decides to ignore the Committee, there just isn't much that can be done about it.

What is needed to cope with this problem is a permanent agency backed up by a statute. It is the history of every administrative agency. Until the Congress passes such a statute, it is a mockery to say that the problem of discrimination in employment is really being tackled.

One word more. This bill has nothing to do with racial equality or social equality. It simply says that all people must have an equal opportunity, according to their abilities, to work for their living regardless of their race, color, creed, national origin, or ancestry.

I ask you gentlemen to report this bill to the House with a recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. Dooley, the Supreme Court, and the Electoral College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared in the June 21 issue of the Chicago Times:

Mr. Dooley once observed that the Supreme Court decisions "follow the election returns." Whether or not that's true, Americans insist that presidential electors at least should do so. Democratic procedure requires that.

Will the coming Presidential election be an exception?

Threats by southern Democrats, notably in Texas and Mississippi, have raised that question. The threats boil down to this: Unless the "rebel" southerners get their way at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago next month, their electors will ignore the party nominees and vote for two other persons. They might even vote for the Republican nominees. Or they might vote for persons not even mentioned at this time for President or Vice President. They could cast their votes in the electoral college so that no candidate would obtain a majority, thus throw the election into Congress. Then the House of Representatives would elect the President and the Senate would elect the Vice President. The people would be left in the cold.

A good many Americans, who believe that the people elect the President, undoubtedly will be shocked to discover that the Constitution permits such flouting of the will of the voters. For technically and legally the people have no direct voice in electing their President. The closest the people come to choosing their top officials legally is to express their preference for a set of State electors, who do the actual voting for President and Vice President. If the electors decide to ignore the popular vote, then all the people do is to select proxies to act for them. Most proxies follow the instructions of their principals—those who chose them. But if the Texas-Mississippi idea prevails, the proxies, or agents, would be bigger than the principals.

FOUNDERS DIDN'T TRUST THE PEOPLE

It is not accident that the electors legally may exercise independent judgment. Our founding fathers—not all of whom had confidence in the collective wisdom of the people to shape their own destiny—definitely intended that the people should not choose the President or Vice President. It was argued that the people could not be expected to be sufficiently informed, because communities were isolated and communication was slow in the early days of the Republic. A candidate for President couldn't get around and make speeches everywhere.

Alexander Hamilton, in one of the Federalist papers, put the case this way:

"It was * * * desirable that the immediate election should be made by men most capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station and acting under circumstances favorable to deliveration. * * * A small number of persons, selected by their fellow citizens from the general mass, will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite to such complicated investigations."

Hamilton also argued that choosing a President by action of a small group of electors, rather than by direct vote of the people, would make for less tumult.

Actually, this scheme was never effective. In the first two national elections, Washington was the unanimous choice for President. Later, political parties grew up and the electors came to be considered mere figureheads, who automatically fulfilled the wishes of their respective parties. For the democratic spirit began to grow.

Does the country want to return to the Hamiltonian theory, by which a President would be selected by proxy? That would mean, of course, a retreat from democracy.

It's our opinion that the southern Democrats who are toying with this idea would be better advised to abandon their scheme. We do not believe that the people of the South will want to be thus disenfranchised. For if they cast their votes for the Democratic candidates, they have a right to expect that those votes will be counted. And other Americans have the right to expect the same thing.

One good result should flow from this situation. This is the launching of an overdue movement for amending the Constitution so that it will conform with what has been custom for 150 years. In this case, at least, the written Constitution should be brought into line with our unwritten law. For our unwritten law, which decrees that the electors shall follow the election returns, is part of the American system as it has developed since Hamilton's day.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a splendid song entitled "Our President," written by William C. Gould, Sr., of Dorchester, Mass.:

OUR PRESIDENT

(Dedicated to F. D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, 1944)

Our President, now the head of our Nation,
Has thrice been tried and true
Who stands behind Old Glory
Our emblem, Red, White, and Blue.
Lend a hand to our great land
And back our President in his stand!

Listen to our President's plea
To keep America safe and free
Pray to God in Heaven above
To protect the land that we all love.

American people must all awake
For the cause of our freedom
Before it may be too late
To all mothers in their suspense
Who offer their sons for its defense
On land, in air, and on sea.

May our God in heaven guide this man
To keep invasion from our land.
May Congress give him their consent
For they, the people, represent
Justice and honor is all that he asks
Stand by our President in his great task.

When Most Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the San Francisco News of June 19, 1944:

WHEN MOST NEEDED

At the time when San Francisco and the bay area will need it most Congress kills the agency created by President Roosevelt last year to coordinate the work of all civilian Federal war activities. Known as the President's Committee on Congested Production Areas (a misleading and forbiddingly obscure name), the local branch set up here was most successful in ironing out tangles between the multifarious Federal agencies.

At that time they were stepping on each other's toes, quarreling over priorities, duplicating efforts, and all trying to win the war single-handed. Each was entirely sincere in its conception of its own importance. The coordinator was able to call their chiefs together, show them the whole picture, and persuade each to fit his individual activities into a concerted whole.

It worked. War effort flowed more smoothly thereafter and has continued to do so. Now Congress, claiming the committee no longer is needed, refuses new appropriations for its work. It dies June 30.

Unless some agency is set up to take its place, conditions in this busy area, becoming busier every day as the time for the final big push against Japan approaches, will revert to the chaos of a year ago. That will be unfortunate, possibly actually threatening to delay the day of victory.

We have no idea what can be done to fill its place. Possibly bureau chiefs, having learned the advantage to them of coordinated effort, could provide for continuation of some form of routine consultation with each other. Perhaps some one existing agency could take on the job of coordinator.

Something of the kind ought to be planned on a permanent basis in connection with post-war development of the bay area. Success of the Federal effort is the best argument for setting it up on a permanent civilian basis.

We commend the thought to State and municipal authorities who now are approaching the problems of bay-area industrial and economic integration.

Our Lot in Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Horace C. Carlisle:

OUR LOT IN LIFE

Two old oaken buckets once hung in the well
At opposite ends of the chain—
One made of existence a hideous hell,
And always rejoiced to complain:
"They send me back empty, each time I come up,
To dive to the depths of the well—
They pour from me always the last cooling cup,
And drop me back down to my hell."

"I, too, go back empty," the other replied,
But cheerfully sang he this hymn,
"As often as empty I bottomward ride,
I rise again full to the brim—
I'm happy to bring from earth's cisterns below
The thirst-quenching liquid of life,
Supremely essential to all things that grow
In this world of struggle and strife."

Thus daily these buckets hung there in the well,
In passing, to sing or complain—
One going to heaven, the other to hell—
At opposite ends of the chain—
Proclaiming a truth, too well known to deny,
That every man's pleasure or pain
Depends upon whether, when things go awry,
He's looking for loss or for gain.

Let's Do It Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MERLIN HULL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, it is encouraging to many Members of the House, as well as to millions of people throughout the country, that Discharge Petition No. 17 has been signed by over 200 Members. There is excellent prospect that the required number of 218 may be obtained before the proposed congressional recess for the national convention period. After the long wait of years, it now seems likely that the Townsend measure may be brought out of the Ways and Means Committee and submitted to the House for discussion and decision. To the millions of people who have been warmly advocating the Townsend plan, it has seemed strange that with months and years devoted to the discussion of social security, the rules of Congress have served to prevent even a committee hearing, as well as to prevent an opportunity to have the whole subject of old-age assistance taken up in the House and finally acted upon.

It is true that we are in the midst of a great World War, and that measures relating to that war are of paramount importance. But there are many domestic problems of importance which have been taken up and solved as we have included in congressional activities measures relating to relief and rehabilitation involving the expenditures of billions in foreign lands. Certainly, the time has come when the welfare of millions of our own people of advanced years should receive consideration. Let us hope that as soon as the recess is over the House will promptly take up the Townsend measure and as promptly act as liberally as we have upon U. N. R. R. A. and numerous other such broad programs.

Much has been said about the increased cost of living due to the war. The O. P. A. has been set up and millions spent to prevent inflation and protect the consuming public. Wage standards have been established in which the increased cost of living has been recognized.

Repeatedly the attention of Congress has been called to huge profits made by contractors and industries engaged in supplying our armed forces. Corporation profits generally have been steadily increased in the war period and continue to be. The plight of the white-collar workers is often referred to, and that of the farmers who maintain a wonderful record of production, notwithstanding shortage of help and lack of facilities, are of frequent discussion in the national press, as well as in Congress.

Still, the matter of an old-age pension plan has been held in abeyance while the hundreds of thousands of those receiving such assistance from the combined Federal, State, and county treasuries have been compelled to get along as best they could on their meager allowances. The high cost of living has affected them even more seriously than most others. It has compelled them to do less and less with the little they receive from the combined treasuries, each of which has been drawn upon heavily by the war and its costs.

Old-age assistance is a Federal problem, even more so than some of the plans at present in operation for foreign relief. Congress has been liberal with those of other countries, some of which are not directly connected with the war. It now should give its full attention to enacting into law a program for the aged and persevering people of our own land who in their prime contributed by their endeavors to the building of a Nation whose power is exemplified in the victories of our fighting forces on every front. A Federal old-age assistance program is an essential wartime measure, and action now may help to obviate its still greater necessity in the post-war plans. Let's do our full duty now.

Yes, Sir; I Do Peek Under the Bed, Mr. President; There Is Stuff There To See

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial by Ralph E. Oberholzer, from the Red Oak (Iowa) Express:

YES, SIR! I DO PEEK UNDER THE BED, MR. PRESIDENT, THERE IS STUFF THERE TO SEE

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am one of those who "sees things under the bed," one of millions to whom you referred in your press conference Tuesday.

You seem to laugh and scoff at those of us who are suspicious, superstitious, and afraid of New Deal goblins and ghosts. But fear is not so lightly put aside.

I've been seeing things under the bed since 1932—strange things which have caused insomnia and distraction. Funny boogy men have been changing my way of life with bold determined hypnotic regularity.

No longer do I have to look under the bed to get the shivers. Gremlins and dodo birds now roost on the bed posts because space under the bed is too crowded. New ghosts are out for all to see.

When I got the jitters in 1933 and took my first peek under the bed, you were there refusing to reduce expenditures 25 percent and refusing to curtail Government employees—a pledge which you had made.

Next time I took a look, there you were with N. R. A. and a program to regiment my family. You had a bible of fixed, top prices, that I had to assess against my customers or you proposed to send me to Leavenworth.

Again I peeked under the slats and this time you and some Harvard boys were planning to pack the Supreme Court with faithful adherents who would do your bidding, approve laws to your liking, regardless of their constitutionality.

This looking under the bed business became a chronic pastime. There was always something new there. One time your henchmen were with you, and you as President of all of us, set out to eliminate from Congress, and purge from your party, any man who had dared to stand against you and stand by his convictions. That looked like an upsurge against democratic government.

Under my bed I found you holding conclaves with leaf-rakers, outhouse builders, and wasteful spenders—then came 3,000,000 of your faithful admirers whom the taxpayers had to support on your machine pay roll.

One night I found the business-wrecking crew—the fellows who told me how much and how little I could pay my fellow workers—how short or how long they could work—who said they couldn't work unless they had a number—who demanded endless and multiple reports—who dared to tell God that the sun was rising at the wrong time, so they changed the clocks.

I peeked one time and saw HENRY WALLACE distributing a quart of milk to every Chinaman, Hottentot, and African and charging it all up to us Americans, or was that a dream?

On another look you were distributing $30,000,000,000 in gifts—you call it lend-lease—to good neighbors with no strings attached. That was our money. And there was gossip under the bed about us feeding and policing the whole world—quite a chore, even for goblins—yes; quite a bedtime story, too, that Winston had told you.

Believe it or not, Eleanor was there one time with a social-planning and communal-housing pipe dream that frightened the whole household. We all got on our knees to look at her. Her experiment was made, and it failed at our expense, but she rolls on nonchalantly.

There was the under-the-bed scene where you wanted to discard the office of Budget Director so there would be no accounting of funds—you and your pals could spend as you please—well, you do, anyway, for that matter. Congress has never voted a subsidy, yet you and your colleagues pay them out. How cum?

I caught Leon Henderson under the bed one night making plans to ruin American economy. What he started is still a hair-raising bedtime story in O. P. A. effrontery. Imagine a fair and square government severely penalizing its citizens for minor and innocent infractions. Imagine a democratic government hoarding things from its people in a land of plenty. Yes; there are Gestapos under the bed.

Don't tell me that Mr. Biddle wasn't under the bed last week boasting of your autocratic power. Mr. Biddle looked into the crystal and came up with this shocking statement: "The President has a great constitutional reserve of power"; and Biddle maintained that no business of any kind is immune from that power. That can mean only one thing—Presidential dictatorship.

At the same time an O. P. A. understudy was telling the United States Supreme Court that the President could take over any business in the land at any time for any cause. In plain words, the President and the "palace guard" are whatever they want to be, and the Attorney General's rulings are based on New Deal theories, not on constitutional government.

Yes, Mr. President; I've been seeing things under the bed. Your bedtime stories and Mr. WALLACE's lullabies do not remove the fears or relieve the insomnia. Eleanor keeps me awake, too.

I still peek under the bed—there is stuff to see. I'm afraid of the New Deal goblins, and admit it.

You've pulled the wool over my eyes; now pull the sheet over my weary head. Good night.

The Highway Grab

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. J. MONKIEWICZ

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MONKIEWICZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Hartford Courant of June 21, 1944:

THE HIGHWAY GRAB

Representative WILLIAM J. MILLER, of the First Connecticut District, on Monday fired the first gun in what may be protracted congressional battle over the formula to be used in apportioning Federal moneys among the States for the construction of highways. The proponents of changing the present formula so as to give more weight to traffic needs and less to area and road mileage lost their fight in the Roads Committee. Highway Commissioner William J. Cox, of Connecticut, has been among the leaders of the opposition to the present law, which is weighted in favor of the geographically larger States with a low density of population.

Under the bill as reported to the House, Connecticut taxpayers would contribute $36,295,000 annually toward post-war Federal aid highway construction, but the State's portion of the total fund would be only $11,595,000. Obviously it would be cheaper for Connecticut taxpayers to do their own roadbuilding without Federal aid, instead of contributing $2,487,000 to Texas, $1,111,000 to Georgia, $1,205,000 to Iowa, and various amounts to 31 other States, only 2 of which, Maine and Vermont, lie above the Mason and Dixon's line and east of the Mississippi River.

Congressman MILLER and Commissioner Cox are not altogether unalterably opposed to the principle of subsidizing other States. Their attack is directed primarily at the gross inequities that would prevail if the bill as reported is passed. That bill contains a provision that municipalities should share in a percentage of the funds allotted to the States. A few examples contrasting cities with about equal populations will show the soundness of the argument against the proposed measure: Bakersfield, Calif., $130,000—Reno, Nev., $4,400,000; Moline, Ill., $135,000—Fargo, N. Dak., $2,130,000; Medford, Mass., $140,000—Jackson, Miss., $1,780,000; Auburn, N. Y., $92,000—Albuquerque, N. Mex., $2,320,000. These are not isolated comparisons, they can be duplicated many times.

If this road bill should become law, it would represent the largest money steal through legislative sanction in the history of the Nation. The logrollers who have jammed through Congress notoriously indefensible river and harbor bills or tariff legislation would look like pikers when compared with the supporters of this program for Federal aid for roads. If the western and southern Congressmen have a reasonable sense of fair play, if they are not too earnestly concerned with buying votes with the money of eastern taxpayers, they will join with the Congressmen from the Eastern States in writing in the proposed legislation a fair formula.

Such a formula Commissioner Cox has proposed. Under it the Federal funds would be allotted on the basis of 30 percent for urban population, 30 percent according to motor-vehicle registrations, and 40 percent under the old formula that gives equal weight to area, population, and post-road mileage.

To this Federal-aid program for roads there is another aspect: This partially centralized authority over the country's highways may cost the taxpayers of Connecticut a cool $24,700,000 a year—the difference between what they contribute to the Washington pool and what they are handed back by the have-not-but-want-more States. Centralized government is expensive in more ways than one.

Preservation of Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, on the evening of June 22, over Station WMAL of this city and the blue network, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] delivered a most interesting and informative address on the subject Preservation of Freedom. I ask that the address may be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The American people are on the eve of the two most important political conventions—ever held in the history of this Nation—the decisions which will be reached—and, the results which will flow from these decisions, may well change the destiny of this Nation.

Out of one of these conventions, will come the leadership which will determine the course of the Ship of State.

The delegates to these conventions have been chosen by an intelligent, informed, and united citizenry who have placed in them their faith and trust. Will they assume that responsibility and select a leadership that will guide America aright in the stormy years that are to come?

The decision is now in their hands; it will determine whether we are to retain constitutional government—our free enterprise economy—and our free political society; or whether all that our heroic men and women, are fighting for—shall be lost here at home, after the conflict at arms has been won.

It is well to remember the words from the lips of Abraham Lincoln:

"This Nation was conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

The greatest of our liberties—is our freedom of speech. It underlies all honesty in Government—all freedom of worship—and provides our greatest antidote to every infection in the body politic.

In the exercise of this freedom lies our power, to redress grievances—to right wrongs—and to triumph over every threat and danger to our way of life.

In the exercise of this freedom lies the American traditional way, of resolving every crisis, by bringing out, even the gravest issues, into the light of day—out into the open—where we can talk them over, and determine our course of action.

It is for the future of this freedom that more than 10,000,000 American men—are carrying on—far and beyond the call of duty, on scores of battlefields on foreign fronts.

We whose lot it has been to participate, only indirectly in the war, marvel at the ingenuity, the energy, and the courage which have made our victories possible. At this very moment, after the first sharp thrust of invasion settles into the steady rhythm of a gigantic offensive, our admiration knows no bounds—and our gratitude no words.

We are on the road to victory. Winning the war is a nonpartisan job. It has been assumed by all loyal Americans without regard to party, race, or creed. It is high time that we give full credit to our armed forces, in whom we have all confidence. Our military leadership will carry the burden of the war just as efficiently, just as effectively, just as successfully under a Republican administration as under any other.

Our fighting men know, far better than we, how futile their striving would be, as an end in itself. They are sustained by a faith in their American heritage—which has found its way into the very blood that they are now pouring out on the altar of freedom. They have left with us the sacred task of guarding and protecting this heritage, looking unto us to keep it undefiled.

Our tasks—which they have placed squarely in our hands to complete—may turn out to be more difficult than theirs.

They are asking, "What are our peace aims? Why do we keep silent on foreign policy?"

What hope does the President hold out to our men who are now fighting and dying on the battle fronts that their most sincere prayers will be answered? What commitments have been made? Why does not this administration give our fighting men and all citizens the answers to these questions?

God help us if in this dark hour we continue to leave our people unenlightened or the suffering peoples of Europe without a future.

Our forces are fighting for peace and freedom for all peoples. They demand no less now—from their statesmen.

At the Mackinac conference the Republican Party provided a foreign policy. It was proclaimed throughout the world. It is no secret. It is not hidden. It is understandable. It has a practical approach and will assure a practical solution.

It has invited all Americans "to adhere to the principles here set forth to the end that our place among the nations of the world and our part in helping to bring about international peace and justice shall not be the subject of domestic partisan controversy and political bitterness."

It further provides "responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to attain permanent peace with organized justice in a free world" without overriding the sovereign rights of the American people.

Over the entrance to our Nebraska State Capitol is an inscription that runs something like this:

"The salvation of the State is in watchfulness of the citizen."

The dominant issue on the home front is whether our constitutional form of government will survive.

No more solemn warning was ever uttered than when Woodrow Wilson said:

"The history of liberty is a history of the limitation of governmental power, not the increase of it. When we resist, therefore, the concentration of power, we are resisting the processes of death because the concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties.'

Ours is the solemn duty of providing, in the next 4 years, a representative government that derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. This is our only hope against the threat of tyranny.

Under the guise of war emergency, we have traveled a long way down the road to dictatorship through bureaucratic control. Federal activities encroach on every phase of American life—in the roads we build; in the crops we plant; in the charity we dispense; in the goods we buy and sell; in the food we eat or would like to eat; in the taxes we pay—everywhere is the heavy hand of the Federal Government.

There are millions of our boys and girls, our young men and women, who have never known but one President. After 11 years, a totally alien concept of government has invaded the American way.

There are now scores of bureaus which have unlimited power over the purse strings of the Treasury, many of which are beyond the authority of the Government Accounting Office and certainly beyond the reach of Congress and the people.

During these years we have watched bitter attacks on our Supreme Court, undermining the authority of law.

We have watched government by legislation superseded by government by edict.

We have watched foreign influences infiltrate into bureau after bureau, until today the American people are confused, bewildered, and fearful of the future.

The changes that have been wrought are nowhere so well defined as in the words of President Roosevelt himself, who on January 3, 1936, warned the American people:

"In 34 months we have built up instruments of public power. In the hands of a people's government, this power is wholesome and proper; but in the hands of political puppets, of an economic autocracy, such power would provide shackles for the liberties of the people."

Certainly no one will deny but that this statement has come true in our beloved America.

In my work in the Senate I have heard heart-rending stories from harassed businessmen—from farmers beset with conflicting regulations and regimentation—from retailers squeezed between increased costs and lowered discounts—from manufacturers begging for material allocations.

Continued government by Executive order will surely crucify American industry and labor on the cross of bureaucracy.

Individuals and industry alike are saddled with a tax load unprecedented in the history of our Nation. None of us rebel at paying our full share of the cost of war, or of supplying the much-needed arms and equipment for our fighting forces. But we do object to the needless squandering of the people's money on extravagances—on nonessentials—and on inefficiency.

We also object to a global policy that buys foreign friendships with American dollars—and subsidizes foreign production at the expense of American enterprise. Such a policy and program can only mean a lowered standard of living—and this is something for labor to be thinking about.

The other course is clear. It appeals to men and women who refuse to be shackeled regardless of party affiliations. It means to Democrats and Republicans alike that they sound a warning to the New Dealers that they will not subjugate their independence to any individual or group. It means that they must throw off the yoke and walk out as freemen.

I have been steeped in the tradition of American freedom. Our forefathers left a heritage of loyalty to American ideals. They charged their sons to maintain love of country above all else, to continue the precepts laid down in the American Constitution. I can accept no alternative. I do not believe the American people want a substitute.

Fellow Americans, the Congress is but a reflection of your own hopes and your own fears. It represents your abilities, your successes, your shortcomings, and your failures. Congress is you, the people.

When the Executive fights the Congress, the Executive fights you; when the Executive attempts to override the Congress, then the Executive attempts to override you.

The strength of Congress is measured in exactly the same ratio as your own strength. The strength of congressional conviction is the strength that flows from the minds of the citizens of the United States. The Congress is all that stands between a free people and tyranny.

Our duty is to renew our faith in ourselves, in our American institutions, in our American form of government. Unless we adhere to those principles, we shall have failed to carry on the precepts of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness handed down by Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, and other patroits who placed love of country above personal gain or glory. That kind of leadership abounds in America, leadership that will promote the peace of the world and confidence and stability at home.

America has had a demonstration of an autocratic, centralized administration that has employed power politics. For America's sake, this continuity of power must be broken. We must re-create the American way of life.

The time has come for Americans to apply themselves to these problems with all the strength, courage, and intelligence at their command.

Are these conventions to be just political gala events where, behind the fanfare of bands and cheering, fateful decisions are made in smoke-filled rooms and delegates are told whom they shall choose?

Or will these conventions be held in keeping with the spirit of the men who are making the invasion? The delegates to these two political conventions hold America's future in the hollow of their hands. Their decisions demand American answers and American solutions.

God grant that they will have the courage to fulfill the trust that the American people have reposed in them as they choose the leadership that will guide America in the coming years, the most critical years in all American history.

Lake, Stay 'Way From My Door

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from a recent issue of the Chicago Tribune:

LAKE, STAY 'WAY FROM MY DOOR

Chicago officials who have been striving for years to increase diversion of Lake Michigan waters into their sewage-disposal canal undoubtedly are greeting gleefully the news from Milwaukee that an unusually high lake level there is damaging lake-front improvements.

The Chicago plea for increased diversion, supported by dire warnings of an incipient epidemic, always has run up against contentions of other Great Lakes port cities that further diversion would leave their docks high and dry. Federal controls now limit the volume of water which Chicago may take from the lake for sewage-disposal purposes.

A Federal beach erosion board visited Milwaukee a few days ago to determine what means of protection should be adopted to save Milwaukee's receding shore line, marked by crumbling sidewalks and lake-shore embankments protecting paved streets and lakeside buildings.

Can it be, Chicago diversionists may well ask, that Milwaukeeans will rally to the support of her Illinois neighbor's diversion plea as the best means of keeping her own shore line intact?

Monetary Stabilization Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES S. DEWEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. DEWEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement, which was published in the New York Times:

MONETARY STABILIZATION PLAN — DOUBT IS SHARED THAT CONGRESS WOULD APPROVE MORGENTHAU PROPOSAL

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The New York Times of today carries a strong editorial expressing doubt as to whether Congress would approve of the plan for monetary stabilization which Secretary Morgenthau proposes to advance at the forthcoming conference at Bretton Woods. We fully share that doubt. As yet we have to find a single member of the Republican Party (and our inquiries have been confined to the Republican Members) who approves of what he conceives to be Secretary Morgenthau's proposal.

We fully recognize the moral and practical responsibility of this Nation to participate in the reconstruction of the devastated countries. Such participation does not require an international stabilization fund at this time.

We further recognize that stabilization of currencies is an essential to the long-range continuance of foreign trade. Stabilization of currencies is, however, dependent on sound economies of the various nations; hence, stabilization is attainable only after reconstruction has been successful. A stabilization fund created at this time would surely be doomed to failure. Its only purpose now would be for furnishing reconstruction funds through an international pool, the great bulk of these funds coming from the dollars deposited therein. We prefer to retain control over those dollars.

We feel that the first step on our part should be the creation by the Congress of an American Reconstruction Fund under the supervision of an American Board of Directors, confirmed by the Senate, the fund to act separately or in joint account with foreign governments, individuals, or corporations, to extend or guarantee short-term and intermediate credits to finance seasonal operations, to provide for longer-term productive loans, and to make gold loans to furnish a basis for sound currencies; provided, however, that all such loans or credits are made in consideration of approved plans seeking to balance the budget of the recipient country.

The Montgomery Ward Incident

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me on the Montgomery Ward case, broadcast on June 10, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The strange case of Montgomery Ward & Co. is a mystery no longer.

Brushing the wisps of straw from his hair and reluctantly coming out from behind the cracker barrel of his "corner grocery" (gross sales in 1943—$600,000,000), that mistreated "unarmed storekeeper" from Chicago, Mr. Sewell Avery, launched his own private D-day invasion in Washington this week and disclosed everything.

Mr. Avery—and we have his word for it—is the innocent victim of a plot, a gigantic conspiracy to force Montgomery Ward to obey "an unfair and illegal" order by his Government not to impede the war effort. And who, in the midst of the most terrible war in history, is a party to this intrigue? Who, with the Nation straining to prepare an invasion which will decide the fate of the world, called "time out" to join this mighty cabal against a corner grocery?

We have Mr. Avery's word for that, too; the Post Office Department, the National Labor Relations Board, the War Labor Board, the Secretary of Commerce, the Attorney General, and the President of the United States.

That is Mr. Sewell Avery's story, and I am happy to say that he is stuck with it.

Fortunately, the truth of the Montgomery Ward case is neither mysterious nor obscure. It is a very simple, though not a very pleasant, story. It begins back in January 1942—a few weeks after Pearl Harbor—when American industry and American labor signed a "no strike-no lock-out" agreement on the basis of which the President established the National War Labor Board to make peaceful settlement of wartime labor disputes.

Of course, Montgomery Ward was not a party to this agreement, was not bound by any such silly nonsense. "Ward's had no voice in the selection of those who, as representatives of industry, attended the conference in December 1941," the company proclaimed in large newspaper advertisements a year later. "Ward's has never ratified the results of that conference."

Certainly not! The sovereignty of Montgomery Ward & Co. was at stake; and, war or no war, Mr. Sewell Avery would not submit differences with his employees to the machinery for peaceful settlement to which the rest of American industry was patriotically submitting and on which depended an uninterrupted flow of production and the successful prosecution of the war. The "corner grocery" had not "ratified" the agreement.

Adhering doggedly to this position that it was not bound by and therefore would not comply with the no strike-no lock-out agreement, Ward's in December 1943 notified the union in its Chicago plants that it would not recognize the union or negotiate the renewal of a collective bargaining agreement—already renewed for 1 year only at the direct request of the President of the United States—because, the company said, the union no longer represented the employees.

There must first, said Ward's, be an election among the employees to determine whether the union still represented them. Whereupon the War Labor Board directed the company to maintain the status quo—to continue the contract under which it had already operated for a year—for a period of 30 days to permit the National Labor Relations Board to settle the issue of representation by an election.

This Ward's refused to do. It refused to extend the agreement even for the limited period necessary to settle the matter of representation in an orderly and peaceful way. As a result, a strike was called in the Chicago plant of Montgomery Ward which employed approximately 6,500 persons.

There then came on April 5, 1944, a final directive order of the W. L. B.—joined in unanimously by the industry as well as the public and labor members of the Board—who condemned the company's wanton destruction of the status quo as unfair and as making impossible the conduct of a fair and orderly election.

Remember, this directive was signed unanimously, by all members of the War Labor Board—industry, labor, and public. It is perhaps significant, in this connection, to note Mr. Avery's insistence that the industry members of the W. L. B. do not truly represent American industry. They are, he says, "under pressure" to vote along with the labor and public members of the Board, and he, Mr. Avery, "could name better men."

The clear implication in this is that the position of Montgomery Ward & Co. represents the attitude of American industry toward unions, toward labor, and toward cooperation in the war effort. The clear implication in Mr. Avery's denunciation of the industry members of the War Labor Board is that Montgomery Ward, the one company in the United States which has refused to obey an order of the President as Commander in Chief, truly represents American industry.

But I digress. With Ward's sit-down strike against maintenance of the status quo, even for 30 days to permit an election, and with the calling of a strike by employees of the Chicago plant, the War Labor Board was faced with a serious situation. For a "corner grocery," Ward's is a tremendous establishment, with more than $600,000,000 annual sales to upward of 30,000,000 customers, many of them farmers who depend on mail-order houses for essential articles—farm equipment, machinery, supplies, electrical, heating and plumbing apparatus.

Furthermore, the War Labor Board believed that as a result of the strike and of the company's refusal to accept the orders of the Board, there was an immediate danger that strikes would break out in the other plants and facilities of the company elsewhere in the United States. Transportation unions in Chicago were refusing to make deliveries to or accept deliveries from the company plants there; and strikes did break out shortly in Ward plants at Kansas City, Mo., and Springfield, Ill.

Faced with this serious situation and with the obstinate refusal of Ward's to comply with its order, the War Labor Board certified the case to the President. The President, as he had done in a dozen or more cases—including 1,700 bituminous coal and anthracite mines—ordered Ward's Chicago plant seized and operated by the Government to assure an uninterrupted flow of production and no interference with the war effort.

We are all familiar with what happened then, with the ejection of Mr. Sewell Avery from his office—an incident which, by the way, Mr. Avery now admits he deliberately forced upon the Government to "dramatize" the situation. We are also familiar with Mr. Avery's pious declamation—echoed by a majority of the press and many radio commentators—that legal and orderly process demanded testing of the Board's order in the courts before resorting to actual seizure.

But it was the Government's position from the start—and it was so stated emphatically by the Attorney General—that directive orders of the War Labor Board were not reviewable by the courts and that the Government had, in fact, exhausted every peaceful and orderly process before resorting to seizure. This has been the Government's position from the beginning, a postion which recently was completely sustained by the courts.

At this point, I cannot refrain from noting that in a majority opinion a Senate Judiciary subcommittee—without calling witnesses or honoring the request of the Attorney General to appear—concluded that "the National War Labor Board had the right to seek, and the Board should have sought, a Federal court order" to enforce its directives against Ward's. In the subcommittee report the majority relied solely on a decision involving the Board and Ward's in the District of Columbia, ignoring two other court decisions clearly supporting the Government's position.

But the issue was decided on June 2—a week ago—in a decision handed down by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in the New England trucking company case. Unequivocally, the circuit court held that "it is clear and undisputed that no statute authorizes review of the War Labor Board's order. * * * The legislative history of the War Labor Disputes Act implies a positive intention that these orders should not be reviewed."

In its decision the circuit court examined the course of the War Labor Disputes Act through the Congress, noted that proposed amendments to authorize court enforcement or review of the Board's orders were rejected, and concluded that it was the obvious intention of Congress that the legislation did not authorize such applications to the courts. "No one," the court said, "could maintain either judicial or administrative proceedings against the appellants upon the authority of the Board's orders."

In short, as the Government has contended all along, the Federal courts have no authority to enforce directives of the War Labor Board.

There is another interesting thing about this opinion. The court answered the argument that the orders of the War Labor Board had to be reviewable, because if the order was not complied with the President might take over the plant involved. The court said: "Neither the broad constitutional power nor the broad statutory power of the President to take and use property in furtherance of the war effort depends upon any action of the War Labor Board." This was exactly what the Attorney General had argued.

For the record and for the benefit of my colleagues on the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee, I am going to make another point about this language. It expressly recognizes that the President has two kinds of power, both of them broad. One the power under the statute and another separate power under the Constitution. This was the same conclusion that the Attorney General reached in his opinion to the President.

This, then, is the "history" of the Ward case. Let me emphasize the word "history." It is important. It is important because it means that all these facts, all the "history" of the case up to and including the controlling opinion of the circuit court of appeals to which I have just referred, were fully known to Mr. Avery at the time this week he testified before the House committee investigating the Ward case.

Despite this fact, despite his full knowledge of the Court decision, Mr. Avery was still trying this week to put over on the public the completely discredited thesis that the Government could have obtained court review before seizing the Ward plant in Chicago, if it had "wanted" to.

It is as plain as a pikestaff that Mr. Avery wants to remain sovereign, that he does not intent to relinquish any of his "right" to do as he pleases regardless of the law, regardless of the public interest, and regardless of the war. Nothing short of that will satisfy him.

I believe that the whole fake controversy which Mr. Avery has conjured up—the phony cry for "court review" and the phony cry of "conspiracy"—is best described by Malcolm Bingay, of the Detroit Free Press, who said some weeks ago:

"To me it seems supremely asinine to contend that a government in wartime can take a man away from his family, his property, and his job to fight for his country and to give up his life—which no court or no act of Congress can restore to him—but it must not interfere with an angry old gentleman who wants to settle a private feud with a man named Roosevelt who happened to be President."

Wolves in Sheep's Clothing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. LEE O'DANIEL

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "Wolves in Sheep's Clothing," delivered by me before the Union League Club, at Chicago, Ill., on June 20, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The first thing I want to do in my talk today is to pay my respects to the "smear brigade," who for 10 years have sought to intimidate the American people. First they began by charging every man who did not believe in all the philosophies of the New Deal, with being economic royalists. In the second campaign they charged every man who opposed the New Deal with being opposed to the great principles of public welfare and with being opposed to doing anything in behalf of the great rank and file of the common citizens. In the third campaign the smear brigade charged every man who opposed the New Deal with being an isolationist. And today every man who opposes the New Deal is being smeared by these New Deal stooges and charged with being unpatriotic and interfering with the effort of America to win the war.

Well, now, you people who are listening to me know that all of these charges are nothing more or less than political propaganda, distributed by the New Deal "flunkies" of Franklin the Fourth to mislead the people and to intimidate men in public life. During the time I have served in the United States Senate it has been my privilege to observe the attitude of both Democrats and Republicans, the attitude of New Dealers and Anti-New Dealers; I have seen the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote pass appropriations that run into the billions of dollars leaving the expenditure of this money almost solely to the discretion of the executive department of government, which is responsible for the conduct of the war. I have seen all kinds and forms of legislation, which the Commander in Chief said he needed in order to expedite the winning of the war, passed by the Congress of the United States. And I say to you that any fair-minded man who wants to be honest knows that there is no division of sentiment in the Congress of the United States, and there is no division of sentiment among the people of the United States when it comes to supporting the war effort—all American citizens have been giving and are now giving support to winning the war, and they will continue to give this support.

The President of the United States has received almost 100 percent support from the Congress of the United States on every legitimate war measure; he will continue to receive such support from me and from other Members of Congress regardless of their views on domestic issues. And these paid propagandists of the New Deal who would lead you to believe that there is any division in the minds of the American people on the question of winning the war and of making any sacrifice necessary to win the war, are seeking to mislead the people; they are misrepresenting the facts, and they know they are misrepresenting the facts.

I want to say to you people who are listening to me today, you may do as you think best, but so far as I am concerned, I do not propose to allow this smear brigade to intimidate me and force me to support them in legislation dealing entirely with our domestic affairs and thereby aid them to use the war effort as a camouflage to cover up their real design to change the form of the American Government and convert it into a socialized dictatorship. I challenge the smear brigade to do their worst. I ask no quarter, and I expect to give none. I believe in the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the United States, and I am opposed to converting this Government into some kind of "ism," whether it be Nazi-ism, fascism, or communism, because regardless of which "ism" you pick, it will mean dictatorship; and I am opposed to it and expect to fight it.

Now, since I have made this very frank statement of my position, I want to discuss with you frankly some issues dealing with domestic affairs. I want to say to you, it is my most definite and considered judgment that we have in powerful places in Washington today Communists, fellow travelers, and other New Deal theorists who have their minds made up definitely that during the post-war period they will be able to finally accomplish that which they were not able to accomplish during the pre-war period; and that is, to convert this Government into a socialized, communized, regimented, centralized dictatorship. They believe they will be able in the post-war period to finally establish on the banks of the Potomac a government wherein will reside not the public servants of the people, but the rulers of the people.

The New Deal Supreme Court has already commenced talking about the rulers of the people, not the public servants. So far as I am concerned, I expect to fight this process. Some of my personal friends have asked me the question: "Why are you so concerned about the future of this Nation? Why are you so fearful of the post-war period?"

Well, I want to tell you why. The main reason I am fearful of this Washington Dynasty of New Dealers is the fact that they have not been honest with the American people. They gained power by deception. They have sought to maintain themselves in power by covering up the truth. They have sought to change our form of Government without letting the great rank and file of our people know what they were doing. I am fearful of men whom I regard as dishonest anywhere, but I am especially afraid of deception, deceit, and dishonesty in high governmental places.

Now, I realize that these charges which I am making against this New Deal bunch are serious charges, and I say that no man should make such charges unless he is prepared to prove them by the record. So let us take a look at the record. Let us compare their promises with their actions.

When the people turned the Republican Party out and put the Democratic Party in back in 1933, they took this action on the solemn promises of those who were authorized to speak for the Democratic Party. Promise No. 1 was that the innumerable number of Government boards and bureaus which the Republican Party had allowed to be built up in Washington would be abolished and that there would be left only the few necessary and essential Government agencies to serve the people and that the power which had been concentrated in Washington in these governmental departments would be returned to the State or returned to the people. That was the promise. Now what is the record?

The record is that the New Deal had long before we ever entered the war created so many new Government agencies and they brought into Washington so many more people to live off of the public pay roll that the most profitable business in the United States was the building of apartment houses, not in the District of Columbia because they soon filled that up, but over in Virginia to house these hundreds of thousands of employees who had been brought into our Capital City.

Promise No. 2, that they would return to the States authority which had heretofore been taken away from the States. What have they done?

They have created in almost every one of these bureaus a new kind of bureau which they have called regional bureaus. These regional bureaus are so constructed that they very carefully avoid ever following the lines of any one State, and by this process they seek to concentrate all power in Washington and then to completely eliminate State and local government by the delegating of certain powers to the regions which were formerly exercised by the States.

Another promise they made when they went into power was that they would cut the cost of Government in the United States at least 25 percent. Well, now, what about the performance of this bunch when they actually gained power?

Never before in the history of any nation on the face of the earth was money so lavishly appropriated and expended as during the first 10 years of the reign of the New Deal—before we entered the war. And please bear in mind I am not talking about war expenditures, but I am talking about pre-war expenditures. This gang of New Dealers built the public debt during this period to a figure far in excess of the figure which it went to in the First World War. That, my friends, is how they made good on their promise of economy to the American people.

When this gang of New Deal philosophers were elected to public office it was on the promise that the Government must be so reorganized and conducted that it would restore confidence of business in our Federal Government. How did they proceed to restore confidence?

They did it by branding every man who was diligent, who saved his money, and who sought to invest money wisely and maintain business as an economic royalist and as an enemy of good government. The New Deal was not in power long before a businessman had to be vouched for by some fellow traveler before he could get inside one of these Government bureaus to transact business necessary for the maintenance of his industry. How did they make good on their promise to restore to the people the right to own their own business and to look after their own affairs?

I will tell you what they did. They started out and they regimented every line of business to the point that practically no decision could be made by the individual man without consulting with some bureaucrat in Washington or some of the stooges of these bureaucrats who swarm over the countryside. America was flooded with rules and regulations; the people have been confused as never before. They started out with the N. R. A., and when the Supreme Court plucked the feathers of this old bird and threw him out the window they went out and picked him up and decorated him with a bunch of red feathers and called him the O. P. A.

When the war started, they immediately took over the dairy industry in America, and their first move to solve the feed problem was to ship cottonseed meal from Texas to Illinois cows, and they shipped soybeans from Illinois to feed Texas cows. Over a long period of time they killed the cows and the pigs to produce a shortage of meat, and then they proceeded to ration beef and pork.

Now I say to you that the record proves without any question of doubt that, as stated awhile ago, the New Deal gained power by deception, and has maintained itself in power by misleading the people. Some may say that these are harsh statements. My answer to that is that all I have done is to quote the record; I have given you the facts. I would not be seriously concerned about the future of government in this country if I thought our leaders in public office intended to be honest with the people, if they intended to tell the people actually what they were seeking to do. But I do not think they are. I think they are trying to mislead the people. Day after day, you hear brilliant speeches made about a great social-security system which they want to establish in America. You hear brilliant statements made about what a great social-security system they have already established.

Well, now, of course, the facts are that the billions which have been poured into the laps of the American people during the 10 years before we entered this war were not honest dollars, that had been collected in the ordinary process of tax collection, but they represented dollars that the Government had borrowed from the people. In this great experimental scheme of 10 years they had spent all of the money they could collect in taxes and in addition they had expanded the public debt, together with commitments and guaranties of the Federal Government to more than sixty billions of dollars.

When this bunch sent out a subsidy check or a Social Security check, they did not put a little note in the envelope and say to the man who received it that they had executed a mortgage on the future income of himself and his children in order to get the money.

Now I do not want anyone to deceive himself. I do not want anyone to think that when the war started these New Dealers came to Washington, because they did not have to come—they were already there—the Communists, the Socialists, the ex-I. W. W. labor leaders, the labor-leader racketeers, the patronage dispensing bureaucrats, and the political contractors were already in Washington thoroughly established. They had been doing business on the banks of the Potomac for 10 years. They had the inside track on everything. They are still on the job, and all they are waiting for is for the war to be over in order that they may proceed immediately to complete the task which they had started out to complete; and that is, to change our form of government, abolish free enterprise, and establish state socialism.

I say to you it is time that these governmental termites were driven out of the temple of democracy in Washington, D. C. I say to you that it is time we liquidated the New Deal. And I want to see the liquidation begin in the President's office and continue down through the Congress of the United States and the boards and bureaus of the United States. I want to see the American people reestablish democratic government in America.

Now I want to make another charge, then I want to prove it by the record. I say to you that these New Dealers in Washington could on the record be convicted of theft, because what they have done is to steal the machinery of the Democratic Party and to convert it to their own use as a vehicle to promote the New Deal Party. The New Deal Party is not the Democratic Party. It has not even a speaking acquaintance with the principles of government as laid down by the patron saints of democracy in America.

Again let us go back to the record. You gentlemen who are listening to me, remember when under the reign of the New Deal a letter was sent by the President of the United States to a Member of the Congress, expressing the hope that the Congressman would not allow any fear as to the constitutionality of a law to deter him from supporting that law. You have observed under the New Deal the tendency to concentrate all the power of the Government in the hands of the executive department. You saw this tendency long before we entered the war. Let me quote from George Washington on that subject:

"It is important that the habits of thinking in a free country inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of powers of one department the encroachment upon the power of another department. Encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all departments into one and thus create a real despotism."

Now let us go to a real source of authority as to the principles of the Democratic Party. I wish to quote to you a statement of Thomas Jefferson:

"When you consider the general tendency to multiply offices and to increase expenses to the ultimate term of burden which the citizen can bear, it behooves us to avail ourselves of every occasion to take off the surcharge of government, that it may never be said that after leaving labor the smallest portions of its earnings on which it can subsist, government itself consumes the whole residue of that which it was instituted to guard."

Now, my friends, have you seen or heard anything from this gang of fellow travelers in Washington, camouflaged and traveling under the banner of democracy, that even resembles this philosophy of government? Let me quote a little more from Thomas Jefferson. Let us see what Thomas Jefferson believed about this philosophy of the New Deal that all of the power should be concentrated in Washington that the Government in Washington should order the daily lives of all our people. Here is what Jefferson said:

"I believe this the strongest Government on earth. Sometimes it is said that man cannot be entrusted with government of himself; can he then be trusted with government of others? Or have we found angels in the form of kings to govern us?"

Did you ever read a stronger or more convincing statement than this in behalf of government by law and not government by men? Now, my friends, you know ever since the New Deal went into power we have been having these big Jackson Day dinners where all of the faithful servants of the New Deal Party pay $100 a plate to go into the coffers of the party. I say to you that I think it would be far more in keeping with their philosophy if the New Deal would celebrate the birthday of Karl Marx instead of the birthday of Andrew Jackson. Let us compare a little of the philosophy of Andrew Jackson with that of the New Deal. Here is what Jackson said about observing the Constitution:

"When an honest observance of the Constitution cannot be obtained from communities like ours, it need not be anticipated elsewhere, and the cause in which there has been so much martyrdom and from which so much was expected by the friends of liberty may be abandoned and the degrading truth that man is unfit for self-government admitted; and this will be the question if expediency be made the rule of construction in interpreting the Constitution."

Now, my friends, compare that with the philosophy of the New Deal who would have you believe that the Constitution of the United States belongs to the horse-and-buggy age.

Now let me quote a little more from Andrew Jackson. Let us compare his philosophy with the New Deal philosophy which preaches the doctrine that the Federal Government can do anything it wants to. Here is what Jackson said:

"We should constantly bear in mind the fact that the considerations which induced the framers of the Constitution to withhold from the Federal Government the power to regulate the great mass of business and concerns of the people have been fully justified by experience."

Compare this with the philosophy of the New Deal that the Federal Government should regulate everything and then listen to this piece of political wisdom from Andrew Jackson:

"No people can hope to perpetuate their liberty who long acquiesce in a policy which taxes them for objects not necessary to the legitimate and real needs of their government."

Now, let us compare this New Deal philosophy of the indispensable man with the statement of President Harrison, made 100 years ago:

"Republics can commit no greater error than to adopt or continue any feature in their systems of government which may be calculated to create or increase the love of power in the bosoms of those to whom necessity obliges them to commit the management of their affairs; and surely nothing is more likely to produce such a state of mind than the long continuance in an office of high trust. Nothing can be more corrupting, nothing more destructive of all those noble feelings which belong to the character of a devoted republican patriot.

"When this corrupting passion once takes possession of the human mind, like the love of gold it becomes insatiable. It is the never-dying worm in his bosom, grows with his growth, and strengthens with the declining years of its victim. If this is true, it is the part of wisdom for a republic to limit the service of that officer at least to whom she has entrusted the management of her foreign relations, the execution of her laws, and the command of her armies and navies to a period so short as to prevent his forgetting that he is the accountable agent, not the principal; the servant, not the master."

My friends, I believe I have proven to you from the record the charge I made a while ago that the New Deal Party is not a Democratic Party; that it has stolen the machinery of the Democratic Party and converted it into a vehicle to preach the doctrines of Karl Marx.

And if you need any further evidence that the New Deal Party has gone communistic, if you need any further evidence that they are guilty of theft, you who have read the papers recently have seen that evidence, because they have not only stolen the machinery of the Democratic Party, but they have stolen the platform of the Communist Party, and the Communist Party has gone out of business and is now endorsing the New Deal.

Let me conclude what I have to say today by urging the great rank and file of the people of America, regardless of whether they are Democrats or Republicans, to go to the polls in November 1944, and join in a general house cleaning in Washington. Let us send the "yes men" and the fellow travelers and the New Deal stooges and the communistic termites back home. Let us put an end to the doctrines of the indispensable man. Let us once and for all liquidate these socialistic boards and bureaus. Let us put an end to the situation where a white man has to paint his face with black cork and march down the sawdust trail of the New Deal to the national anthem of Karl Marx before he can make contact with a Government official in Washington.

Third Anniversary of Entry of Soviet Union Into the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me last night at Madison Square Garden, New York, at a meeting sponsored by the Russian War Relief organization, in observance of the third anniversary of the entrance of the Soviet Union into the war.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Three years ago this morning, in the year minus 991 of the thousand years of Fascist rule which Hitler boastfully promised his people, that still legendary "Little Corporal," ever aping Napoleon, entered upon the last act of his Napoleonic drama, Russia and downfall. This great would-be world traveler discovered the reverse of what Columbus learned, namely, that if he went east he would soon be sailing west.

Today, with 988 years of his vaunted millennium yet to go, this devil of earth, pressed from every side by those who have come to avenge his heinous deeds, can daily and hourly hear the strokes of the Big Ben of doom.

For Hitler's mortal wound, for breaking and tearing apart his once great army, all the world, friend and foe alike, pays homage to the terrible glory and grandeur of Russian arms. For all time good men and women, even little children, will speak of the matchless heroism of the Red Army and the Soviet people upon whose unconquerable spirit the storms of fascism and tyranny broke with all their fury and were relentlessly rolled back.

Upon the old lands of ancient Russia freedom has not only had a new birth but found a new savior.

It is a glorious comradeship which we have today among those who fight the hideous monsters who a little while ago threatened the earth. Never have those who fought common enemies been so much one in concert of action, in singleness of spirit and purpose. No tribute upon our landing from the west upon the coast of France has been more generous or more worthy than that of Joseph Stalin, the world's greatest general, who speaking of that magnificent assault said: "The history of war does not know of any such undertaking so broad in conception, so grandiose in scale, so masterly in execution." Prime Minister Churchill has ventured the possibility that even this summer, or this year, might see the happy end of the war—the final choking and throttling of the enemy—V-day.

I come here tonight to speak to you and to speak to my fellow Americans not merely about the glory of Russian arms, or about a victory which is assured. These things all the world knows.

Joseph Stalin and the Soviet people are realists. They are grateful for our tributes and our praise, but they want to know what America and Americans are going to do after V-day. So do all those who now fight with us. What concerns us all, therefore, is whether America and Americans are this time to keep their rendezvous with destiny, or whether we are again to betray our own dead and our allies as we did a quarter of a century ago.

There are ominous signs of a second betrayal in the political skies. While the best and strongest of our people die for democracy, there seem to be many determined that their victory shall be in vain. Where are all those who prayed that Hitler might destroy the Soviet Union? Where are all those who decried lend-lease to Russia when this juggernaut assailed her? What is the meaning of the willingness of Senators to denounce in this day, when we are fighting shoulder to shoulder, Joseph Stalin as a great enemy? Why do great newspapers still disseminate vicious and false propaganda against the Soviet Union and strive to fan the flames of prejudice against such an ally, such a friend? What is the purpose of those who seize upon the barest threads of rumor to try to drive a wedge between us and the Soviet Union, between Britain and America, between the people and their President and Government, to undermine the people's confidence in their allies and their own leaders?

We see a Congress in war, a Congress which ordered men to war and many to death, wilfully and purposefully denying to fighting men the chance to vote because some Senators and Congressmen feared their vote. We see hundreds of thousands of men and women, the fathers of fighting sons, of daughters who are nurses upon the battle fronts, and loyal auxiliaries, disfranchised because they cannot or do not at an appointed time pay a sum of money for the privilege of voting. We see the most diabolical conspiracy in American political history, planned with the masterful strategy of an assault upon the continent of Europe, executed with the boldness, thoroughness, and daring with which an Eisenhower assaults Normandy, to deny whole States, millions of Americans, the right to vote for the nominee of one of the Nation's dominant parties, even if he be the President of the United States and the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy.

We hear the rumblings of so-called revolts, not revolts against tyranny, but to set up a tyranny upon others. We behold a picayune Judas who once was a pigmy Secretary of War, and an embittered old man, now rich, who is remembered as a Senator, not for what he built but for his part as one of the demolition squad of the League of Nations, and a man in whose breast hate of another war President reached its zenith, and others of their kind, gathering in a national council to assault not their country's enemy, but their enemy, the Nation's President.

We cannot fail to see the scheming care with which some who seek high office screen their real sentiments and aims from the public eye, or by skillful and guileful blandishments speak words designed at the same time to encourage and to delude those who believe in world peace and in international working together to make better the good earth.

The crisis now is not upon the battle front but upon the home front, for it is here that the final victory must be won, or all is lost. It is time for Americans to speak up and to speak out if they believe in democracy abroad and at home. If we are not to lose the final battle, the might of American opinion must be mobilized behind principles and programs which will assure beyond any doubt that we not only shall do our part in keeping the peace of the world and promoting its welfare, but as God has set us to do we shall lead the fight and in a manner worthy of our might show the way to others. If we in our hearts covenant that we will honor our debt to our allied and our own dead and mangled, we will promise the living and the dead that we will let no other little group of willful men, we will let no Senate, we will allow no sinister forces, whether they be selfish or dangerously shortsighted, this time to dishonor our obligations, deny us our full part in rebuilding the broken world.

You and I know that those three giant leaders who, like a triple Atlas, have held the world of freedom upon their shoulders, have laid the foundations of an accord among nations and peoples upon which may be built the grandest edifice of world security and prosperity man has ever seen. From the Atlantic Charter to Cairo, where the Orient joined the Occident, to Teheran, the ever-broadening path of world peace stretches. The world organization to come after the war, through which we shall all work together as we have fought together, is already conceived and aborning.

But you may depend upon it, it will be subjected to every possible assault by those among us who are the isolationists, the imperialists, or the exploiters. They will attack this organization as they will attack any government in America which will fearlessly protect the economic and civil rights of the many against the totalitarians among us.

From however many directions the attack may come, it will be like this global war—one in strategy. It will have a supreme general staff. It will have its daring commandos, the demolition squads, its sappers, its heavy artillery, its well-organized services of supply, and, of course, its fifth column and its minister and organs of propaganda. It will be the more dangerous because the whole army will never be visible and like fifth columnists will appear behind a front of patriotism and high purpose.

Let us now, before the eagerly awaiting world, take concrete and positive action to assure that this plot against democracy at home and cooperation abroad shall not succeed. Let us come out unequivocally for a general world organization with power to keep the peace and to promote the welfare of all peoples. Let us not place our reliance in men or parties who subscribe to international collaboration with a big "but," who cautiously spin out webs of verbiage which commit us to nothing, or who maintain a pregnant silence until they are forced to issue a platitude guaranteed neither to offend or enlighten anyone.

Such men simply do not have the stature—do not possess the qualities of leadership—that will be required in the crucial days ahead.

Let the Congress of the United States now provide for the machinery which will break the stranglehold that, under our present treaty-making procedure, a small but determined minority can exercise over the attempt to set up such an organization.

Let the Congress now specifically renounce the undemocratic two-thirds rule for the ratification of treaties and agree that our international relations shall be governed by executive agreements ratified by a simple majority of both Houses of Congress. Let Congress now provide that the time for a vote on international agreements may be decided by a simple majority of either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

And let this audience, as well as all other democratically minded people, serve notice now to the nominating conventions of both parties, that they will support them in a decision not to recognize any delegation, or the authority of any group, that seeks to circumvent or subvert our time-honored electoral procedure and substitute the rule of a small oligarchy for the expressed will of the majority of the people.

Let the Congress now also lay the foundation for a sound and prosperous post-war economy. Let it give assurance that we will utilize the tremendous productive capacity we possess for getting more, and better, and cheaper goods into the hands of the people of the Nation and the world—give a pledge of a job and a decent standard of living to every returning soldier, to every discharged war worker, to every white-collar worker, and to every woman who wants to remain employed in all America.

This being an election year, we can expect more than the usual amount of acrimony and vituperation on the home political front. That I can assure you from recent personal experience. Those who think they can gamble with the Nation's destiny in pursuit of their own selfish interests; those who think we can safely return to pre-war unemployment; those who would destroy labor unions and collective bargaining by playing off soldiers against war workers, white-collar against industrial employees, women workers against men, or race against race, had better beware. They will be doing the work of Hitler after Hitler is dead.

For though we may sentence Hitler, though we may hang him from the highest tree in Russia, though we may bury him and his ideas under the Ural Mountains, the democratic forces of all mankind will have to stand on his grave for a long time to make sure that those ideas do not rise again.

The real secret weapon upon which Hitler most relied was disunity among the people in the countries arrayed against him, and disunity among the Allied countries themselves.

Since I last spoke on this rostrum, on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of resumption of diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union, there have been developments of the greatest importance.

The air has been further cleared of the hobgoblins so industriously conjured up by the anti-Soviet and isolationist press. We have laid many ghosts and legends. We have exercised the specter of international superstition with the bell and candle of logic and information. And on June 6 the first pair of boots that splashed into the water off a beach in Normandy broke the last remnant of the power of Hitler's most dangerous secret weapon.

This meeting is sponsored by Russian War Relief, an organization which has played an outstanding role in fostering good will and understanding between the people of America and those of the Soviet Union. We know from people who have visited Russia how truly appreciative the Russians are of the supplies this organization has sent, and I hope that during the next year our people will give even more unstintingly from the relative bounty they still enjoy.

Before closing, however, I should like to speak for just a moment about the war relief that Russia has given us.

In return for the tremendous quantities of lend-lease materials we have sent to Russia, what has Russia given us in reverse lend-lease? In return for the war relief goods we have shipped to her, what has she given us in terms of war relief?

Russia has given us 7,800,000 dead or captured Germans.

How many American boys could 7,800,000 Germans kill in the course of the war? Allowing 1 casualty of ours to 8 of theirs, which is a fair figure for an American to shoot at, this means that Russia has given us as a gift the lives and futures of 1,000,000 American boys.

Did I hear someone complain about the transfer of a cruiser to the Russian Navy?

American planes are now based on Soviet soil. American blood is running as freely as Russian blood, cementing forever the destinies of our two great Nations. With the mutual confidence and respect born of common devotion to a great cause, the peoples of the two Nations echo the historic words of their leaders spoken at Teheran:

"Emerging from these friendly conferences we look with confidence to the day when all peoples of the world may live free lives untouched by tyranny and according to their varying desires and their own consciences.

"We came here with hope and determination. We leave here friends in fact, in spirit, and in purpose."

It is that Russia to whom we give our solemn pledge of enduring friendship here tonight.

The Constitution Forever

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. LEE O'DANIEL
OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject The Constitution Forever, delivered by me before the American National Democratic Committee at Chicago, Ill., on June 19, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The greatest task confronting this Nation at this time is to win the war and return the youth of America to their homes. I believe everybody in the United States agrees that that is our number one task. I believe the American people are united almost 100 percent on that idea. The United States Congress is 100 percent united on that idea. It has been my privilege to be in the United States Senate ever since this war started. I have observed legislation that has come before that body. I have seen appropriation bills measured in billions of dollars to carry forward this war effort passed by both Houses of Congress and the expenditure of the money left almost wholly within the discretion of those charged with carrying our war effort forward. I have seen those appropriation bills passed by practically unanimous vote. I have seen other legislation come before the Congress which vested in the Executive department, during the war period, vast powers which the Executive department said it should have in order that the war effort might be expedited. I say to you that in so far as prosecuting this war is concerned, the President has had, and now has, practically 100 percent support from the Congress in doing all those things necessary to bring the war to a successful conclusion. And this support has come not only from the Democrats, but it has likewise come from the Republicans. In other words, I believe that any honest citizen must admit that patriotism and love of country is not a thing on which the Democratic Party has a monopoly. Certainly it is not a thing on which the New Deal Party has a monopoly. So with a full realization of the fact that ever since I have been in the United States Senate I have given 100 percent support to every war measure and with the knowledge in my own mind that I expect to continue to follow this course, I can stand before you with a clear conscience that I have done my duty as a public servant to advance the war effort. Yes, we as a people are united almost 100 percent on our war effort. Therefore it is not necessary for me to discuss that subject at this time. We are not united 100 percent on problems affecting the home front. Therefore, it is these home front problems that I shall discuss now. Just as I stand before you with a clear conscience that I have done my duty as a public servant to advance the war effort, I also stand before you with a clear conscience as I assure you that ever since I have been in the United States Senate and that so long as I remain in public life, I intend to do everything I can to drive out of the temple of government in Washington all the despoilers of democracy, bungling bureaucrats, and fellow travelers who have regimented themselves under the banner of the New Deal Party and have stolen everything we had in the Democratic Party, except our principles.

When I say that I say it with the full knowledge that every man who has seen fit to question the domestic policies of the New Deal has been smeared from head to foot by the New Deal mud daubers and charged with being unpatriotic and with sabotaging our war effort. But the only weapon of defense the New Deal has is their mud balls. So when I toss a few nice clean hand grenades of truth and facts over into their camp, I expect them to throw them back, all covered with mud. But it was Confucius who once said that "He who throws mud has the dirty hands." So far as I am concerned the lines are drawn and the battle is on. As I go forward to fight for these principles of democracy, I ask no quarter and I do not expect to give any. The issue will be decided at the election polls this year. There the people will decide whether or not we are to maintain constitutional government in America. They will decide whether we are to have a government by law, or junk the Constitution and hereafter have a Government by Executive order and bureaucratic edict. I hope we have in America enough men and women of courage and determination who are willing between now and election day to stand on the front lines and fight the battle for constitutional government. While our boys are fighting and dying on foreign battlefields for the principles of constitutional government, I hope that those who are left on the home front will not prove to be slackers who can be bought by bureaucratic patronage or intimidated by the smear artists, muck-rakers, and fellow-travelers of the New Deal party. At this time while our expenditure of public funds exceeds that of any nation on the face of the earth; at this time when the whole economic power of this Nation is being used to make war; at this time when we are accumulating a debt which will tax the resources of America for another hundred years; at this time when our boys are fighting and dying on foreign battlefields, and the mothers of America tossing on tear-soaked pillows all through the long nights, is it not pertinent for us to ask one question? That one question is, "What are we fighting for?" As far as I am concerned, I believe the young manhood of America who are in the battle lines know what they are fighting for. I believe the great rank and file of the people of this Nation know what we are fighting for. I believe you and I know what the aspirations of the American people are. And I tell you furthermore and with emphasis that I am thoroughly convinced we are not fighting for what these fellow-travelers and bureaucratic bosses in Washington are trying to do to us.

I tell you that we are not fighting this war for a new kind of government in America. We are fighting this war that we may reenforce the foundations to maintain the kind of government in America under which this Nation has grown to be the greatest nation on the face of the earth. The youth of America are fighting this war and the American people are sacrificing because we know that this is the only government in the world where a constitution has been adopted which carries a full and complete guarantee of those fundamental principles of government upon which the liberty and freedom of individual citizens rest. In plain English, our boys are fighting and dying on foreign battlefields today and we here at home are sacrificing today to maintain exactly the kind of government that our forefathers established for us when they wrote the Constitution of the United States of America. Why is it that since we entered this war we have been able in a period of a little more than 2 years to far outdistance and overcome everything that the totalitarian governments of the world had been able to do during the past decade? I will tell you why. It is because the Government of America is based on a system of free private enterprise. It is a government of free men. It is the kind of government built on the theory of rewarding mankind for success and penalizing him for failure. It is the kind of government which has depended for its strength and power upon a strong people, and not upon a strong government. It is a nation that since its inception has recognized the fundamental principle that whenever a government became strong, the people became weak. We have had a demonstration of the fact that free men if given an opportunity will, upon their own initiative, meet and solve problems which no bureaucratic government on earth can ever solve. What are we fighting for? We are fighting for the kind of government we had. I am concerned about the future of the United States and I think it is time that every citizen should be concerned about it. For many years the control of the government has rested in the hands of two major political parties—the Democratic Party and the Republican Party. These parties have represented, in years gone by, two different fundamental points of view on economic problems, but both parties have at all times stood for the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the United States.

Therefore, regardless of whichever party happened to be in power, the people had assurance that neither was knowingly going to absolutely destroy constitutional government. They might differ violently within certain fields, but there was always a feeling in the minds and hearts of the great rank and file of the people that neither of these two great parties actually intended to change our form of government. But about 10 or 11 years ago the theorists and fellow-travelers who were thoroughly soaked in all of the various foreign "isms" of Europe took over control of the Democratic Party and we no longer have, when viewed from the standpoint of fundamental principles, any Democratic Party left. We have a New Deal Party, and there is not even a remote resemblance between the doctrine of the New Deal Party and the fundamental doctrine of the Democratic Party. The New Deal Party has proven for 10 or 11 years that they had no interest in the Democratic Party except to use its machinery to perpetuate itself in office. The New Deal Party has stolen everything the Democratic Party had except our principles, and they tried to make up for not stealing our principles by stealing the Communist Party platform. By so doing they expect to get the votes of both the Democrats and the Communists. That may not be bad political strategy, but it certainly does create grave danger to our American form of government. If any of you folks have had any doubts about the fact that the New Deal Party is a communistic organization, then I think those doubts should have been removed a few days ago when the Communist Party in the United States dissolved and announced that they would support the New Deal Party. The New Dealers try to drown out the voices of everybody else by shouting loudly their plea for unity. I think we all believe in unity when achieved by proper methods. But I say to you very frankly that I am opposed to unity on fundamental principles of government if the way by which we must achieve unity is to join the Communist Party. I am concerned about the future of America during the post-war period and I will tell you why I am concerned about it. If this vast concentration of power on the banks of the Potomac were something that had come about since we entered the war and if I could look upon it as a temporary expedient to deal with war problems and war problems only, I would not be concerned.

But, my friends, for 10 long years before we entered the war, there had moved into Washington the greatest host of fellow travelers, Communists, theorists, and nitwits that had ever assembled before in any civilized nation. For 10 years the Treasury of the United States was thrown wide open to finance all of these socialistic theories and socialistic schemes by which these young Harvard graduates who are hardly dry behind their ears, expect to make over the world. For 10 long years before we entered the war an I. W. W. card or a membership card in the Communist Party or an exalted office in the C. I. O. was a passport to places of authority in what we have been told was a Democratic Government. We saw the Chief Executive of this Nation seek to jam through Congress a bill to destroy the power of the judiciary. What was not accomplished by the failure of that bill to pass was accomplished by another method. We have seen through the process of long tenure in office a Supreme Court appointed in the United States whose economic philosophy is acceptable to the New Deal. We have seen the principles of government laid down in the Constitution and as advocated by Thomas Jefferson thrown in the trash can, and the governmental philosophy of the Communist and of the Socialist Parties substituted therefor. We have seen the Congress of the United States apparently forget the Constitution. We have seen the Congress of the United States for 10 years before we got into the war allow the bureaucrats to write the laws and these Congressmen under the lure of bureaucratic patronage and under the whip of Executive power convert themselves into "yes men" and perform like trained seals, doing the bidding of their master and voting for every measure they were ordered to pass. * * * We have seen this New Deal dynasty set up the machinery for the biggest racket the world has ever seen, for the purpose of perpetuating itself in power. This racket consists of laws and edicts which transfers to a gang of labor-leader racketeers, one of the powers delegated by the people to the Federal Government in section 8, article 1 of the Constitution of the United States of America, the "power to lay and collect taxes." This system gives to the labor-leader racketeers power to tax honest laboring people for their jobs and take the tax out of their pay envelopes before the workers even see their pay, and to prohibit free American workers from working on certain jobs unless they do pay the tax. From this swag taken by the labor-leader racketeers, campaigns are paid for to help reelect the Members of Congress and the President who set up the legal authority for the racket.

I say to you, my friends, that with this record before us and with the knowledge of the fact that during this war period these Communistic leaders and these fellow-travelers have simply used the war effort to entrench themselves in power, and with the knowledge that they are still in Washington and they still believe in this philosophy of government and with the knowledge that the Congress of the United States for 10 years performed as slaves for this bunch, I say to you that I am concerned about the post-war period. I wonder if the great rank and file of our people have stopped to think what it means if we abandon the principles of a government by written Constitution and a government by law and substitute therefor a centralized government by men. Let me remind you that whenever you give up constitutional government, you give up the guaranty of freedom of religion; you give up the guaranty of freedom of the press; you give up the protection of the guaranty of your personal rights as written in the Bill of Rights; you give up the doctrine that the Government exists for the people, and accept the doctrine that the people exist for the Government; you give up the last written guaranty of property rights, and you give up the last guaranty of protection of the minority. The Constitution was written to protect the individual in his personal rights; it was written to protect the individual against the encroachment of all-powerful governmental bureaus; it was written to protect minorities against the mob and against the majority; it is the foundation upon which our whole system of individual liberty and freedom rests. These fellow-travelers who have junked the fundamental principles of democracy and substituted therefor the foreign "isms" all based on powerful governmental control; these fellows who did this before we got into the war and who expect to complete the operation when the war is over; this bunch who stole the machinery of the Democratic Party and who have kept the wheels of this machinery greased with public patronage paid out of the Federal Treasury, call it the New Deal Party between elections and only call it the Democratic Party when they are out after votes. I charge that this theft of the machinery of the Democratic Party and these destructive practices which have been put into effect by the New Deal, were dishonest in their conception and they have perpetrated, under the guise of democracy, a fraud on the American people. Elected to public office on a pledge to reduce the cost of the Federal Government 25 percent, they proceeded to spend all the money in the Federal Treasury and build a public debt, in round figures, of $60,000,000,000 before we even got into the war.

Elected to office on a pledge to drive the Government bureaus out of Washington and stop the growth of the Federal Government, they have multiplied these bureaus without limit before we ever got into the war. They had so expanded these bureaus and boards that the District of Columbia was not big enough for the bureaucrats and their flunkies to live in, and they spread over into different States and were still crowded. Elected to public office on a pledge to the American people that they were the champions of States' rights and local government, they sought, before we ever got into the war, by the process of organizing regions throughout America, to destroy our State governments and substitute therefor the rule of the bureaucrats by regions and not by States. This gang of New Dealers, who went into power with a promise of giving the people an honest government, economically administered, long before we entered the war, drained the States and local governments dry with high taxes and then forced the States and local governments to come to Washington and sit on the steps of the Capitol with a tin cup in their hand and beg for a part of the money back which they, themselves, had contributed to the great governmental slush fund. Long before we entered the war, this gang of New Dealers, masquerading under the guise of the Democratic Party, told the people that all could live in luxury and nobody would have to work if we adopted their plan of taxing all the income away from the people and taking it to Washington and then allowing all this vast horde of governmental bureaucrats to take out what they wanted and reapportion the balance back home to the people. Another thing that made the sins of the New Deal even worse than they otherwise would have been is the fact that they were not honest with the people in what they have done. They did not tell the people that every dollar which the Nation has represents the labor of some man or woman. They did not point out to the people that government within itself has no money except as it takes it away from the people. They did not tell the people that when the Government was acting as Santa Claus and distributing bounties to some classes of our people, to get their votes at reelection time, that this distribution was being made out of borrowed money and that, in fact, what they were doing was simply piling up public debts which your children and my children and their children must pay some day.

Now I say to you that all of this is history. This took place before we entered the war. But the same gang with its field marshals and communistic brigades are still in Washington and they are still in places of power; their philosophy of government has not changed and I warn you that just as soon as the war is over they most definitely intend to resume their operations right where they left off when the war started. They definitely intend to make America over, they definitely intend to destroy the power of State government, and they definitely intend to destroy the power of local governments and to substitute therefor a powerful national government in Washington and regional government throughout the Nation. They are firm believers in the doctrine that man exists for the government and not that government exists for man. They are firm believers in the doctrine that it is a disgrace to work and an honor to loaf and they have enacted legislation that tends to encourage some people to embrace that doctrine. Their policy is to praise the indolent and belittle the thrifty. They have preached a doctrine that it is a virtue to spend and a crime to save and they expect to resume the preaching of this same doctrine. I warn you folks that when this war is over we will have a debt of probably $300,000,000,000. I am not an alarmist and so far as I am concerned I believe that if we go back to the fundamental principles of the Constitution, if we will guarantee and maintain the rights of free private enterprise, if government will become the referee and resign as captain on the team, if the government will perform its functions and leave the citizens to perform their individual functions, the enterprise and the initiative of America will make itself felt, and we will pay this $300,000,000,000 debt and at the same time meet every legitimate responsibility of government. But this will be possible only on condition that we will again dignify those fundamental principles of government upon which this Nation was built. We must reestablish the belief that work—work—is honorable and that idleness is degrading. We must again become a Nation that believes in the individual responsibility of man. We must reestablish our economic system on a basis where reward goes to intelligent effort and where energy and free private enterprise are not denounced and destroyed. It is high time for you people to realize that we have in Washington a government now that pins roses on labor leaders who defy Government orders and throws out into the street businessmen who contend for the right of a trial in the courts of law.

I say to you who are listening to me today, that the time has come for the people in America to wake up. The time has come for the people of America to realize that for 10 long years before we entered the war you have had men in the Congress of the United States who performed like trained seals and voted for every New Deal measure they were ordered to vote for. It is time for the people to realize that this process has robbed the legislative branch of government of its power and of its dignity. It is time for the people to realize that the executive branch of government for 10 years has been willing to make deals in political campaigns with the crookedest political machines that ever ran some of our States and cities. It is time for you folks to realize that we have substituted in Washington for constitutional government another kind of government and that is the kind which lives by Executive decree and bureaucratic edict. We have had a Government in Washington which preached the doctrine that the way to have more is to produce less; a Government which desires to trade the alluring promises of a tricky dictatorship to the American citizens for their rights and privileges as free-born Americans. Let us remember that Washington is still controlled by these same theorists, Communists and fellow-travelers who killed all the pigs so we could have more meat, plowed up the cotton so we could have more clothes, who increased the public debt so we could have more money. Let us remember that it is out of the brilliant minds of these bureaucratic bosses sitting behind mahogany desks in Washington who hire college professors to write 10-page orders to tell lifelong butchers how to cut a steak. It is these brilliant theorists who in one bulletin forbid the farmers from raising grain and feed and in the next bulletin tell them how to mix the feed they didn't raise and feed it to their cows that have already been slaughtered to prevent starvation. There is still in power in Washington the same gang that thought up the N. R. A. and the famous blue eagle. That was when we had a Supreme Court, however, and it pulled the tail-feathers out of the blue eagle and threw it in the trash can. Since then, the Constitution got thrown in the trash can and the blue eagle was dragged out of the trash can, restuffed, and draped with the American flag and mounted on a new pedestal labeled O. P. A. It is the same old bird with a new name. What the N. R. A. did to the people of this Nation in the early days of the New Deal was only a dress rehearsal to what the O. P. A. has done to us in the latter days of the New Deal. But it's still the same old twisted New Deal philosophy. And I warn the citizens of the United States that there is only one remedy and that is to have a complete and thorough house-cleaning in Washington. The house-cleaning should begin in the White House and make a clean sweep on through the Senate and House of Representatives. I, for one, believe that the Constitution of the United States should be so amended as to provide in the years to come that no man could serve in the office of President, Vice President, Senate, or House of Representatives for a period of more than 6 years. When you let men stay in Washington too long, they come under the control of the bureaucrats and the lobbyists and they cease to represent the people. I think that after 6 years in Washington, we should permit these men to go back home and try to make an honest living under the laws they, themselves, have passed. If we would return America to the rule of the people; if we would guarantee the maintenance of the principles of the Constitution, then I say to you that this house-cleaning in Washington is in order and is long overdue. So far as I am concerned I am not bothered when the house-cleaning comes about, whether it results in moving out Republicans or Democrats, but I do hope you move out every one of the New Dealers. What I am concerned about is that when the house-cleaning is completed we will have in Washington men who believe in spending their time trying to find out how to run this Government according to the principles of the Constitution of the United States of America, and not men who spend their time trying to think up ways to evade the Constitution. Let us dedicate ourselves to the task of saving the Constitution of the United States of America, and thereby save America.

Review by Hon. Joseph F. Guffey, of Pennsylvania, of the Book Arithmetic or Revolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. MEAD
OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Princeton Alumni Weekly by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], class of '94. The article is a review of the book entitled "Arithmetic or Revolution," and is a very interesting and intellectual discussion of it.

There being no objection the review was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARITHMETIC OR REVOLUTION—SENATOR GUFFEY HAILS ARTHUR DUNN'S CONCRETE SOLUTIONS FOR OUR PROBLEMS

(By JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, 1894)

Arithmetic or Revolution, by Arthur Dunn, 1895. Guild of American Economists, Inc., 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York City. $1.

Arthur Dunn, 1895, had two sons (1921 and 1922) in World War No. 1; his third son, Lt. Walter Dunn, 1932, U. S. N. R., is in this war. It was, therefore, natural that the chief purpose of Arithmetic or Revolution" was to abolish war.

The book is written in popular style—has a swing and a punch from cover to cover. It encompasses a lot of ground. The space allotted permits comment on only a few of its most important highlights.

These are:

1. The bloody cycle which starts with war when there are more jobs than workers, followed by peace when there are more workers than jobs. The unemployed "march on Rome" or "burn a Reichstag" to put in power a dictator who has promised them jobs. He makes good by building a giant military machine. Other nations do likewise in self-defense—then comes war again. We are in the first phase of the second bloody cycle. Full employment and general prosperity exist only when we murder each other. No nation has yet solved unemployment by peacetime production.

We can all agree with Arthur that there is something basically wrong with that kind of a world.

2. Paul G. Hoffman has said: "Unless a higher level of employment is achieved in the post-war world there will be no capitalistic system in 5 years after the end of the war."

How does our leadership propose to provide post-war jobs?

Walter Lippmann agrees with Arithmetic or Revolution that there is no difference between the programs of the New Deal and Republican leadership. The technique of both is social security and a big backlog of public works. Indeed, the Republicans would expand social security to cover everyone. Public works will require deficit financing—a palliative. Towering upon a $300,000,000,000 base of the Federal debt it will eventually lead to revolution.

Arithmetic or Revolution presents a cure for unemployment and definite mechanisms for application of the cure. There are no generalities in this book.

3. The complete set-up for a global organization to make the United Nations powerful enough to enforce peace and intelligent enough to eliminate the causes of war. The voting power of the member nations will be the stumbling block. This is overcome by an original and unique device which will promote the practice of democracy throughout the world.

4. Arthur Dunn's program anticipated much that has been done by the United Nations and much that will undoubtedly yet be done. As Sterling North, the brilliant reviewer, has written "For instance, Dunn's brilliant suggestions, 'what to do about Germany,' have six more points than Wilson's, all of them trenchant."

5. Arithmetic or Revolution presents an opinion that the poll tax is unconstitutional. Already the book has inspired the formation of Parents and Wives of Fighting Americans, Inc., which proposes to see that all the armed forces get a square deal during their absence and upon their return. This organization is behind the fight in Virginia to test the constitutionality of the poll tax. Moss A. Plunkett, a leading Virginia lawyer (whose son was killed at New Guinea), and Arthur Dunn are volunteers to argue the case before the United States Supreme Court.

Don't read Arithmetic or Revolution if you wish your convictions to remain frozen—and remember, you can't change the truth by calling it names.

Eric A. Johnston writes: "The mere fact that Mr. Dunn is author of the book assures its timeliness and value."

Judge Jackson, editor of the Roanoke Leader, says, "Every American should read Arithmetic or Revolution. Every professor of economics should use it in his teachings."

To this I agree, and I shall urge the same in my speech about Arithmetic or Revolution on the floor of the Senate.

Message From General Eisenhower on Eve of Invasion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, it has been my good fortune to have a copy forwarded from England of a message from General Eisenhower to soldiers, sailors, and airman of the Allied Expeditionary Force, issued from the supreme headquarters, Allied Expeditionary Force, on the eve of the invasion. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, so that those who have not had the opportunity of reading it in detail will have that privilege, which I have had.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPREME HEADQUARTERS ALLIED EXPEDITIONARY FORCE

Soldiers, sailors, and airmen of the Allied Expeditionary Force:

You are about to embark upon the great crusade toward which we have striven these many months. The eyes of the world are upon you. The hopes and prayers of liberty-loving people everywhere march with you. In company with our brave allies and brothers-in-arms on other fronts, you will bring about the destruction of the German war machine, the elimination of Nazi tyranny over the oppressed peoples of Europe, and security for ourselves in a free world.

Your task will not be an easy one. Your enemy is well trained, well equipped, and battle-hardened. He will fight savagely.

But this is the year 1944. Much has happened since the Nazi triumphs of 1940–41. The United Nations have inflicted upon the Germans great defeats, in open battle, man-to-man. Our air offensive has seriously reduced their strength in the air and their capacity to wage war on the ground. Our home fronts have given us an overwhelming superiority in weapons and munitions of war, and placed at our disposal great reserves of trained fighting men. The tide has turned. The free men of the world are marching together to victory.

I have full confidence in your courage, devotion to duty, and skill in battle. We will accept nothing less than full victory.

Good luck. And let us all beseech the blessing of Almighty God upon this great and noble undertaking.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

Freight Rate Discriminations: The Nation's Post-War Transportation Problem No. 1

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ
OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject Freight Rate Discriminations: The Nation's Post-War Transportation Problem No. 1, delivered by C. E. Child before the Atlanta Rotary Club, Atlanta, Ga., January 10, 1944.

I have an estimate from the Government Printing Office that it will cost $208 to print the address.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The South has shown, especially in recent years, very lively concern about freight rates. The Transportation Board of Investigation and Research, of which I am a member, is also interested in the subject. Our Board was created by the Transportation Act of 1940 to make investigations and reports to the President and Congress on the relative economy and fitness of rail, highway, and water carriers, to determine the service for which each is best adapted, and what policies should be adopted so that each type of carrier can best be developed to provide a national transportation system adequate for our national commerce and national defense. We have been studying the performance of the carriers, the cost and efficiency of their services, the traffic handled, and the rates charged throughout the country. We have made a special investigation of the railroad rate structure and its effect upon the economic development of the country. From the studies we have made and are making, I have personally come to the conclusion—and it should be understood that I am today giving you my individual views—that the first essential of providing an adequate national transportation system is the readjustment of the freight rates and rate relationships of the railroads and other carriers, so that each rate will be fairly compensatory for the service performed, so that every shipper and locality will receive equal treatment in relation to the service rendered by the carrier, and every type of transportation can find its true economic place by attracting the traffic which will come to it through the charging of rates fairly related to its costs. I shall try to give you some of the facts and reasons on which my conclusions are based.

Everybody who gives any thought to the subject realizes that because transportation is a vital necessity in the production and distribution of goods, the growth and prosperity of a nation or a region are profoundly affected by the cost and dependability of transportation service. Every civilized people looks upon transportation, because of its primary importance, as a public service to be promoted and regulated or operated by the state for the general welfare, rather than a mere private enterprise of the carriers. It has been a settled rule of law, running back through the centuries, that the services and charges of common carriers must be just and reasonable, and must be extended to all alike, without unjust discriminations. The doctrine of "equality of opportunity" became a basic principle governing transportation services, even before we adopted it as the cornerstone of our whole democratic system of government.

But the adoption of a rule is one thing, and enforcement is another. The transportation history of the United States has been a constant struggle for better and more economical transportation, and to eliminate discriminations. The railroads have, from a very early date, considered it to their interest to discriminate in their rates and charges—to charge what they thought the traffic would bear, rather than to make like rates for like services to all customers. Preferential rates were made when railroad managers thought they were necessary to attract or hold traffic and were denied where such necessity was not recognized. In practical effect this has given large shippers, controlling much traffic, lower rates than smaller shippers; localities enjoying the competition of numerous carriers—especially where there was competition between rail and water carriers—lower rates than localities not having the benefit of such competition. Carriers tried to make up their losses on competitive traffic by charging higher and higher rates on noncompetitive traffic. These processes operated practically unchecked during the period of rapid railroad growth of the past century. The whole rate structure became a fabric of discriminations. Of course, this was very satisfactory to those who were getting the benefit of preferential rates. Many an industry and many a community owed its growth to such preferences. But the resulting disadvantages and injustices to others became intolerable. The courts provided inadequate remedies for enforcement of the law of equality of treatment. Congress, after much deliberation, attempted to remedy the situation by passing, 57 years ago, the original Interstate Commerce Act, which created the Interstate Commerce Commission for the express purpose of wiping out discriminations and forcing the railroads to charge just and reasonable rates to everybody alike. No legislation was ever more enthusiastically hailed as the dawn of a new era of opportunity, on the one hand, and more bitterly resisted, on the other, as destructive of private enterprise and prosperity. Litigation in the courts and technical defects made the act ineffective for 20 years. Amendments by Congress, in 1906, made the law workable. Since that time, by numerous amendments and additions strengthening the act, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been given powers to prescribe and establish such rates as it considers to be just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory, not only for railroads, but also for pipe lines, highway and water carriers.

This has provided machinery for wiping out discriminations, but the process of wiping them out has proved to be slow, uncertain, and expensive. Over all these years discriminations have become powerfully entrenched in the railroad rate structure. Large interests, communities, and localities, which have been benefited by discriminations, consider it necessary for their well-being that they be continued—even that they have a vested right in their continuance. Conservatism is always slow to adopt changes which are disturbing to established institutions. Reluctance to change long-established practices under which investments have been made and business has been built up has frequently made difficult the removal of inequalities. In the process of deciding complaints inequalities have been condoned or approved and precedents established giving sanction of law to the very practices which the law was intended to condemn.

The Interstate Commerce Commission sits much like a court, deciding rate complaints on the evidence brought before it, according to its best judgment in the light of the legislative policies laid down by Congress and interpreted by the courts. The Commission has succeeded in wiping out many discriminations; many others, however, have been found by the Commission not to be unlawful within the meaning of our present statutes; and still many others have not been touched because they have not been brought formally before the Commission for determination and disposition, or because proof of unlawfulness has not been adequate.

Some technical requirements that must be met to prove that discriminations are unlawful are: first, the conditions under which the transportation service is rendered must be shown to be substantially similar and, second, it must be shown that the discrimination is injurious and, third, the carrier committing the discriminatory act must have the power to correct it. Differences in competitive conditions, and in the degree of competition between carriers are regarded as a justification for inequalities in rates; and, since differences in competitive conditions are the principal cause of discriminatory rates, this makes the motive the justification of the act, and throws the door open for the maintenance of discriminatory practices where the stresses of carrier competition have resulted in granting preferences to localities and industries to the disadvantage of others.

A great obstacle to the removal of discriminations has been that, until recently, very little has been known about the cost of rendering a particular transportation service. It has been known, of course, that costs varied roughly with the distance, but it has been thought that cost per mile varied with the density of traffic, and was higher where the traffic was relatively light, and lower as the volume of traffic became greater. Under this theory, of course, regions of heavy traffic density would be entitled to lower rates than those where traffic had not been built up. Later studies have proved this theory to be false. We know now that the cost of handling traffic a given number of miles averages about the same in one part of the country, as compared with another. In the meantime, however, a great many rate decisions have been handed down approving lower rate levels in regions enjoying heavy density of traffic than in those of lighter traffic density.

Regional rate equalities have caused some of the most serious difficulties. The regional development of the railroads in the East, South, and West, with few railroads crossing the regional boundaries, resulted in the establishment of separate and unlike systems of rates in each of these areas. In the eastern region, extending north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers, from the Mississippi to the Atlantic coast, where population and industrial development were more advanced and widely diffused than in the others, there was an early tendency toward uniformity of rates, and the policy of the railroads was to make rates on raw materials and finished products which were favorable to the production and distribution of manufactured products throughout the territory.

The southern and western roads followed quite different rate-making theories and practices. The southern roads were built from the ocean, Gulf, and river ports into the interior; each road tried to develop traffic to and from its particular ports, moving the raw products of the interior to the ports and manufactured products inward. Later, as the lines interconnected and consolidated, a few main interior railroad centers, such as Atlanta, were given rates competitive with the ports, but generally speaking, rates between interior points in the South were kept on much higher levels than rates to and from the ports. Manufacturing in the South was very limited, so there was little inducement to establish rates for the widespread development of local industries. In individual cases, special rates were made for the products of southern factories. The policy of the southern railroads was to make relatively low rates for the movement of southern raw materials through the ports and gateways, and relatively high rates on manufactured products from the gateways, with still higher rates for local traffic between the small interior points. Where competition existed between rail and water lines, rail rates were drastically lowered to take the business away from the water carriers. There was little semblance of uniformity or equality in the rate structure that grew out of these policies.

In the West, as in the South, rates were made up to encourage the movement of raw materials, with little regard to the development of manufacturing, except in individual instances. The main terminals and gateways were given preferred rates over other points.

Interterritorial rates were not established between any of the regions, except where they were forced by competition. As a rule, the interterritorial rates were the combination of the rates to and from the border point, making a through charge from a point in one territory to a point in another much higher than the rate for similar distance within either of the two territories.

Under the Commission's regulation, rates have become more uniform within each region, but dissimilarities of rates in one region as compared with another have been largely retained. In the three main-rate territories—the South, the East, and the West—these rate dissimilarities have been so great as to constitute a distinct bar to commerce between the regions, and have tended to perpetuate within each region the pattern of development that was already there, with manufacturing predominating in the East and the production of raw materials predominating in the South and West.

During all of this time that rates were becoming established on regional lines, vast and revolutionary economic changes were taking place. Big industries and mass production were supplanting small industries and handcrafts. Farms were becoming mechanized. Our pioneering days were coming to an end. We were losing our export markets for agricultural products, and forced to turn to our own factories, more and more, to use our raw products, to supply our finished goods, and to provide employment. The East was better adapted, economically and by its transportation rate structure to profit by these new conditions than the South and West. The population and the wealth of the country centered more and more in the eastern manufacturing districts, and the disadvantages of the southern and western raw materials-producing areas became relatively greater than ever.

The First World War gave a temporary burst of prosperity to the whole Nation. Agricultural and industrial output greatly expanded, with the industrial expansion mostly in the East. Wages, prices, and rail rates were greatly increased. Transportation demands and shortages made us keenly aware of the need for more and better transportation facilities. Amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act, immediately after the war, placed added responsibilities upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to maintain adequate railroad rate levels and preserve railroad financial credit. Billions of dollars of added capital went into enlargements and improvements of railroad facilities. The Federal Government inaugurated a vastly enlarged program of water navigation improvements. The Panama Canal was opened to commerce. The great fleet of ocean vessels that we had built during the war were put to use in coastwise, foreign, and intercoastal trade. The private automobile came into universal use, and induced us to build a network of hard-surfaced highways all over the Nation. Over these highways, the motor truck, which had come into extensive use for the first time in the war, quickly became an important and indispensable carrier of freight. New pipe lines were built to supply the needs of the motor cars for gasoline. The agricultural boom collapsed with the end of the war, but the expansion of industry and transportation proceeded at a dizzy pace—with the greatest expansion in the East—until the great depression hit us in 1929. Our vastly enlarged transportation now had to try to live on only 50 percent of the 1929 traffic. Waterway and highway facilities continued to expand during the depression, as part of our public-works program, and air carriers, another war baby, aided by public airport and airway construction, began to loom up as a new competitor.

The railroads, alarmed at last over the threat to their supremacy as a near monopolistic transportation agency, began to clamor for increased regulation and taxation of their competitors, for curtailment of the Government program of water and highway improvements, and for greater leeway to allow them to cut rates as they saw fit, to meet competition of water and highway carriers. The railroad rate structure, with relatively high rates on manufactured articles and other traffic, formerly thought to be noncompetitive, was entirely unsuitable for the new competitive conditions. Highway carriers and water carriers stepped in to take the high-rated traffic, and new water routes in the interior took part of the lower-rated bulk traffic. These new competitive conditions were especially disturbing to railroad rates in the South and West, where it appeared they would provide at least a partial remedy for the rate disadvantages of shippers and industries in those areas. With the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the railroads embarked upon a new and vigorous program of cutting rates where necessary to hold their traffic, in the face of the new competition. New rate discriminations appeared. Carrier revenues suffered. The Commission joined with the carriers and shippers, who felt that the new conditions were operating to their disadvantage, in urging more regulation. Congress was persuaded to place the motor carriers, with some exceptions, under regulation of the Commission in 1935, and the water carriers in 1940. Since then, as a means of stabilizing the rate structure, the rates of motor carriers, and to a lesser extent of water carriers, have been made to conform more or less closely to the railroad rate pattern. It is realized, however, that this is a temporary stopgap, and the real problem of devising a rate structure which will permit each type of transportation to develop in its proper economic field and enable shippers to get the benefits of each, remains to be solved.

The Second World War has only temporarily ended the economic problems of the depression. With the close of the war, it will be more important than ever that we have economical and efficient transportation to maintain full production and employment throughout the country. We know now, as we never did before, that we must maintain a transportation plant in this country capable of quick enlargement to handle all peak and emergency loads. It was pure luck that we had a surplus transportation capacity when we entered the war. Without it, we might have lost the war. We cannot afford to trust to luck in such a vital matter in the future. But what are we going to do with all our ships and airplanes, the new barges on the rivers, the new pipe lines, the new trucks and busses, the locomotives and cars that will be built in our war-enlarged factories, as soon as they stop building for war? And how many factories can be kept going, against the handicap of discriminatory freight rates?

Undoubtedly, the public will demand that each form of transportation be given fair opportunity to render the best and cheapest transportation service it is capable of giving. But neither efficiency nor economy comes through cuthroat competition, under which the larger and stronger carriers deprive smaller operators of adequate traffic and thereby increase their costs and decrease their efficiency, and finally force them out of business, while at the same time the stronger carriers weaken themselves by performing uneconomic services at inadequate revenues. Nor does the public benefit by such cut-throat competition, which breeds greater and greater rate discriminations and inequalities, gives the benefit of low rates to shippers and localities where competition for traffic is heaviest, and penalizes those in the lighter-traffic areas, adds to the advantages of those already strong and deprives others of the opportunity to compete.

The establishment of a proper rate structure lies at the heart of the transportation problem and of the economic problems which will immediately confront us as we pass from war to peace. The only rate policy which can possibly give each type of transportation a fair chance to develop, give the public the benefits of the inherent advantages of each type of carrier, and give every industry, throughout all parts of the United States, a fair economic chance to produce and market its products and maintain full employment, is one which will provide uniform treatment for all sections by maintaining rates for every type of commodity and for every length of haul which bear their fair share of the cost incurred by the carrier performing the service.

The Board of Investigation and Research, in a summary report, filed with the President and Congress last spring, House Document No. 145, and in a more voluminous detailed report, filed in the fall, House Document No. 303, found that the existing regional differences in class rates were not justified by differences in cost of rendering the service in the various regions, by differences of the composition of the traffic, or by any other transportation conditions; that, in view of the similarity of these conditions throughout the United States, Congress should amend the Interstate Commerce Act, declaring that it is in the interest of a proper development of the country as a whole to establish a uniform classification of freight and a uniform scale of class rates for transportation of freight by railroad throughout the United States, with only such departures from uniformity in particular cases as may be necessary to provide adequate transportation service or adequate carrier revenues in particular areas, or otherwise to correct inequitable conditions. The Board recommended that the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to prepare a proposed uniform classification and uniform scale of class rates, and after holding hearings giving everybody an opportunity to present their views and criticisms; to establish within 3 years such new uniform classification, and rates, with such exceptions as were found to be justified. It was the Board's view that, without such a specific declaration of policy by Congress, the Commission could hardly be expected within a reasonable period of years to revise the rate structure in a way different from and contrary to the customs and practices, and its own rulings, of the past. After the filing of the Board's report, a number of bills were introduced and are now pending in both Houses of Congress, which are intended to carry out the Board's recommendations. It is expected that hearings will be held on the bills in the near future, by the Interstate Commerce Committees of the House and Senate.

The railroads are bitterly opposing these bills, and through their representatives and spokesmen throughout the country are urging shippers and the public generally to write their Senators and Congressmen, demanding that the bills be defeated. Pamphlets have been published by the Association of American Railroads and by various regional associations, giving their arguments against the bills. A pamphlet reflecting these arguments has also been issued by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Shippers of the Eastern States, actively supported by the Governor of New York, the Governor of Indiana, and other eastern governors and State officials, have organized what they call a National Freight Rate Conference, to oppose these bills in order, according to a recent Indianapolis newspaper story, "to offset the attempts of Southern States to clip by congressional legislation the rate-making powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Opposition has also been expressed to the bills by some spokesmen for southern shippers of heavy commodities, who consider it would be injurious to the movement of their products on special commodity rates if southern rates were equalized with the East. There has even been some opposition voiced on the part of those who are seeking uniform rates for the South, on the ground that legislation should not be attempted while their complaints demanding equalization are pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission for decision.

The railroad arguments are that freight rates are now and must continue to be made to meet the varying needs of commerce and shippers throughout the country; that the present rates encourage manufacturing, as well as the production of raw materials in the South and West; that the proposed bills would freeze the rate structure into an arbitrary, rigid, uniform pattern under which commerce could not move; that raw material rates would be increased drastically from southern and western producing points to eastern markets; while rates on manufactured goods would be drastically reduced. This, it is urged, would enable eastern manufacturers to take the business away from southern and western manufacturers in their local markets, and both the raw materials and finished goods of the South and West would stop moving; and thus, according to the arguments, everybody, including the railroads, would be ruined. The industrial interests in the Eastern States agree generally with the railroad arguments, except they deny that the eastern manufacturers would gain any advantages over southern and western manufacturers. They fear, on the contrary, that the eastern manufacturers would be put out of business through the loss of their present rate advantages, and that this would cause a shifting of industry from the East to the South and the West. Aside from this inconsistency, the opponents are unanimous in condemning the bills as a vicious form of political or legislative rate-making, and that Congress, by usurping the functions and overriding the policies of the Interstate Commerce Commission, would cause great injury to the commerce of the country, which has been built up under the present rate system.

These arguments, it seems to me, quite obviously misrepresent what these bills are and what they would accomplish. To charge that a declaration of transportation policy by Congress would be political rate-making overlooks the fact that Congress has the sole power and duty to declare transportation policy, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is a creature of Congress, has no power to act except through the directions given to it by Congress through specific legislation. The Interstate Commerce Act, in its entirety, is nothing but a declaration by Congress of transportation policy and of the manner in which it shall be carried out. The proposed bills would not take away from the Interstate Commerce Commission its powers, but would simply give the Commission the policy under which it is to act, leaving to the Commission the carrying out of that policy—which is just what all of the other provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act do at the present time. It is equally absurd to contend that the bills would require the substitution of an arbitrary, inflexible system of rate-making, unsuited to the needs of commerce, for a flexible, workable system which is designed to meet commercial needs. The bills would only require uniformity of rates where no good reason exists for inequality. They would merely give practical effect to the long-recognized, but long-violated, principle of equality of opportunity by substituting the rule of equal rates for equal services for the rule of charging all the traffic will bear; and by substituting for the rule that discriminations are right unless they are proved to be unlawful, the rule that discriminations are unlawful unless they are shown to be right. Such a rule of rate making could be harmful only to those who enjoy unwarranted preferences and advantages.

What about the argument that the present system of rates has promoted manufacturing, as well as raw-material production in the South and West? You have heard it stated that the South is developing industrially by leaps and bounds, that during the past 20 years it has had greater relative growth of industry than any other part of the country; that present freight rates do not discriminate against southern manufacturers or keep their products out of the East, but are protecting southern manufacturers against the competition of the eastern manufacturers in southern territory. What are the facts?

The comparative development of the South and East, as of the year 1939—the last pre-war year—may help to give you the answer. The figures I shall give for the South are for the eight Southeastern States comprising southern rate territory—Louisiana and Virginia are not included because Louisiana is mostly in southwestern rate territory, and Virginia is mostly in eastern rate territory. For the East, I have taken the States from Wisconsin and Illinois east, and north of the Ohio River, including Virginia and West Virginia, which comprise eastern rate territory.

Southern territory comprises 13 percent of the Nation's area. It contains 16 percent of the population and 16 percent of the gainful workers of the country. Eastern territory has 15 percent of the area, 53 percent of the population, and 55 percent of the gainful workers. The East, with an area only slightly greater, has more than three times as many people and gainful occupations as the South. This is not because the South lacks natural resources, but because the East is a highly developed manufacturing area and the South is not. The South provides employment for about the same number of men as the East in producing raw materials—each area employs 39 percent of the United States total. But in manufacturing and construction, the South employs only 12 percent and the East 69 percent of the United States total. The South has more farmers than the East—30½ percent of the Nation's total is in the South and 26½ percent in the East. The South has a few more workers in forestry and fishing than the East—the percentages being 56 for the South and 34 for the East. But in mining the South falls far below the East—13 percent of the Nation's total is in the South and 54 percent in the East. This is not because the South lacks minerals.

The coal resources of both areas are of high quality and practically unlimited in quantity. But the coal production of the South is only one-eighth of the production of the East, and more than half of the South's relatively small coal production is shipped to eastern consumers. Of the all-important industrial mineral, iron, the South's natural resources are far ahead of the East's. The South's iron-ore reserves are more than one and one-half billion tons, greater even than Minnesota's. The East's iron resources are negligible—the ore for its steel industry comes from Minnesota. Yet, the South converts less than one-tenth as much iron ore into steel as the East. Over a third of the South's scanty iron and steel production consists of pig iron. Nearly a fourth of that is shipped to the East as a raw material for further manufacture. The South's whole production of iron and steel is substantially less than its consumption—which is only 6 percent of the national consumption—whereas the East produces nearly 90 percent of the Nation's iron and steel, and consumes nearly 80 percent.

In dollar values of things produced, the disparities between the South and the East are striking. Here are the figures: In 1939, the South's gross agricultural income was 16 percent of the United States total. The agricultural income of the East was 34 percent of the country's total—the East's farm products were worth more than twice those of the South. The East's forest products had a value slightly more than those of the South, the South's percentage of the United States total was 23 and the East's 24. The mineral products of the East had six times the value of the minerals of the South. In total value of raw materials, the East was nearly three times as well off as the South; the southern percentage being 13 and the East's 34, of the United States total. The value of the South's manufactured products was only 8 percent of the United States total, and of the eastern manufacturers, 72 percent. In total value of raw and manufactured products combined, the South had 9 percent of the Nation's total and the East, 65 percent. This corresponds with the percentages of income in the two areas, which were for the South 9 percent, and for the East 64 percent of the United States total.

This situation is, of course, reflected in the volume and character of the South's railroad tonnage, as compared with the East. The Board's study of railroad traffic moving in 1939 show that the South shipped only 12 percent of the national rail tonnage, and received only 10 percent. A third of the tonnage shipped went outside of the South and 20 percent of the tonnage received came from outside of the South. The East shipped 60 percent of the Nation's total tonnage, of which only 5 percent went outside the East. It received 64 percent of the Nation's tonnage, of which only 11 percent came from outside the East. Further light on the South's relatively small outflow and inflow, and its relative dependence upon outside markets, both for its raw materials and finished products, and on the relative self-sufficiency of the East, is gained by looking at the tonnage of raw materials, semiraw and processed commodities, and finished manufactures. In the raw-materials group, the South shipped 12 percent of the Nation's total and 36 of its production went outside of the South. The East's production of raw materials was 61 percent of the Nation's total, and only 3 percent was shipped out. Of semiraw and processed materials, the South produced 15 percent of the Nation's total, and shipped out 25 percent of that; the East produced 48 percent and shipped out only 6 percent. In the finished manufactured articles group, the South produced only 7 percent of the Nation's total, and, even of that small production, shipped out 45 percent, whereas the East produced 76 percent of the national tonnage of finished goods and sent only 14 percent of that outside of its own territory. It is true that, during the past 20 or 30 years, some lines of manufacturing in the South have had a substantial growth, but the southern manufacturing industries which comprise a sizable proportion of the Nation's total are relatively few.

The greatest growth, according to the traffic statistics, has occurred in the textiles, tobacco, furniture, a few kinds of paper and pulpboard, and aluminum. Desirable as these additions to the South's manufacturing production have been, they still fall far short of what would seem to be the South's reasonable possibilities in these lines. About 40 percent of the raw cotton of the South and Southwest (other than export), shipped in 1939, moved north for manufacturing, and a large part of the South's textiles consist of the rougher and simpler fabrics—the North still leads in the manufacture of the finer finished goods. The East manufactures more tobacco than the South—a third of the South's tobacco leaf is still shipped north for manufacturing. The South is better supplied with the raw materials for furniture manufacturing than is the East, but the South produces, in terms of tonnage, only a third of the furniture, other than metal, and only 7 percent of the metal furniture. The East produces more than half of the furniture, other than metal, and more than three-fourths of the metal furniture.

The South produces 18 percent of the wrapping paper, 25 percent of the paper board, 10 percent of the building paper; the East produces 59 percent of the wrapping paper and bags, 53 percent of the paper board, 75 percent of the building paper, and practically monopolizes the production of high-grade paper and paper articles. The South and the East together make most of the aluminum of the country. The South ships its aluminum to the East for manufacturing; aluminum articles are made almost exclusively in the East. The South ships most of its peanuts to the East, and buys back from the East its peanut candy and other peanut products. The South's cottonseed oil goes north for production into soap and food products. The South produces 20 percent of the fruits and vegetables of the country, as compared with 21 percent produced in the East. But the South produces less than 4 percent of the canned food products, and the East produces 55 percent.

These figures make clear where the South's troubles lie. Its manufacturing production is very low in relation to the East. Its lack of factories limits its production of raw materials, especially of minerals and high-grade agricultural products, limits its population and its job opportunities, and cuts its average income, per employed person and per capita, to less than half of that of the East. The South has two workers producing raw materials to one producing manufactured goods. That does not mean that the South is producing too many raw materials—its raw material tonnage is in fact far below the East's—but simply that it is not manufacturing enough, even, of the raw materials it produces. The East has three workers engaged in manufacturing to one producing raw materials, but the East has as many raw materials workers as the South, and the value of their products is three times the value of the Southern raw products. The East is using its raw products, as well as a substantial percentage of the raw products of the South and the West, and by so doing provides in one corner of our country, containing only 15 percent of the area and not disproportionately supplied with natural resources, more than 53 percent of our people with better jobs and higher incomes than any other part of the United States.

In order to attain a comparable prosperity, the South needs to increase its production of raw materials; it needs greater and more diversified agricultural production; it needs, above all, to convert more of its raw materials in to finished products.

Someone may point to the new war industries which have been established in the South and say the picture I have been giving you of your economic development is now out of date. It is true you have more industrial plants now than you had in 1939, but so has the East and so has the West. The relative situation has not substantially changed. Proportionately, more war factories have been located in the East than anywhere else, and, according to a recent study of the Census Bureau, there has been a net loss of industrial workers from the South and gain in the East, since the war began.

If the South is to develop diversified manufacturing, conditions must be attractive for small miscellaneous industries of all kinds, as well as for large industries. In terms of freight rate, every manufacturer, no matter where he is located, should have, as nearly as possible, equal treatment compared with his competitor in shipping both raw materials and finished products. In the East, such a rate policy prevails now and has prevailed for years. As a general rule, any manufacturer, large or small, shipping between any two points in Eastern territory, has a mile-to-mile parity, or an approximate parity of rates on his inbound raw materials and on his outbound finished products. In the South, on the other hand, favorable rates on either raw materials or finished products must be obtained by individual negotiation and voluntary concessions granted by the carriers, or through long-drawn-out, expensive proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The long-standing policy of southern railroads of making rates individually for each industry, on the basis of what they think the traffic will bear, is unfavorable to the growth of miscellaneous manufacturing, especially small manufacturing, throughout the area.

It is my opinion that a congressional declaration of policy requiring the removal of rate inequities would be beneficial, rather than harmful, to carriers and shippers of all kinds, as well as to the general public in every part of the country. Such a declaration would help, rather than hamper, the Interstate Commerce Commission in carrying out its duties, because it would provide a definite rule of rate making, giving clear authority to depart from the outworn traditions, precedents, and findings of the past. It would help the South and the West, by affording them greater opportunity to develop their unused natural resources, provide greater employment, and higher incomes and standards of living. It would help the East, because the East cannot permanently prosper if the development and prosperity of the rest of the Nation are retarded. Greater production and higher living standards in the South and West mean more business and more customers, in the long run, for eastern business. It would help the railroads and the other carriers, because greater production and higher living standards would mean more traffic, and the elimination of discriminatory rates would provide fair opportunity and fair compensation to every carrier.

I think it is, therefore, of very great importance at the present time that you in the South should continue to support your Senators and Congressmen, your governors and State officials, and shippers' organizations who are fighting against discriminatory freight rates; that you should urge, and enlist if possible, the support of people in other parts of the country who believe in the doctrine of equality of opportunity, as an economic as well as a political principle; that you should ask for this support, not only in the West but in the East, and among railroad and other transportation men, as well as from citizens generally; that you should ask the railroads, and other supporters of the propaganda against the pending anti-freight-rate-discrimination bills, to reexamine their arguments against the bills, and if they find that their arguments are false or mistaken, to withdraw them. There should be no sectionalism, no partisanship, no strife between big shippers and small, or between railroads and shippers or between railroads and other carriers, in the determination of a sound transportation policy for our country. And you should let your Senators and Congressmen know that you will support the efforts that they make to establish fair and nondiscriminatory rates throughout the whole United States.

The B–29 Fortress Attack on Yawata, Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, one of the most vivid and interesting stories of the present war, which has come to my attention, appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune of June 17, 1944. It is entitled "Eyewitness Writer Tells of Yawata Bomb Attack—Utahan Navigates super-Fortress in Raid on Jap Works."

This article tells the story of one of our B–29 super-Fortresses from the time it left its China base, made the trip to its target at Yawata and returned. Boys from all sections of the United States were members of its crew.

The article is doubly interesting to me because 25-year-old Capt. Reimar Peterson, of Gunnison, Utah, was the navigator of this great super-Fortress. His home, Gunnison, Utah, is a quiet country town of not more than 1,000 inhabitants; and when it is remembered that these country boys so recently taken from their country homes have, in such a short time, mastered the technicalities and the engineering problems necessary to pilot and navigate a super-Fortress from a China base to Japan and back, it is almost incomprehensible. However, the magnificent job that our American boys did on this great bombing mission to Japan indicates without question that they have mastered these difficult problems; that they have become the greatest technicians in the war; that their fine technical training combined with incomporable equipment and the dauntless courage that every American fighting man is noted for makes them the masters of the enemy whenever and wherever they meet him.

I am sure that every Senator will get a thrill out of reading this wonderful story.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the story be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WRITER TELLS OF YAWATA BOMB ATTACK—UTAHAN NAVIGATES SUPER-FORTRESS IN RAID ON JAP WORKS

(By Clay Gowran)

ABOARD A B–29 SUPER-FORTRESS OVER THE YELLOW SEA, June 16.—The super-Fortress Nightmare has just carried me away from the flak-spangled, searchlight-swept skies over Yawata, Japan.

Behind us as we settle down on our return flight is a blazing cauldron of fire which was Japan's largest iron and steel works, producing one-fifth of her high-grade steel. In the longest raid in the history of the war United States superbombers have just struck for the second time at the sacred mainland of Japan.

The Nightmare is one of the super-Fortresses of the previously secret Twentieth Bomber Command, which for more than a year had been grooming planes and crews for what happened Tuesday night.

It was worth waiting for—those 4 minutes we spent in our bombing run, pinioned by a half dozen searchlights and tossed and rolled by countless flashing bursts of heavy caliber antiaircraft guns.

FLAMES CLIMB HIGH

So was the sight of the great plant several thousand feet below us in the crystal-clear sky, belching great surges of flame some hundreds of feet into the air as it was blasted by the guns of our American bombers.

This probably will be a very unpolished story, but who could remember all the details of a trip to hell and back at some 200 miles an hour? I am writing at the corner of the navigator's table with a pineapple-juice crate for a seat and a hooded black-out light for my only illumination.

Ahead of us stretches more than a thousand miles of danger and hazards before we reach our home base. We have stirred up a hornets' nest. Now we have to go home through it.

To watch the crew of this plane you would think that bombing Japan was just an ordinary day's business.

The plane's commander is 28-year-old Lt. Col. Robert B. Sullivan, Los Angeles, who looks much older than he is, because of the 900 combat hours he flew in a B–17 during 7 months of service in the South Pacific.

COPILOT'S FIRST RAID

The copilot is Lt. Robert R. Marshall, 24, Champaign, Ill., who is just as calm despite the fact that this is his first raid, although he has been flying for the Army for 3 years.

We have just finished fighting the Japs and now we have another bitter battle on our hands. That is the fight to get home, to make our gas stretch out to cover all these hundreds of miles of Yellow Sea and occupied China which lie between us and safety. The pilots sit nursing every extra foot out of every gallon of gas.

Behind them, Flight Officer Calvin Hagins, 26, Johnstown, Pa., our flight engineer, glues his eyes to his instrument panel watching head temperatures, air speed, and his other precious indicators. Beside me sits Capt. Reimar Peterson, 25, Gunnison, Utah, checking and double checking his navigator's charts.

Others of the Nightmare's crew are Lt. Walter Dinnison, 27, Pierce Idaho, bombardier; Lt. Eddie Williams, 22, York, S. C.; and Lt. Maurice Blum, 27, New York City, whose occupations are secret.

WAITING WEEKS

Correspondents and the crews of the Superfortresses had been waiting for weeks for action. Finally, Thursday noon it came. We were called together in a rough briefing hut surrounded by closely spaced sentries. Col. Richard Carmichael, Austin, Tex., and Olean, N. Y., the good-looking, 31-year-old commander of the group to which I was assigned, gave it to us simply.

"Gentlemen, you have been waiting a long time for someone to say, 'Tonight we attack Japan.' That time has come. Tonight your target is the Imperial Iron & Steel Works at Yawata on the north tip of Kyushu. There you will find tremendous coke ovens, huge rolling mills, and great open-hearth furnaces. It is the largest works of its kind in Japan. Destroy it."

From maps we learned more about Yawata. It lay on the sickle-shaped Maeda anchorage of important Wakamatau Harbor. Around it were railroad tracks for supplying it, and the anchorage itself provided facilities for ships bringing in raw materials and embarking with unfinished war products. We would make our approach from the northwest, striking inland across the anchorage and over the tracks, and drop our loads on the works itself. It was a target we could not miss, open-hearth furnaces to the left, converters to the right, and great coking ovens in the dead center of our target run.

START IN RAIN

Late Thursday, in dreary, rainy weather, we climbed aboard the Nightmare at its China base. Probably the biggest thrill, next to the actual bombing, was getting the Nightmare's far more than 100,000 pounds off the soggy runway built for her and the others of her brood by 95,000 Chinese laborers.

As Sullivan gunned her west, we sat taut in our positions. She gained speed so slowly. Marshall's voice came over the interphone, "80 miles an hour, 90, 100, 110." A warning cry came from Hagins, "Cylinder head temperatures, No. 2 engine, approaching danger point."

With only hundreds of feet of runway left, she lifted, bounced, then lifted again and staggered off over the ditches and bushes marking the end of the strip.

A word about the Nightmare herself. Sullivan and his crew gave her the name because they say she was destined to keep the enemy awake.

On her streamlined nose is the body of a beautiful, unclad girl. But in place of a girl's head is the ghastliest horse's head imaginable with a foaming mouth and ugly red eyes.

The flight to Japan was uneventful. Gaining altitude we swung almost due east and settled down to the long grind as night swept down over China's terraced hillsides below us.

HITCHHIKING FLY

Tambascio nudged me and pointed to a housefly crawling across his desk. "He doesn't know where he's going. Sure picked a hell of a wagon for a ride." I watched the fly. I could sympathize with him. I began to wonder what I was doing here.

During almost 8 dreary hours to the target we listened to music obligingly transmitted by radio Tokyo and radio Saigon. Shortly after reaching the China coast we picked up radio Shanghai. Apparently the Japs never knew we were coming because Tokyo played on the air during the entire raid.

About 10 p. m., (western China time) we reached the Yellow Sea and saw lighthouse beacons flashing off the right wing. Then hours later came a sharp bank to the right. We had reached tiny Okino Island, off the coast of Kyushu, our destination.

We caught our first glimpse of what lay in store. A red ball of fire 10 miles inland showed that other bombers had visited the steel works before us. Searchlights combed the skies and bursting antiaircraft shells lit up the sky.

Dinnison's voice came on the interphone, "Navigator, how long to the target?" Peterson answered "Eleven minutes."

We closed our prominent lights and the fire ceased, then by ones and twos the searchlights came on again, reaching with long tentacles of silver.

FIRE PLAINLY VISIBLE

The fire at the plant was plainly visible now. It seemed to have spread over a vast acreage. Occasionally a blast would send flames leaping hundreds of feet toward us.

"Steady on target run," called Dinnison, crouched over the bombsight. Standing between the two pilots, I watched the searchlights. Two formed in front of us and seemed sure to get us, but at the last moment swung open and we passed through untouched.

Suddenly our plexiglass nose glowed as a light somewhere ahead caught us. Immediately five others swung and pinned us, then the guns opened up. Unable to deviate from the bombing run, we had to sit there and take it.

Looking ahead, I saw at least a dozen heavy caliber guns flashing. Red tracers from smaller guns flicked by. The sharp rack of shells bursting around us smacked our eardrums. The ship quivered and tossed in the turmoil of the barrage. With a shower of sparks and flame something hit us.

For ages we held our course, the pilots crouched in the cockpit to keep from being blinded by those damned lights which never lost us. Finally Sullivan's voice came, "Are bombs away, Dinnison?" No answer. Again Sullivan, "Are bombs away?"

TASK COMPLETED

Then followed Dinnison's voice, "Yes, sir. Sorry, my interphone came undone." "O. K., let's get the hell out of here," said Sullivan.

With the lights still on us we pulled up sharply to the right, then dropped in a steep bank. Reluctantly the lights left us and the guns quieted, one by one. Our aft guns chattered and the last light flicked out as Chapman's excited voice came over the interphone, "I got that —— right down the center of the beam."

Nose down, we poured on coal and roared away from Yawata as its fires grew fainter and fainter in the night. Occasional new bursts of flame showed other superbombers at work behind us, hammering Japan where it hurts most.

FIRES VISIBLE AFAR

Breshears at the tail guns reported that lurid explosions and towering flames from the steel works were still visible when we were 100 miles from the target. Every few moments great blossoms of fire would bloom skyward.

But we had other worries. Worriedly chewing his lip, Peterson moved his pencil along the line of our homing course. In the dim light I watched that 5-cent wooden pencil cross the Yellow Sea and the coast of China, wend its way slowly through occupied China, and finally mark an X far, far away across the map. That marked our base.

In turns the rest of us sipped pineapple juice and munched on the inevitable Spam sandwiches. As we ate, there in the depths of the super-Fortress, we talked about the raid. The biggest question was, Why were there no Jap fighter planes around? The conclusion was that the big American bombers had caught Japan and gone before protection could be got up.

As we sat and talked and dozed, the Nightmare droned on and on westward into the night.

NEW WORRIES AT DAWN

The remaining night hours provided slight relaxation for the Nightmare's exhausted crew. The plane was wrapped in stormy weather and, barring collision with another super-Fortress or a wandering Jap interceptor, we were fairly safe, but dawn brought new worries.

Daybreak caught us still deep in Jap-held China. With no other friendly Chinese anywhere in sight, we waited gloomily for the swarms of Jap fighters that we thought surely would come. A few minutes later Dinnison gave a strangled cry over the interphone and pointed directly down. There, only about 6,000 feet below, was a Jap airfield, the big runway bordered with interlacing taxi strips and revetments.

But apparently the Japs were still unaware or ignoring the fact that we had blown their biggest steel works off the map. Not once during the grueling trip home did we sight an enemy ship. Finally, worn out by the weight of the heavy combat gear we wore, we began shedding, and there was a lot to shed. Flak helmets, calk vests, life vests, parachutes, first aid kits, canteens, jungle kits, flight helmets. We had gone in on Japan prepared to walk or row back if necessary.

LIKE SLEEPWALKER

About 6 a. m., Marshall crawled back into the navigator's compartment for a moment. At the controls since the previous afternoon without a minute off, he looked like a sleepwalker. Hanging at his dials and switches seemed to have aged him years in those interminable hours.

Shortly before 8 a. m., hoping for the best, we started to let down from 10,000 feet through heavy cloud layers. Again the Nightmare's luck held. Just as we broke out of the overcast and picked up the grayish, rainswept hills of China, Tambascio suddenly jumped to life at his radio. A few minutes later he crawled forward to Sullivan with a big smile across his tired Italian face. He had contacted the base and been given homing directions.

We knew where we were. An airfield, hot coffee, ham and eggs were waiting for us a few miles farther on.

The Nightmare had taken her 13 men to Japan and brought us home again.

Captain Peterson is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Peterson and husband of Mrs. Maralene Henry Peterson, all of Gunnison, Utah.

He entered the armed forces in October, 1940, trained in California and Florida and was assigned overseas in November, 1942, according to his parents.

He was stationed in the Southwest Pacific theater of war, serving in the Solomon islands and participating in the American raid on Midway, they said.

"We can't describe the pride we feel in knowing our boy participated in Thursday's historic raid," his mother said when informed of her son's exploits.

The Theaters and War Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by the Theaters Division of the War Activities Committee of the War Manpower Commission, calling attention to the splendid work which is being done by the theaters of this country in connection with war activities.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There are approximately 17,000 motion-picture theaters now operating full or part time in the United States, of which 16,432 are members of the theaters division, war activities committee.

When the present global conflict commenced, approximately 50,000 theaters equipped for motion-picture sound projection were in operation throughout the world. Slightly more than one-third of the world total was in the United States.

It is estimated that in 1943, American theaters communicated with an audience which purchased 90,000,000 paid admissions each week.

The total average weekly attendance in civilian theaters in 1944 bids fair to be even larger while United States Army theaters will reach a uniformed audience of 200,000,000 soldiers in domestic training camps and bases.

Each year some 500 new feature-length films, 700 short subjects of 1 or 2 reels each, and 520 single reels of news released at the rate of 10 issues per week, enter the stream of current exhibition.

American theaters have also included in their regular programs during 1941-44 informational films made by the Office of War Information, by the industry upon themes suggested by the O. W. I., and the armed services.

This war information is released weekly through the industry's war activities committee which has pledges from 16,432 exhibitors that they will transmit to their theater audiences such information pertaining to the war which the Government deems important to victory.

Feature pictures shown on theater screens since Pearl Harbor and acclaimed alike by film critics and popular audiences have included such outstanding films as White Cliffs of Dover, Destination Tokyo, North Star, This Is the Army, The Human Comedy, Watch on the Rhine, So Proudly We Hail, Stage Door Canteen, Air Force, The Moon Is Down, Journey for Margaret, Sahara, Victory Through Air Power, Hitler's Children, Saludos Amigos, Mrs. Miniver, Random Harvest, Wake Island, Captains of the Clouds, and Eagle Squadron.

Similarly, among the 683 short subjects entering the channels of wartime theatrical communication were the following dealing either with themes pertinent to the war effort or important in their own right as contributions to general information and inspiration: Alcan Highway, Amphibian Fighters, Army Chaplain, Leathernecks on Parade, Letter to a Hero, Private Smith, Seventh Column, Silver Wings, Task Force, This Is Fort Dix, Women at War, Health for Defense, Main Street on the March, The Spirit of Democracy, The Battle for Oil, Flag of Mercy, West Point on the Hudson, and Soldiers in White.

A study of the 520 reels of news transmitted to the theate. audience during 1943 reveals that there were more than 4,000 separate pictorial subjects of clips, encompassing 1,446 different news events of national importance.

Of these clips, 39.8 percent portrayed activities of the fighting forces of the United Nations on global battle fronts; 19.6 percent dealt with United States armed forces at home; 7.7 percent brought vital messages from war agencies or other home-front news to the screen; 7.4 percent reported on war production in the arsenal of democracy; 3.9 percent pictured events among our good neighbors in Latin America and elsewhere; and 21.6 percent (11 percent of total footage) was on nonwar themes.

As extracurricula activities of United States theaters in wartime, it might be cited that during the Third War Loan Drive the theater industry was credited with War bond sales of $1,909,889,196.

In 1943 three major theater collections resulted as follows:

Infantile paralysis	$2,122,340.37
Red Cross	4,122,008.27
United Nations relief	1,625,000.00

In 1944 the collections from the infantile paralysis campaign exceeded $4,000,000, and the Red Cross moving picture collections were in excess of $6,000,000.

The moving-picture industry was credited with selling more than 12,000,000 E bonds during the Fourth War Loan.

Presently the industry is participating in the Fifth War Loan campaign which continues from June 12 to July 8, 1944.

In addition to their day-in-day-out sales job, the theaters prepared bond premiere performances at which new pictures were shown without charge to buyers of E, F, and G bonds as a price admission, the entire cost of the showing being absorbed by the theaters and the owners of the film.

The war activities committee of the motion picture industry spent in the sale of War bonds during the first four bond campaigns $396,000 of the industry's money for the national campaigns. The thousands of local campaigns conducted by individual exhibitors in their communities cost hundreds of thousands more.

The action of the British Government in reopening the motion picture theaters of Great Britain within a few days after the outbreak of the present war, in spite of the destruction wrought by bombs and fire and the continuing danger to life and limb, again dramatized the indispensability of the motion picture in maintaining and strengthening wartime morale.

Out of a total of 5,835 motion-picture theaters in Great Britain, 5,231 are now open in spite of the destruction wrought by bombings.

The increasing importance of the communication services rendered by the theaters is demonstrated by the current action of the War Production Board in authorizing the construction of 48 new theaters in critical areas where additional thousands of workers for war plants are congregated.

The motion picture is one of a community's most important and generally used meeting places. In addition to employment as an entertainment and communication medium the average motion picture theater is used as a meeting place for civic groups and for every variety of civic endeavor.

Chairman Paul V. McNutt, Federal Security Administrator, on June 3, 1944, wrote the War Activities Committee:

"We are working on a plan for the recognition of some of the communities and industries which have made particular contributions to the war effort in the organization and utilization of their local manpower resources.

"As you know, the War Manpower Commission has given broad authority to its local offices in working out their own manpower problems. In Washington, over-all policies and procedures are established. Our 12 regional W. M. C. offices—and through them, area and State offices—have full initiative and responsibility for application of these policies to local situations. While we continue to guide the national manpower program from Washington, we have found that communities have shown outstanding ability in meeting their labor needs through the organization of management-labor committees and cooperative controls.

"We have in mind the development of a series of recognition programs which are to be known as National Salutes to Manpower. We have specifically in mind the recognition of outstanding work accomplished by several industries. Among these we should like to give credit nationally to the motion-picture industry for its achievement in aiding the mobilization of manpower for the war effort. This includes not only the producers, stars, and exhibitors, but the rank and file of the industry itself, who have made it possible to carry forward the important calls for manpower.

"In line with the War Manpower Commission's plan to recognize other communities and industries throughout the country, we are considering a salute to the entire motion-picture industry through a public celebration staged at your convenience. I would like to have some of our people discuss this with you with a view to setting some of our plans into action."

Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, in a meeting at the Willard Hotel in Washington, stated to a thousand community leaders:

"Military morale cannot be separated from civilian morale. It is dangerous for us to rely too much on military equipment. All armament must be backed and inspired by invincible resources of the human soul."

Hon. Frank Knox, former Secretary of the Navy, on the same occasion, stated:

"Nations survive not alone because they possess implements of war or masses of men, but because they possess indispensable morale. Those who are dealing with the strengthening of national morale are engaged in a national defense effort as vital as any."

The importance of military morale to victory in war was appropriately emphasized by Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff.

"No matter how fine and how abundant your equipment, if you do not have morale you might as well save your money. My daily mail emphasizes that morale is the crux of our problem."

On December 18, 1941, the President of the United States addressed the following letter to Hon. Lowell Mellett, appointing him as Coordinator of Government Films:

"The American motion picture is one of our most effective media in informing and entertaining our citizens * * * I want no restrictions placed thereon which will impair the usefulness of the film, other than those very necessary restrictions which the dictates of safety make imperative."

Pensions and Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, taxation is one of the most important things engaging our attention at this particular time for upon the way we use our tax moneys will depend the future prosperity of this country. There is nothing that we can turn our attention to that is of more importance. Most people believe, as I do, that taxation should be a beneficent thing, helping all the people, not a penalty imposed upon us. A genuine gross income tax is the fairest, most just, and useful tax that can be conceived. I have given deep study to the analysis of the sales tax, that is coming to be looked upon as the only salvation of our debt-ridden country.

A genuine sales tax should be one that would tax everybody at the same rate on whatever they sold for profit; the laborer and the white-collar worker on their wages or salaries, and the manufacturer and wholesalers, as well as the great service organizations should be compelled to pay at the same rate on what they sell for profit. There is sound sense in this contention. There is one thing that we must all use if we are making a living; that is the public market. There is nowhere else that we can sell that through which we make a living. So the use we make of the market—the dollar sales we make in it—should be the basis upon which our tax should be levied. The laborer who sells his labor for $5 a day should pay the same rate only as the millionaire who sells a thousand dollars' worth of goods or services in the market each day. If every individual and every business organization in the country paid at the same rate on their gross sales the rate could be very low and the revenue enormous. No one would escape paying his just share. Obviously, the gross income tax is nothing more nor less than a genuine gross sales tax imposed upon all incomes alike. This, Mr. Speaker, is sound reasoning.

Now what is done with our tax moneys is of profound importance to all of us. Yet how little we know, or seem to care, what is done with them. There is one thing that tax money should be compelled to do at all times, that is, to build and maintain an ever-expanding market demand for goods and services. Without an ever-expanding market, our modern, expanding, scientific production will run away ahead of our consuming ability and we shall have to shut down on production until consumption catches up. These shutdowns throw men out of work. When men in large numbers are thrown out of work, their buying power disappears and the market suffers. When the market suffers for customers, everybody suffers, people are afraid to venture on new enterprises, all of us pinch our pennies and dollars and we have a depression.

So the advocates of the gross-income tax say that we should set aside a certain percent of our tax moneys for the purpose of insuring a steadily growing market for everything that we have to sell. They demand that 3 percent of all the gross volume of tax money collected should be turned into the channels of trade each month through the hands of that portion of our population who are classified as unemployable. They claim, and justly, that if society will not employ the helpless ones it should at least put them in position to help build the market by giving them a liberal allowance each month and see to it that the allowance is spent for goods and services. It matters not who spends money. What does matter is that money must be spent by this Nation in ever-growing amounts if we are to keep producing in ever-growing quantity.

So these good people are insisting that we adopt a new insurance idea. They say, "Let us have a national, mutual, endowment insurance for all citizens, protecting them from birth to death against the hazards of life, such as sickness, crippling accidents, the feebleness of old age—any and all things that incapacitate people from earning a living." They would have us collect a special tax on all gross incomes to maintain this insurance. They say that according to census reports there are about 12 percent of our people who are classified as unemployable, if all the old above 69 are included. This 12 percent are now denied access to the market except in a very limited way. The market suffers accordingly. To give them a liberal insurance allowance which they would be required to spend in the market would stimulate the market in every nook and corner of our country, for this 12 percent of the population who are unemployable are found everywhere. What a market we could have if every community found itself receiving each month a liberal income from the 12 percent of the community who are now helpless so far as building the market is concerned.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the International Labor Organization now holding its conferences in Philadelphia are advocating the same principles that this group is advocating, namely, abolition of all poverty, the spending of money by everybody, and a social order in which every citizens would have an equal opportunity to develop his talents to the utmost. In essence they advocate the very principles that the Townsendites are advocating. Yet, like so many of our post-war planning bodies they enunciate principles but fail to show us how to put those principles into operation.

There is a bill in Congress which suggests how to do it, H. R. 1649. Yet the Congress has turned up its nose at this legislative proposal without giving it more than a cursory glance. And I suppose it will continue to do so in the way of all legislative bodies, until a national calamity overtakes us that will scare the living daylights out of us, just as the war did a few years ago.

What a chance there is now for a few wise men to step forward and guide the destiny of our country into peaceful and prosperous ways. What a yawning abyss awaits us if statesmanship is lacking. Our country entailed a loss of not less than a trillion dollars worth of business during the 12 years of depression, which wise statesmen might have averted. The effects of the depression were the direct cause of this world war in which we are ensnared and which will cost us in the long run another trillion dollars. Is it not about time that we should begin to consider ways and means of insuring ourselves against depressions and the wars that bring on depressions? Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to study a national insurance plan against depressions and wars; against want and misery and ignorance and crime; a plan that will come as near to bringing about the world of brotherhood, so sought after at this time, as it is possible for us to find.

Oklahoma's Soldier's Vote Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to call the attention of the House to the new soldier's voting law, recently passed by the Oklahoma State Legislature at the instance of Gov. Robert Kerr.

I believe it sets a new note in attempting to guarantee to all the men and women in the armed services of this Nation from Oklahoma their chance to vote a full State and Federal ballot in both the primary and general elections.

It amends our State law in many particulars and particularly makes it easy for every soldier to vote. Any relative or even friend can ask that ballots be sent to any Oklahoma soldier and it will be sent. State and county election boards will check carefully to avoid duplication.

Through a very ingenious folding ballot, perfected by Hon. William Cordell, secretary of the Oklahoma Election Board, the full ballot will be mailed and returned, all in one compact ballot.

Because of Governor Kerr's strong influence in securing passage of such an excellent and liberal vote law and because of his clear explanation of it, I am inserting it in the RECORD herewith:

VOTES FOR OUR BOYS

I share the pride and gratitude of all Oklahomans for the Oklahoma war-ballot law, which was passed at the extraordinary session of the nineteenth legislature and approved by me as Governor on April 19, 1944. This war-ballot law is quite lengthy, but is simple in operation, and in my opinion is one of the best laws of its kind passed by any State in the Union. It makes it very easy for the following to vote: Members of the armed forces of the United States, all the merchant marines of the United States, those serving in the American Red Cross, Society of Friends, Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, or any unit service organization attached to and serving with the armed forces. The law also applies to the husband or wife of any of the above-mentioned persons.

REGISTRATION NOT NECESSARY

Registration is not necessary under the provisions of the act. The voter is entitled to vote in any regular primary, special or general election for electors of the President and Vice President of the United States, United States Senator, Representative in Congress, or State officers, including members of the State legislature, and all county officers who are nominated and elected by the county at large. The voter can also vote on all State questions submitted at any of these elections.

HOW TO GET BALLOT

All applications for an Oklahoma war ballot must be made to the secretary of state. These application blanks may be secured from the office of the secretary of the county election board in each county. There are three forms of State application blanks. One is for the absentee voter to use when he makes application himself. A special form of application is available for the husband or wife of the absentee voter to use in requesting a war ballot for their own use. The third form of request is for use by the parent, husband or wife, adult child, brother or sister, or friend in requesting that a war ballot be sent to any absentee voter. State war ballots and county war ballots are mailed direct to absentee voters by the secretary of the state election board pursuant to applications received by the secretary of state.

BROADER THAN UNITED STATES ACT

The State fully recognizes any application sent in by any of the above-mentioned absentees for the Federal ballots for President, Vice President, United States Senators, and Congressmen. The Federal law made no provision for the husband or wife of such absentee voter to secure a Federal ballot. I think most of our absentee voters will use the ballot provided by the State law instead of the one provided by the Federal law because this gives him an opportunity to vote not only for State and county officials, but also Federal officials, including the President, all in one ballot.

ACT IMMEDIATELY

You should see to it that an application blank is obtained from your county election board and mailed to any absentee voter mentioned above at once. This should be taken care of as soon as possible so that the absent voter can send his application back to the Secretary of State, who will see to it that a ballot will be forwarded immediately to such absentee voter.

The members of the State legislature took into consideration the Federal law and the laws passed by many of the other States permitting absentee voting. I think the Oklahoma war-ballot law is the easiest one to follow that has yet been passed by the Federal Government or any State. Ballots will be mailed by the State election board immediately upon receiving application. I know that you are interested as much as I in seeing that every qualified absentee voter has an opportunity to vote.

APPLICATION ESSENTIAL

Ballots cannot be mailed, however, without an application being filed. In view of the fact that you can apply for a ballot to be sent to any member of your family or to any friend or friends, I know that you will help see to it that all the Oklahoma service men and women receive a ballot for the primary and general election this year. I hope that every relative or friend of anyone entitled to vote under this law will apply to the secretary of the county election board for a ballot to be mailed to the absentee voter if there is any doubt at all as to whether or not the voter himself has made an application. The State will check carefully to see that there are no duplicate ballots counted.

Labor Situation in Northwest Louisiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an interchange of correspondence between Hon. Paul V. McNutt, Chairman of the War Manpower Commission, Washington, D. C., in reference to the labor situation existing in northwest Louisiana.

The letters are as follows:

MAY 2, 1944.

Hon. PAUL V. MCNUTT,
Chairman, War Manpower Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCNUTT: I am protesting to you, in the strongest manner possible for one public official to courteously protest to another public official, the most unwise policy of the War Manpower Commission in continuing its active efforts to divert labor from the north Louisiana area to the west coast. Thousands upon thousands of dollars have been spent uselessly in attempting to find labor for diversion purposes, and this money is still being spent to the detriment of the taxpayers and to the injury of the war effort. Our people in north Louisiana are having to go out of the business area of that locality to import into that locality necessary workers, and at the same time the policy of the War Manpower Commission is to deport workers to the west coast knowing we will have to import others to take their places.

I am chairman of a subcommittee that recently has found, according to testimony of your own experts, the critical shortage in the lumber and pulp business is actually hurting the war effort. The Selective Service has had to send out a special directive to try to make up this shortage of lumber and pulp workers, which is so very serious to the war effort. These and other basic war industries are suffering very heavily at the present time in this area, and your policy of continuing to attempt to divert workers from northwest Louisiana is a great mistake and an actual injury to the war effort.

I am sure that you are personally not aware of this situation, though I did mention it to you when you appeared before the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives many months ago. I trust, however, that when you have given it your personal attention some action will be taken promptly to correct a mistaken policy that is stirring up our people and causing a severe strain upon the war program in northwest Louisiana.

With continued assurances of high regard, I am

Sincerely yours,

OVERTON BROOKS,
Member of Congress.

WAR MANPOWER COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., May 12, 1944.

Hon. OVERTON BROOKS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BROOKS: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 2, in which you bring to my personal attention what you believe to be an unwise policy of the War Manpower Commission in endeavoring to divert labor from the north Louisiana area to the west coast. I have noted with interest your point of view and comments on this general policy, and the adverse effect you anticipate upon employers in your district in need of workers.

While I am not certain that a particular recruitment program is being carried on in your area, it is presumed that the operations of the United States Employment Service of the War Manpower Commission are being conducted in line with the Commission's general purpose and under the following described policy and procedure. However, to meet certain critical demands of the Government for workers in production of the highest priority on the west coast, and due to the critical need for workers to man the program in question, intensive efforts are made to recruit men even in shortage areas. There are no critical labor shortage areas in your section of Louisiana, Shreveport and the several others classified being in group III—"areas in which slight labor reserves will remain after 6 months."

I believe that the following statements will give you a true picture of the War Manpower Commission's policy respecting this type of recruitment by the offices of the Employment Service. It must be understood that the functions of the Employment Service are Nation-wide and cannot be confined to any State or area if we are to accomplish the purposes expected of this agency on a national scale.

The Commission advertises for and accepts labor needed by certain essential activities in labor shortage areas from sections of the country where there exists a permanent or temporary surplus of labor which can be used elsewhere to the advantage of the war effort. The Nation-wide facilities of the United States Employment Service of the War Manpower Commission make feasible a procedure wherein such available labor may be obtained and referred to areas of critical labor shortage. A further purpose to be accomplished is to bring into the labor pool men and women who before have not been regarded as workers. It is recognized that only by the enlargement of such a pool can sufficient workers be found to meet the constantly increasing demands of our war production.

Through the active participation of the Employment Service in this labor recruitment, assurance is given that workers who are needed locally and who have some skill or training which can be used nearby in some essential activity are eliminated from consideration for transfer to distant points. Local advertisements of the Employment Service specify that no applicant need apply who is presently employed in essential industry or agriculture. This "screening" of the applicants by local officials tends to prevent their leaving the community; in fact, the agent of the prospective employer does not interview the applicants until they are cleared by the local office.

Our experience is that the controlled-hiring procedure of the War Manpower Commission eliminates any serious effect upon the labor situation in areas where these recruitment campaigns are conducted. I feel you have been misinformed if you think our policy and procedure involve waste of taxpayers' money and injury to the war effort. On the contrary, through these means only has it been found feasible to make best use of all available manpower, and to use it when and where it is most needed.

Incidentally, while the facilities of the local Employment Service offices are made available to employers at a distance, the costs of the campaign, including the newspaper advertisements, are paid for by the prospective employer and are not borne by the Employment Service.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL V. MCNUTT, Chairman.

JUNE 28, 1944.

Hon. PAUL V. MCNUTT,
Chairman, War Manpower Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCNUTT: Your letter of May 12, 1944, relating to the drain on the manpower situation in north Louisiana was received in due course, and I have read its contents very carefully. Since this date the campaign of recruitment of labor in this area continues. Appeal is constantly being made that the offices of the United States Employment Service are available to recruit persons for work on the Pacific coast. The appeal carries with it inducements to common laborers, mechanics, artisans, and all types of skilled labor, always with the promise of transportation and high wages. The drain continues in spite of the need of labor in northwest Louisiana for agriculture and for war work.

Numerous large war industries making shells and bombs, as well as a multitude of other war needed articles, are located in this vicinity, and they too vie with the Pacific coast advertising and with your recruiting campaign for the labor available. I do not know that your classification indicates north Louisiana as a critical area, but I do know it is a matter of fact a critical labor area, and this recruitment campaign for the Pacific coast is not helping the war effort in this locality.

In addition to this, I am constantly in receipt of communications from farmers in this area complaining about the lack of farm labor. I quote a letter just received from a large farmer in Caddo Parish, La., to wit: "The drain of farm labor goes on—flashy advertisements in the daily papers—promises of higher wages, and so forth. Two women and one man left this week—I have abandoned 100 acres and—75 acres—and more will follow, and if this keeps up somebody will get hungry directly.

"This 175 acres were food acres—I expect there is little you can do about it, but I was letting you know so that you would be posted."

I read recently that on the Pacific coast, as well as in other parts of the country, a reconversion for peacetime work in small plants is proceeding. I note the closing down of war industries on the Pacific coast and elsewhere in the country. In the light of the fact that the War Production Board has seen fit to permit certain plants to reconvert their machinery to the civilian program, I do not see how you can justify a continuous drain of labor from my section of Louisiana. The result of your program is to build up one section at the expense of another.

I realize that from your high position as head of the Federal security agencies, you are not in a position to get around a great deal, although I hope you have not lost the "common touch." You are, however, in authority, and it is your executive orders which are perpetrating what I believe is a grave injustice upon a great section of the southwest. I am, therefore, making another appeal to you in the light of the new developments emanating from the War Production Board in the matter of reconversion of plants to civilian use. I hope you will see fit to reach a conclusion more favorable to my section of the United States.

Very sincerely yours,

OVERTON BROOKS,
Member of Congress.

Cotton Farmers Far From Being Satisfied With Present Legislation—Cotton Should Be 40 Cents Per Pound

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the cotton farmer today, more so than at any other time, resents the way he is being kicked around, abused and discriminated against.

The recent amendment known as the Bankhead-Brown amendment to the O. P. A. Act, wherein it is anticipated that the cotton farmer will be able to secure parity for his cotton, is a step in the right direction but it is far too short a step in the opinion of 99 percent of the cotton growers of the United States. These farmers, year in and year out, who have produced tremendous quantities of one of the basic commodities that is vital to our war effort, so necessary to our well being and essential to our every day life, are as reasonable and tolerant as any large farming group in this great country of ours

With high wages for industrial workers, high wages for most employees, high prices for fertilizer, farm labor, seed, and machinery necessary in the production of one of the most essential materials for war—cotton—unless the cotton farmer receives a substantial increase in the price of cotton, he will go down on record as being the lowest paid group of any class of people in this great country. The price of cotton could well be raised and the ultimate price to the consumer would not be affected or increased. From surveys made by impartial groups there is a terrific spread between the price the farmer gets, the big prices the textiles get, and what the consumer pays today. As an example, for a bale of cotton the farmer gets $100 and yet the consumers pay for that same bale of cotton, made into dresses, the amount of $22,560. Who gets the difference? Clearly not the farmer. The cotton farmer's costs have doubled in most instances and in some cases they have increased threefold. Yet the price of his cotton has remained practically the same. In many instances he has received less money for his cottonseed than he did prior to this war. He knows, just like we know, that the manufacturer and the textile mills are getting the price that he deserves and there is no argument that the cotton farmer needs his share of the profits far more than the manufacturer and the textile industry, as they are showing tremendous profits and gains at this time.

It is not sufficient for those high in authority in Washington to say that the South, wherein the bulk of all the cotton is produced, is the "economic problem-child" and therein let the matter drop after the utterance of these words. Mr. Speaker, the time has come when the cotton farmer should be treated fairly and squarely and we can never have a well-balanced Nation where one group of farmers, such as the cotton farmer, is treated with intolerance that is being handed him at this time. There always comes a time when you can stretch the string too far and take the pitcher to the well once too often and that time has about arrived for the cotton farmer. It isn't that the cotton farmer wants an unreasonable price—all he wants is a fair price, which he is not receiving at this time.

None of us want inflation and yet this is one of the many arguments that is used to keep the cotton farmer in economic distress. Yet, if the price of cotton were raised to 40 cents a pound that increase would cause no inflation, as such a defense in reality is just a myth. In business the textile industry is selfish. It buys on the lowest market when it comes to buying cotton and sells on the highest market when it comes to selling the finished cloth. With a powerful lobby behind them they have successfully maintained this method of doing business for many years. Today they have amassed such gigantic profits that it is astounding.

I do not blame the cotton farmer because his problem should warrant immediate steps to remedy same. Unless this is done not only the South but the entire Nation will suffer.

The Congressmen from the various cotton States and districts of this Nation have fought hard and long, yet the fact remains, that in comparison to the entire Nation we are but a minority and unless the rest of the Congressmen from the other States awake to the true facts of the situation, the whole Nation is bound to suffer. Naturally, the Bankhead-Brown amendment which raises the price of cotton to some degree is a help in just the same manner that a half a cup of water would help though it would not necessarily save a man's life who was dying from thirst. Notwithstanding, it would certainly help for the moment and do a lot better than no water at all, and so with this Bankhead-Brown amendment let us look upon that as one step in the right direction and keep on moving forward until the cotton farmer gets what he is entitled to—just common, reasonable justice.

Labor Unions Have Done a Good Job in the War Effort—A. F. of L. Has Done a Wonderful Job at Bogalusa, La.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the American Federation of Labor in Louisiana has contributed a tremendous part in the war effort. As we all know, Louisiana has some of the most vital, essential, and necessary war industries located there.

In my particular congressional district one of the largest paper mills manufactures paper, cardboard, and cardboard containers, a large percentage of which goes directly to the war effort. The entire personnel of this paper mill, namely, the Gaylord Container Corporation, is organized by the A. F. of L. and has in its membership as fine a labor group as could be found in any industry in America. These men work in three shifts and the operation is continuous both day and night. There is no absenteeism and every man feels that it is his patriotic duty to work just a little harder and do a little more in the manufacture of vital war necessities. I personally know that the loyalty and patriotism of these three shifts of workmen have made the production record possible in this paper mill in Bogalusa. I know these men personally and on many occasions it has been my privilege to talk to them, to see them, and to watch them work, which is indeed a revelation. It has been my good fortune to attend some of their labor meetings and I can assure the membership of this House that they have one of the finest labor organizations in the world at Bogalusa. Unfortunately, due to some faulty leadership of organized labor in other parts of the country, some people try to use that as a means to discredit all labor unions. Nothing can be more unfair than to apply this method of criticism to the A. F. of L. in Bogalusa. The fact that they have been organized by the A. F. of L. and are today united in one union makes it possible for the wonderful production record that they have established. I feel sure without any fear of contradiction that this wonderful record would not have been possible had it not been for organized labor.

Then too, organized labor has done so much for the city of Bogalusa, one of the most progressive and active cities of 18,000 people that you can find anywhere in America. The union has various programs, not only for its membership but for the entire city as well. The union has contributed and played a major part in the civic life of the city and in every civic organization. As an outstanding example, it erected an honor roll of every member of the armed forces that went into service from the city of Bogalusa, and to see this tremendous board with the names of all the brave youth of the city of Bogalusa, which is located right in the heart of the city, is indeed an inspirational sight. It is impossible to separate this labor organization and the members of this organization from the community itself, as it is as strong and important an integral a part of Bogalusa as are the buildings, the homes, and the inhabitants of the community itself. Here is one place that we can all look with pride and be able to say that organized labor not only clicks, not only plays an important part in the lifeblood of this city, but we can take off our hats and without the slightest exaggeration say that they have done a wonderful job in the production of essential material for our war effort and thereby have set a great record.

Destruction of Lumber

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I regret that my remarks on the closing day of the session should be in the nature of a complaint, particularly against the War Department.

However, I was shocked to learn that on Wednesday, June 21, 1944, employees of that Department went into the Tunxis State Forest at East Hartland, Conn., and deliberately destroyed buildings which had been erected for the use of the Civilian Conservation Corps and had been under the care of the Army since the use of Camp Robinson was discontinued.

The employees came with a large bulldozer which they rammed into each of the 20 buildings until they were all collapsed. They then burned the lumber, including large timbers.

Today the newspapers carry a story that lumber is so scarce that W. P. B. is putting all of it under controls as of August 1. Yet the Army burns 70,000 feet of usable lumber in an area where the farmers are having trouble getting material for necessary repairs to their farm buildings.

The only excuse that has so far been offered for this wanton destruction of critical material is that "Army red tape" would take so long to unwind if the lumber was to be sold or given away, that it is easier to just burn the material.

Competent builders, who worked on the buildings at the time of construction, say that most of the lumber could have been salvaged and was entirely usable as well as being badly needed by farmers in the neighborhood.

I have written the Secretary of War asking an investigation and report of this extravagance, and I think Congress should insist that this wastefulness be not repeated.

Admission of European Refugees Into the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting article by Mr. Westbrook Pegler.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PAST PERFORMANCE SUGGESTS REFUGEES WILL NOT BE REPATRIATED

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, June 14.—Always a champion of unpopular and losing causes, I find myself skeptical of President Roosevelt's notice to Congress that 1,000 European refugees will be brought to the country immediately and confined in a vacated Army camp and his assurance that, when the war is over, they will be repatriated. This Nation has immigration laws adopted for the purpose of excluding undesirable persons. These laws have been administered insincerely in recent years and evaded often, as in the flagrant case of Mrs. Earl Browder, an active alien Communist posing as a harmless and nonpolitical housewife. The people of the United States are the sole authority on desirability and yet, in justice of them, it must be admitted that the provisions which they have adopted for their own protection are extremely liberal and more so than those of the other countries in the family of more or less free nations on our side of the war. Nevertheless, even this generosity has been flouted openly in recent years by the admission of individuals in the guise of visitors who were legally ineligible to settle here when it was known that real conditions would make it impossible to deport them, regardless of their active conduct, or their attitude toward the American form of government.

Past performances in many fields instinctively suggest that the promise, that these refugees will be repatriated after the war and meanwhile restricted, will not be kept. Past performances suggest also that once a principle has been conceded by the importation of 1,000 European aliens with no pretense that they are eligible or suitable for permanent residence here, the number that will be brought in later will be limited by shipping facilities, individual pull exerted through personal friends and organizations within the United States, and public tolerance. The latter will be a weak and leaky barrier against the immigration of Communists and others who won't like our way of living and doing, and will do their damnedest to make us live and do their way; and against continental crooks who would be no asset to any nation. The public tolerance operates through Congress and Congress is beset and bedeviled by propaganda and pressure which attacks as a Fascist and a bigot any man who, in the interests of his own country and his own people, undertakes to restrict immigration to those who have something to offer. It is almost heresy to say that not all immigrants and refugees are ennobled by their sufferings abroad, but there is nevertheless much biographical data to prove that many who came here shortly before the First World War for asylum from European tyranny did not join the native American youth in destroying those tyrants, but joined alien groups and movements and tried to destroy the American system, instead. The whole, native public is not organized to counteract the pressure on public men exerted by the organized pressure groups which call the United States a melting pot but, in reality, have in mind something more like a central park of the entire world where anyone may enter as a matter of right.

The United States is, in reality, an exclusive organization. It has rules of eligibility and, like most of our unions, reserves the right to reject applicants who do not meet certain requirements. These restrictions are unjust to no foreigner, because no foreigner has any rights in the matter. If he is admitted to residence and later to citizenship, that is a privilege, not a right. The United States can decide to exclude all immigration, if it comes to that, and to restrict the right to vote and hold public office to natives and, I believe, should do so.

Obviously the first 1,000 are to be just a sample because 1,000 refugees, more or less, in southern Italy would make no appreciable difference in the problem of feeding and governing the region. But to this country the difference could and probably will be great with other thousands following on, with the conditions of their immurement gradually relaxed and with carefully selected distress cases flaunted in the public eye in an appeal for sympathy and unwary kindness, all for the purpose of revising the law retroactively to confer legitimate immigrant status on unselected thousands with complete disregard of the legal standards of desirability.

Of course, this is all based on an assumption that there will be not 1,000 but many thousands and that, once they are here, that will be the last the country will hear of their return to Europe after the war. That assumption, in turn, is based, however, on such precedents as the great but forgotten New Deal unemployment census, and the aluminum pot collection, which never were heard of again.

Louisiana Congressman Tells in Letter of His Work and Accomplishments in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a letter from a constituent, Mr. Alfred Bateman, of Gonzales, La., and my answer to his letter:

GONZALES, LA.

Congressman JAMES H. MORRISON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MORRISON: The other day several farmers were discussing why you should be reelected either without opposition or by an overwhelming vote and pointed out your fight there in the halls of Congress for the farmer.

A little argument arose as to the extent of some of the things that you had done for this district and this community in your capacity as Congressman. I would appreciate it if you would drop me a line and set forth as near as possible in detail the exact accomplishments as far as us folks are concerned. I have agreed to place your answer on the bulletin board here with our association so that all the farmers can read same.

The sentiment in this parish for your reelection is overwhelming, and I understand it is like this in other parts of the district.

Please allow me to express our sincere appreciation of the great fight you put up for the strawberry growers this season when we had such an unfortunate crop failure.

Yours truly,

ALFRED BATEMAN, Manager,
Ascension Farmers Cooperative Association.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALFRED BATEMAN,
Secretary, Ascension Farmers'
Cooperative Association,
Gonzales, La.

DEAR ALFRED: Many thanks for your kind expressions contained in your letter. I was indeed both pleased and gratified to know that you and the other farmers are so staunchly behind my reelection.

In answer to your request, I shall try to set forth some of the things that I have accomplished as your Congressman for the Sixth District of Louisiana.

1. Introduced a bill to give the late Gen. Billy Mitchell, one of America's greatest heroes, a posthumous Congressional Medal of Honor.

2. Introduced a bill to provide for reduced railroad fare for all members of the armed forces.

3. Introduced many other soldier bills, including a bill for soldiers' bonus, Supreme War Council, etc.

4. Introduced a bill for Federal pensions payments to all needy persons in the amount of $40 per month.

5. Prevented strawberries from being declared nonessential, thereby fixing it so that they could be transferred in iced refrigerator cars the same as in the past.

6. Secured for the high school at Pine, La., a permit to rebuild the school that had burned down, when the W. P. B. previously refused such permit.

7. Cooperated to secure the now famous pencillin medicine for the Baton Rouge Hospital and the hospital at Bogalusa in order that persons desperately ill could have access to this new wonder drug in order that they could be cured.

8. Voted for all soldiers' bills, including the recent G. I. bill, which is the finest piece of legislation for the armed forces that was enacted by Congress.

9. Secured for the third ward of East Baton Rouge Parish 2,500 feet of 4-inch pipe in order that the people of the third ward, where the defense plants are located could have sufficient water supply.

10. Secured a new housing unit which was badly needed at Slidell through the F. H. A.

11. Secured for the city of Baton Rouge hundreds of new housing units that were so badly needed there.

12 Aided, assisted, and cooperated with the Higgins Industries in New Orleans as well as other defense plants located in Louisiana.

13. Helped secure for L. S. U. several special units for specialized training for men in the military service.

14. Urged that the defective runways at the Hammond airport be replaced and today with the facilities recently enlarged that airport is one of the finest in the United States.

15 Cooperated with the officials of Baton Rouge to keep the abattoir or slaughterhouse from being permanently closed down by the O. P. A. The slaughterhouse has been open ever since and has been the main supply of meat to the people of Baton Rouge.

16. Secured an order to keep the minimum carload weight of potatoes at 30,000 pounds.

17. Secured for the farmers of Tangipahoa Parish an order allowing for mixed cars of potatoes, peppers, and other vegetables to be shipped under maximum icing.

18. Aided many farmers and small manufacturers in securing farm equipment, necessary machinery and priorities for same.

19. Fought to get a better price for dairymen who were not being treated fairly by the O. P. A.

20. Worked with other officials to get the price on Irish potatoes raised and was successful in raising both the ceiling and support price, which was so essential due to the blight on the potato crop this season.

21. Cooperated with various sawmills in the Sixth District and was successful in aiding them in many ways.

22. Supported all cotton legislation, including the Pace bill, the Bankhead bill, and the Bankhead-Brown amendment to the O. P. A. Act.

23. Secured for many sheriffs and officials in many parishes equipment for their defense organizations.

24. Secured for the dairymen in many communities additional feed where it was vitally necessary.

25. Fought for the sugar growers' interests and especially the small cane grower.

26. Seeured boilers for tire recapping machines and secured priority for various filling stations in the sixth district.

27. Answere the request of all businessmen, whether large or small. Did everything possible to aid them and secure whatever priorities were necessary in the continuance of their business.

28. Helped to straighten out many an allotment that in some instances were badly tangled in order that those who were left behind by the boys in the armed forces would receive their just and proper allotment checks promptly.

29. Secured for the Manchac Bridge repairs on Highway 51 below Ponchatoula and the necessary priority in order to completely rebuild this bridge which serves one of the most important highways in the United States. W. P. B. had previously refused these priorities to the State highway department.

30. Secured for the farmers permission to use all sirup cans available for canning their sirup.

31. Aided and cooperated with every defense industry in Baton Rouge, Bogalusa, and other cities of the Sixth District.

32. Voted against all wasteful and extravagant expenditures of money which were not connected with the war effort.

33. Voted for all appropriations for the Navy, the Army, and other branches of the armed forces in order to assure victory in this global war.

34. Cooperated with both the labor union and the management of the Baton Rouge Bus Co. and was successful in getting an increase of pay and averted a strike, which was desired by both the workers and the management.

35. Cooperated with the Canulette Shipbuilding Co. of Slidell with naval officials here in Washington in order that work could be speeded on some important naval vessels that they were constructing.

36. Was successful in keeping a ceiling off strawberries in 1943 and kept off the ceiling in 1944 until over two-thirds of the Louisiana strawberry crop had been shipped. To do this it was necessary to put forth a tremendous amount of energy and even went so far as to go into the United States Supreme Court, representing the State of Louisiana, who in turn was represented by Gov. Sam Jones. In doing this both Governor Jones and myself worked together to aid the strawberry farmers in every possible way.

37. Prevented the A. & P. chain stores and General Foods of New York from taking advantage of the strawberry growers and lowering the price on cold pack below 15 cents per pound. The price ranged from 16 to 25 cents per pound, which greatly aided the strawberry growers.

38. Voted with the war effort and with President Roosevelt on every measure that would aid the war effort.

39. Voted on all domestic issues the way that I believed the vast majority of the people of the sixth district desired me to vote.

40. Worked with the tung oil industry to keep the price from being lowered. All in all I have worked and thereby used all of my talents and energy trying to give the people of the sixth district the best possible representation. I realize that you had tremendous faith and confidence in me and I believe in the job I have done I have kept faith with each and every one of them. Many a night I have worked until late hours seeing to it that every request, no matter how large or small, was taken care of and doing my best to fulfill same in the best possible manner.

Never has a single letter—and I have received thousands of them—gone unanswered and every telegram was answered promptly.

No request has been too large or none too small for me to try to fulfill.

In conclusion, I want you to know that I shall continue to do everything possible by using my efforts, my talents and my energy in order to serve the people of my district.

With kindest personal regards to you and the other members of your association, I am

Sincerely yours,

JIMMY MORRISON,
Member of Congress.

Russia and Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a newspaper article entitled "Russia Warned Not To Impose Will on Poland."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RUSSIA WARNED NOT TO IMPOSE WILL ON POLAND

NEW YORK.—Thirty-six educators, jurists, publicists, labor leaders, and churchmen today warned Russia that the stand of the Soviet Government in the Polish border dispute might alienate American friendship.

The American leaders also warned in the statement that if Russia continued to follow policies in contradiction to the Atlantic Charter and the Moscow Declaration there would be a revival of isolationism in the United States.

"If Russia values America's friendship, as we believe she does, she must not use her power to impose either an unjust frontier or a puppet government upon the Polish people," the statement said.

"Russia must choose. She can impose her will, but she cannot impose it without estranging millions of Americans whose opinions may be decisive in the development of our foreign policy."

The statement added that "if we are left uncertain whether or not Russia intends to disregard the feelings and convictions of millions in the United Nations there exists an urgent danger that Americans will revert to isolationism."

The Press in a Year of Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the Colorado Editor for May 1944, entitled "The Press in a Year of Crisis."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRESS IN A YEAR OF CRISIS

(By Irving Brant)

(Irving Brant was associate editor of the Des Moines Register and Tribune for 3 years, editor and editor of the editorial page of the St. Louis Star for 5 years, editor of the editorial page of the St. Louis Star-Times for 8 years. Recently he was editorial writer for the Chicago Sun. He is author of Dollars and Sense, Storm Over the Constitution, James Madison—the Virginia Revolutionist, Road to Peace and Freedom. Mr. Brant was guest speaker at Newspaper Week in 1937.)

From time to time in the past 25 years, I have spoken and written about the shortcomings of the American press, especially in relation to the political and economic life of the country. Perhaps that makes anything I write merely one more chapter in a Jeremiad. However, when that word is used, too often we forget that the unpleasant prophecies were fulfilled. Jeremiah saw the fall of Jerusalem, and it can hardly be said that he lived in more parlous times than ours.

Looking back at these criticisms, I think it can fairly be said that they apply with greater force today than when they were originally made. Every evil and dangerous tendency growing out of the dependence of newspapers upon other business, out of the development of newspapers as big business, out of the helplessness of financially weak newspapers, out of the drift toward monopoly, and out of the egocentricity of some who wield great power, is steadily being accentuated.

POWER OF OWNERSHIP OVERIDES OTHER INFLUENCES

In the working staffs of newspapers, there is perhaps a stronger desire than ever before to resist these tendencies. At least, news and editorial writing staffs have made no voluntary shift corresponding to that of owners and managers. Hence there is a sharper cleavage than ever before between ownership and management on one side, and newspaper writers on the other. The only general exception is a partial one in the highly paid field of syndicated writing, where the economic pull upon the recipient of an ultra-large income is the same as upon owners and managers. That pull sometimes is and sometimes is not resisted. In journalism as a whole, the power of ownership is so complete that it overrides all contrary impulses. Seldom indeed does this lead to the liberalism of a Marshall Field or the enlightened conservatism of Eugene Meyer.

Taken as a whole, the newspapers of the United States are now moving toward a proud distinction. They promise soon to become the No. 1 problem of the country. Perhaps they are that already, because of the way they are hindering, instead of helping, an economic transition which in the next half century will make the present world unrecognizable. At a time when all the channels of information should be freely open to thoughts upon the manner and nature of this change, and when editors should be probing the political and economic realities of a changing world, American journalism allies itself stubbornly with those who refuse to admit that any change is coming. Thus it helps to convert evolution into chaotic frustration and heightens the likelihood of its going from that into revolution.

FREEDOM IMPOSES A DUTY

In saying this I do not mean to put American journalism upon a lower level than the press of other countries. Outside of the United States, the British nations, Sweden, Switzerland, and a very small part of Latin America, virtually the entire press of the world is a slave press, pursuing a course which is good or bad (but generally bad) according to the dictates of the government controlling it. Because the American press is free of Government control, it has a corresponding duty to make the best possible use of its freedom. Because it is not free of economic control, either from outside pressure or the inner pull of superficial self-interest, it does not fulfill the obligation which lies upon it.

During the year of crisis, 1944, the United States will go through a test almost without precedent among the great powers of the world. It will undertake both to win a war and conduct a national political campaign. There are few Americans and few newspapers (outside of the fascistic and traitorous "poison press" which is protected by the freedom it would destroy), who would consciously subordinate the winning of the war to political considerations. But who will challenge the truth of the following dual assertion?

1. Many politicians and many newspapers are willing to gamble on a possible loss in the war in order to gain an assured personal or party advantage in politics.

2. Few politicians and few newspapers are willing to risk a possible political loss in order to gain an assured advantage in the war.

POLITICIANS AND NEWSPAPERS OBSTRUCT REFORM

During the past 2 years we have seen the Government's fight against ruinous inflation made more difficult, indeed half frustrated, by political hatchet work against Government officials working to control prices. David Ginsburg, the most valuable man in the O. P. A., was driven out of office because he was its most valuable man, not merely because he was a Jew. Politicians and newspapers have gambled with the country's security, and jeopardized the future value of their own property, for immediate political ends.

In department after department of Government, vitally needed administrators have been hounded into uniform, in order to create an impression that the Government is a refuge for slackers, or to break down particular kinds of administrative work, or to discredit men of a certain political outlook, or to vent and propagate racial and religious prejudices. Politicians have led in these cowardly and venomous attacks, but newspapers have abetted them, either by active editorial support, or by news reports slanted to give them dignity and force.

We have seen American newspapers, as a class, build prejudice against labor unions, not by seeking out and dealing with the real sins in some of them, but by treating the one-quarter of 1 percent of time lost through wildcat strikes as if these microscopic work stoppages represented general sabotage of the war effort. Labor's no-strike pledge was fulfilled 99.75 percent in 1943. That makes it just .21 percent purer than Ivory soap. How many newspapers have put that fact before their readers? How many newspapermen, reading it here, will verify the statement and publish it? By failing to tell the truth about labor, or rather by creating an impression opposite to the truth, they have jeopardized the war effort. They have done so not only by impairing the morale of labor in the face of a rising cost of living, but by building up inflationary forces which hope to drive that cost still higher by weakening organized labor as a force against inflation.

Finally, the newspapers of the United States as a whole, have never awakened to the fact, and therefore have never aroused the people to it, that Nazi Germany is an infinitely greater menace to the United States than Japan. Our military high command knows that this is true in the field of strategy, and has waged the war accordingly. It is likewise true in the field of ideology. Nazi ideas, such as racial superiority, distrust of democracy, the rule of brute force, and other denials of the principles of our Declaration of Independence, are subtly insinuated into American thought, with no effective rebuttal from the American press. Newspapers and politicians have made a political football out of military decisions whose actual effect has been to save millions of American lives, and our national freedom as well, by preventing us from facing at last the combined forces of Japan and a triumphant Germany.

This has been due, no doubt, to ignorance rather than malevolence. Yet I have a feeling that the military education of the press would have proceeded much more rapidly if the political implications had been reversed.

FAILING TO GIVE TRUTH IN POLITICS

What will be the role of the press in the coming Presidential election? If the spring planting fortells the autumn harvest, this will be a year in which the press, ostensibly independent, will devote its news and editorial columns more completely than ever before to a one-sided presentation of issues and personalities to the public. I have in mind two recent occurrences.

In a recent congressional by-election in Denver, one of the candidates was a wounded major of Marines who up to the time of his nomination had been the toast of the Denver newspapers. In the 4 weeks preceding the election, I am informed, his name appeared only twice in the leading Denver daily. None of his speeches or activities were reported. The other Denver newspaper on the orders of an absentee owner, gave him treatment almost as shabby. He was defeated. I refrain from comment, and proceed to the other incident.

In February of this year, Governor Bricker, of Ohio, a candidate for President, went to Washington and held his first press conference with the keen-minded news sleuths of the National Capital. They asked him pitfall questions, and he fell into every hole. Before the conference was halfway over, the correspondents were winking and grinning at the blundering remarks of the unfortunate Governor. They then went back to their offices and wrote up the interview. Almost every article telegraphed out of Washington was a political build-up for the Ohioan. No reader would gain the most remote idea of what it would actually mean if he should be elected President of the United States in a period of crisis such as the one we are living in.

Let me emphasize that, in saying this, I am not expressing any general adverse opinion about Republican candidates for President. (I happen to regard Governor Stassen, of Minnesota, and Senator BURTON, of Ohio—both Republicans—as two of the best-fitted men in the United States for the Presidency, although their fitness seems to be a political handicap.) The point I make is that the newspapers are not fulfilling the duty of a fress press to tell the truth, when it is not the kind of truth that is pleasing to newspaper owners or the business community.

Finally, let me ask this question: Why is President Roosevelt the only person seriously discussed for the Democratic nomination for President? In part, of course, it is because he is our national leader in time of war, and also has world-wide prestige. But suppose there were no war and no grave international questions to deal with. The Democrats would then be confronted with the choice of renominating the President as their still strongest candidate, or of choosing between (a) some follower of the President who has been weakened by years of assault in the American press, or (b) some Democrat who escaped that handicap because he is indistinguishable from a conservative Republican.

EMPHASIS AND DISTORTION DESTROY INTELLIGENT POLITICAL LEADERSHIP

The fundamental reason for Mr. Roosevelt's renomination 4 years ago, in my opinion, was the effective teamwork between such reactionary Democrats as MARTIN DIES, and the greater part of the American press, in wielding a hatchet against all Democrats who might have arisen to leadership of the progressive political forces. Similar attacks left the President unscathed only because of the office he holds, but had a far-reaching effect in congressional elections. I regard this as one of the most dangerous political developments of the present century. Looking at the part played in it by the press, it is immaterial whether it is best for the country to have a progressive or a conservative, a Democrat or a Republican, for President. The danger lies in the fact that the newspapers of the United States, by the cumulative effect of emphasis and distortion, consistently destroy intelligent political leadership for a large part of the country's population.

If this should lead to the triumph of a Fascist demagog in the post-war economic crisis, the credit for destroying American liberty will belong chiefly to our newspapers. The judgment, however, will not be recorded in their columns. It will be written as an epitaph upon the gravestone of a free press.

Unfounded Fear of Communism Blinds Many To Greater Nazi Menace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article by Edwin A. Lahey, which appeared in the June 7 issue of the Chicago Daily News:

UNFOUNDED FEAR OF COMMUNISM BLINDS MANY TO GREATER NAZI MENACE

WASHINGTON, June 7.—The political thought in the years preceding this war was dominated by a fear of Russia and of the spread of communism, and by the uneasy hope that perhaps Hitler and the Nazis would be gentlemen and not carry their aggressions too far. Had not this sterile kind of thinking prevailed in the 1930's, had not the political leaders of the world allowed their fears of the Soviets to blind them to the real and wicked nature of nazi-ism, a squad of tough coppers could have written the end to Hitler early in the game.

It seems to me that same type of thinking not only prevails today, but is being strengthened. If such thinking was fatal to the peace of the world before, will it be any less fatal to us in the future?

BOUNDARY NOT QUESTION

We have been reading a lot about the boundary dispute between the Polish Government in exile and the Soviet Union. We will be reading more of this during the visit of the Polish Premier, Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, whose arrival in Washington was announced by the State Department Monday, a week after the conclusion of a blistering Congress of Polish-American societies in Buffalo, where one of the delegates who counseled moderation in the Polish-Russian dispute was escorted from the hall to the hisses of "Bolshevik" from the other delegates.

Yet it appears that the question of the eastern boundary of Poland is not the essence of the bitterness between the neighboring Slav nations. Everyone agrees that the boundary could be fixed to the satisfaction of everyone but a radical right-wing fringe of Polish nationalists who insist on a restoration of 1939 borders. The critical aspect of the dispute is the belief of the Poles that the Soviet Union does not intend to respect the integrity and independence of the Polish state that does finally emerge from the war.

FEAR FRENCH REDS

Our approach to the problem of a government for liberated France is complicated by a fear of Communist influence in that government, and a Red purge of suspected collaborationists in France. Similar fears delayed for a long time our assistance to Marshal Tito in Yugoslavia. No doubt the same kind of apprehension about the Reds was in the mind of Prime Minister Churchill when he publicly played footsie with the little weasel who sits on the steaming caldron of resentment among Spanish workers and peasants. Some of the Romans who greeted our Fifth Army troops wore arm bands bearing the hammer and sickle and waved red flags. I have no doubt that this incident will precipitate a good many tremors, and perhaps further confuse our administration of the liberated territory of Italy.

This Red phobia is an inferiority complex developed by the industrialized nations over the years. Communism cannot stir the common people of a nation that meets and solves its social and industrial problems as they arise, and the ability to do those things is the only weapon we need for protection against communism.

NAZIS ARE REAL THREAT

Yet the Nazis will be the main threat to the peace of Europe when Nazi Germany is defeated. When the German people, under the surveillance of the Allies, make their first halting steps back toward self-government, the Nazi underground will be at work. If the Nazis themselves could not destroy underground resistance in 4 years of occupation of a demoralized nation like France, who is going to root out and destroy the underground conniving of hundreds of thousands of ruthless, unmoral men who have been trained for a decade to believe in their infernal destiny as masters of the world? They will take over and vitiate every people's movement that arises in Germany.

The Nazi underground will be the real people to fear, not the Russians. If we didn't suffer from this Red phobia, it might be a good idea to turn the job of policing postwar Germany over to the Russians. They know how to find a Nazi, and what to do with him, better than the rest of us.

When the History of World War No. 2 Is Recorded A. J. Higgins Will be Written Indelibly Therein as One of the World's Greatest Industrialists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, down in the deep South there is a man by the name of A. J. Higgins, who stands today as one of the Nation's foremost industrialists. He is perhaps the greatest builder of boats in the world today.

SUCCESS OF INVASION DEPENDS ON THESE BOATS

With the successful invasion of France where our beachhead has definitely been established on the Normandie Peninsula, a feat of military genius has taken place which never before has ever been paralleled in the history of all mankind. Without Higgins landing boats this invasion, as well as all of our other invasions, might not have been successful.

Every successful invasion must have many kinds of craft but there are two in particular, invasion barges to carry the soldiers to the beaches, and the tank lighters to put those iron monsters pounding the shallow surf for a foothold on the shore, if such invasion is to be successful. Few if any invasions have taken place in this war without Higgins PT boats, Higgins invasion barges, and Higgins tank lighters.

CAREFULLY DEVELOPED

These Higgins landing barges, PT boats and tank lighters did not just happen overnight. On the contrary, it took a tremendous amount of hard work, sweat, disappointments, and the tenacity of a bulldog to develop them. I recall several years prior to this war seeing a man by the name of A. J. Higgins run a weird boat high upon a concrete sea wall and over a strip of ground at full speed. Some people said he was crazy. On one occasion the Navy officials shook their heads and inquired as to the amount of life insurance this fellow Higgins carried. It took a long time for naval officials to become sold on these boats during that period. At that time all Higgins received was headaches, heartaches, hell, and high water.

FIRST ASSEMBLY LINE

Then came America's participation in World War No. 2 and with it came the Higgins assembly line, the first in American boat-building history. Three floors of boats moving in rapid motion from the beginning to the finished production was the set-up at the City Park Higgins plant. Once the orders for these boats slowed down, but not Higgins. He kept building boats. Up and down the Industrial Canal little could be seen except Higgins boats. Once a spectator stated, "Higgins will wind up eating those boats if he isn't careful." But Higgins kept on building boats. Then the rush orders came and an unprecedented number of boats were delivered in a record time. This was one of the many times that Higgins looked ahead and could say "The hell it can't be done."

TREMENDOUS JOB GIVEN HIGGINS

So many officials high in Government affairs were attracted to Higgins that one morning this boat builder woke to find himself with the biggest contract ever given a manufacturer for Liberty ships. Higgins went to work, to streamline production with an assembly line. Insurmountable odds had to be overcome to produce one large Liberty cargo ship a day, but Higgins was well on his way, and that perhaps was his trouble, he was too far on his way and he was progressing too rapidly. Like a bombshell his contract was canceled as his dream, his ambition, his impossible feat was about to come true. Too much pressure from his competitors, who expected him to fail and they could not compete with him if he succeeded. The close approach of his apparent goal of success caused, in effect, his greatest defeat at the hands of others.

ON THE CHIN, SAYS HIGGINS

With most men such a bombshell and shock would have caused their immediate surrender and retirement. Not so with Andrew Higgins; it just whetted his appetite all the more for success and apparently resulted in giving him even more self-confidence, that one thing he has seldom been without, and what has perhaps contributed more to his phenomenal success than any one attribute.

MUST HAVE ASSEMBLY-LINE PRODUCTION

Shortly after this skeptical cancelation that caused the run-of-the-mill remarks uttered by competitors, casual observers, and jealous enemies, "He's through," "I knew he was a flash in the pan," "Two months from now you won't hear the name of Higgins mentioned again," Higgins and I were standing near his boat plant on the Industrial Canal in New Orleans and I inquired, "What is that high steel shed and that hole being dug in that swamp going to be used for?" I further said, "Why use that swampland?" "Well," said Higgins, "you don't see any better land do you?" "No," was the reply. "Well, that, Congressman, is going to be an assembly line where oceangoing vessels of 170 feet and longer will start moving back here and end up in the water completed." I looked at Higgins and said, "Come on, quit your kidding, tell me the truth." "Well, we always put up the roof and then go to manufacturing and see who finishes first, the ones building the boats or the ones building the plant," explained Higgins. "Why we are finishing the concrete floor in that adjoining plant where we have been producing tank lighters for 6 months."

"Come back here in a few months, Congressman, and you will see how we produce those 170-foot ocean boats." And come back I did and here's what a saw. The 178-foot Simon Bolivar floating there in the water, the only seagoing ship in the world built on a continuous moving production line.

HIGGINS LOOKS SKYWARD

Not content with his champion assembly line production of streamlined ocean-going vessels after his hands had previously been tied by that unusual cancelation, while no other industrialist in the world has so far accomplished or mastered, but Higgins needed more work and contracts to keep his mind apparently occupied. He landed a whale of a contract to build cargo planes. After numerous troubles, red tape and interruptions, any one of which would probably spell failure to the average industrialist, Higgins was well on his way. Given specifications for plywood construction at first, this was later changed to metal, but that was okay to Higgins. To build a factory in that low land—all available land near New Orleans is low—is a major feat in itself, not counting the manufacturing of 50 or more different needed and necessary commodities of war, all the way from gun mounts to the largest cargo planes that fly.

ONLY WILLOW RUN LARGER

This aircraft plant is a revelation—the largest of its kind in the world except Willow Run at Detroit. It covers more than 45 acres. A half dozen baseball games and a dozen football games could all be in progress at the same time under this gigantic building.

The landing field adjoining is one of the largest in the world. Within the walls of this gigantic plant thousands labor day and night to make Curtis 46 cargo planes to carry men, munitions, guns, and military supplies to the boys at the fronts all over this world.

NOT LIMITED TO BOATS AND PLANES

Here are some of the products that are supplied to help lick the Axis. Higgins Industries manufactures Higgins plastics, radio telephones, torpedo launching tubes, airplanes, camouflage smoke generators, machine-gun turrets, Higgins marine engines, veneers, solar stills, torpedo fire indicators, helicopters, hypoid gears, motor-driven acetylene-burning machines, Higgins propellers, quartz (radio) crystals, armored support boats, vee drive gears, landing boats, release hooks, ramp locks, Higgins profile shapers, tank lighters, Higgins rudders, remote vacuum engine controls, gun cooling systems, marine mufflers, fuel strainers, Higgins turbine pumps, electrical distributor boxes, water reclaimer stills, telescopic steering wheels, amphibious vehicles, manual and electric ramp winches, fuel-line dehydrators, tow boats, rudder gear boxes, Higgins electro-mechanical steering control systems, remote-release controls for torpedo launching racks, patrol boats, bilge drains, fire boats, lumber products, steel tugs, salvage craft, Higgins patented steering wheels with spinning spoke, portable rehaul and launching trailers, motor gun boats, under-water exhausts, automatic switches for carbon-dioxide systems, barrage-balloon boats, tripping hooks, Higgins reversing or maneuvering rudders, cross-drive transmissions for multiple-engine installations, rescue boats, marine toilet flushing pumps, engine cooling systems, cargo ships, marine transmissions, buoy boats, bonded wood panels and shapes, gun mounts, motor torpedo boats (PT's).

PRAISE COMES FROM AROUND THE WORLD

Lord Mountbatten said:

Without the boats that Higgins manufactured the Combined Operations Command could not exist.

The late Secretary of the Navy Knox said:

The Higgins boat is a good boat.

Gen. Mark Clark's wife related:

Higgins workers are doing a wonderful job. I urge each and every one of you to donate more blood and buy all the bonds you can.

Columnist Tinney in her column Man of the Week wrote:

Andrew J. Higgins is an industrial commando, a boat builder who is a do-er and who also talks picturesquely.

Columnist George Adams in his column Today's Talk, wrote the following:

"The man with a plan." It could easily be applied to such figures as Henry Ford, Henry Kaiser, or Mr. Higgins, for they have always been men with plans—that they have worked out in tremendous fashion.

Major General Smith, commander of Marine Amphibious Forces, in describing the successful capture of Tarawa, wrote:

Higgins boats did what was expected of them.

Tseliang Soong, brother of Madame Chiang Kai-shek, in a visit to Higgins plant in 1943, remarked.

The output of your plant is magnificent.

Admiral E. D. Cochrane, Chief of the Navy Department Bureau of Ships, said:

Hearty congratulations on the completion of the 1,000th tank lighter. Your successful efforts are deeply appreciated. The lighters are working around the world. You have every reason to be proud.

Senator MEAD, of the Truman committee, remarked:

You solve the problems on the job, and don't run to Washington or to the press. And that is why your record is an exceptional one. So what we need is probably more Higginses.

The Ithaca, N. Y., Journal wrote:

Men like Higgins refuse to be kept down. His bold plans startle conservative Government officials, but he seems to know how to deliver the goods.

Congressman LEONARD W. HALL, of New York, after a tour through Higgins Industries, remarked:

This is the first war plant I have been in where all employees were busily engaged in doing their duties and not standing around talking about last Saturday's football games.

Here is what Congressman O'BRIEN of New York said:

Your patriotism and your ability to produce is thoroughly appreciated by everyone, young and old, rich and poor. Your contribution, similar to the contributions of many others, will rapidly bring this war to a successful termination and lasting peace.

Louisiana Manufacturers Association, in a salute to men and women of Higgins Industries, wrote:

The Army-Navy E flag so proudly flying and the lapel pins being worn are symbols of a vital job that is being well done.

From a British Commando report:

Some R. A. F. crash boats will do the job, but best of all is the Higgins Eureka.

From various sources:

The Bureau of Ships is following with admiration the efforts you, the officials and workers of Higgins Industries, are putting forth to accompish the heavy task we have imposed upon you. (Bureau of Ships, U. S. Navy, Washington, D. C., April 1943.)

There is nothing like this plant anywhere in the United States. This should be advertised as an example of the new South. (Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy.)

They always delivered ahead of time and better than they promised. (Rear Admiral Emory Land, Chairman, U. S. Maritime Commission.)

The suitability and performance of equipment produced by Higgins industry which I have just seen on a 24,000 mile inspection trip is a tribute to the genius of American engineers and the skill of the workmen who made it. (Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell, April 1943.)

Louisiana is proud to proclaim Andrew Jackson Higgins as its first citizen during this great period of national crisis. (Country Built by Men of Courage, by Hale Boggs, printed in the Washington, D. C., Pathfinder, January 1943.)

One of the Higgins motor torpedo boats stayed close to our transport for the entire 16 days of passage from America to Africa. Whenever our listening device picked up the sound of a submarine, the Higgins boat would move in a wide circle and gradually spiral to the center until it was directly over the sound. It would then let go a depth charge that almost blew the torpedo boat out of the water, but it kept right on its way. These active little boats were in no small way responsible for safety and effectiveness of the transport. (By a petty officer (name not given) who was a steward on a transport just before the African invasion. January 1943.)

I wish to say that our landings in the Solomons were made just as planned and just the way you taught us to do it at the school. And to show what thorough training will do, all was accomplished with a minimum of casualties. (By Second-Class Water Tender E. A. Weathers, U. S. N., who had attended the Higgins boat operators school. Written to Richard A. McDerby, senior instructor at the school. January 1943.)

Higgins says, "If I must take a fee for building cargo planes and engines just to make it legal, give me half of what anyone else is getting." This is really refreshing in view of the scandals about enormous profits in war contracts. (From Inside Washington, column by Elizabeth May Craig, January 1943.)

The South should take time off and drink a toast to Andrew Higgins for his action on a very important item—plywood. (Russell A. Cook, in a letter to the editor of the New Orleans States, June 1943.)

Higgins Industries again extends its war usefulness by taking a contract to turn out rapidly 100 small steel ships of a new design for the Army. (Times-Picayune editorial, June 1943.)

Higgins is a wizard on mass production. (Editorial in the Albany (Oreg.) Democrat-Herald, June 1943.)

Labor, men, material, and New Orleans generally are profiting in a large way from the Higgins industries. (Walter Parker, in the Official Daily Court Record, June 1943.)

Without the equipment you are sending us the Commandos could not function. (Hillary St. George, official historian of the British Commandos, in an address to Higgins employees, July 1943.)

Just what the Higgins plants are doing to help America win the war cannot be easily visualized by us people here at home. In Africa and in Sicily and in the Pacific isles Higgins boats are proving almost invaluable. (Editorial in the New Orleans States, August 1943.)

The men and women of Higgins are doing the impossible, and they are doing it well. Andrew Higgins, that doughty dreamer and mighty maker, is the world's greatest builder of small boats, a man to be proud of. And the workers of Higgins are men and women for all of us to be proud of, because it is they who have molded these weapons for attack out of wood and steel. (Senator KILGORE, of the Truman committee, August 7, 1943.)

No matter what the terrain may be, or whether a body of water is shallow or deep, a Higgins boat is tough enough to make the grade satisfactorily. (From the Berlin, Ind., Times of September and October 1943.)

Wherever fighting men have come to grips with the enemy on isles and continents, Higgins landing boats and tank lighters have been there to speed the men to the beachheads. (Editorial in the Shreveport Journal, October 1943.)

It is the presence on the American scene of such men as Higgins * * * that promises most for peacetime industry and commerce. (Editorial from the San Antonio, Tex., Express. October 1943.)

Our soldier boys can rest assured that so long as such men as Higgins are in the world, tyranny will be swept from the world, and their every effort and sacrifice will not have been in vain. (George Matthew Adams, as printed in the Times-Picayune.)

As the showings at Salerno and Tarawa suggest, the United States today possesses an incomparable fleet of Higgins boats. * * * To fill the hurry-up call for additional landing equipment, the W. P. B. probably has called in Andrew Jackson Higgins, the New Orleans boat builder whose genius for organization and knack for getting things done in a hurry are needed now. (Editorial, San Antonio News, Dec. 13, 1943.)

We used Higgins personnel landing boats and tank lighters. They lived up to what was expected of them. Higgins PT boats were used extensively to chase off the Jap Navy (Sgt. Ray Goodman in Nov. 26, 1943, Times-Picayune interview describing the first Marine landing in Guadalcanal Island.)

Then I ran to the beach with a couple of corpsmen and unscrewed three machine guns from Higgins boats. (Lt. Com. G. M. Bruce, describing to Associated Press a Jap attack on a United States naval field hospital on Bougainville Island, Nov. 15, 1943.)

I have not been dry a single day since I splashed ashore from a Higgins boat. (Frank Tremaine, United Press correspondent, describing Bougainville Island landing.)

We landed on Choisel Island, near Bougainville, in Higgins boats without opposition. (Pvt. (1st cl.) F. J. Jagone, Marine paratrooper, to Associated Press, Nov. 5, 1943.)

These battalions and others supporting the three landing teams went shoreward in Higgins boats. (Richard W. Johnston, A. P. correspondent, describing the successful Marine attack on Tarawa, November 26, 1943.)

This production and performance record of Higgins is unequaled. Andrew Jackson Higgins can be said to be the number one boat producer in the Nation. You men and women of Higgins are doing the impossible and you are doing it well. (Senator HARLEY M. KILGORE, of the Truman committee.)

People work for other men but they work with A. J. H. (Higgins Industries foreman.)

Today's Noah is Andrew J. Higgins of New Orleans, who might have been a Methodist but is now, like his predecessor, a transportationist. (Liberty magazine.)

On this Thanksgiving Day let us thank God for Higgins Industries labor and management which has given us the landing boats with which to conduct our north African campaign. (Lt. Gen. Dwight Eisenhower.)

My over-all impression is the same as that of every citizen of New Orleans where Andrew Jackson Higgins has dreamed dreams and worked for them for years—namely, that Higgins has plenty on the ball. (Donald T. Wright, in Waterways Journal, November 20, 1943.)

Happily, we've had the weapon to meet them—PT boats—and they've certainly gone to town. Hundreds of the barges have been sunk and thousands of Japanese soldiers have been lost. We frequently knock off 10 barges a day around New Guinea. (Navy Secretary Frank Knox, December 15, 1943.)

Getting back to the Higgins gigantic airplane factory, where cargo planes are produced and wing panels for Curtiss Wright at Buffalo are manufactured. When you talk to A. J. Higgins there he says, "With me it is anything from boats to ships to planes to helicopters."

New Orleans is one of the large cities in the country that is busily engaged in the manufacture of material and vital commodities for the war effort. One out of five factory workers in the great city of New Orleans work for Higgins Industries.

HIGGINS HAS SCHOOL

Over 2,000 students have been trained in the last 18 months at the Higgins Boat Operators and Marine Maintenance School.

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

So remarkable have been the accomplishments of this modern industrial wizard that the Office of War Information has filmed a motion picture of the life and accomplishments of A. J. Higgins, which is being distributed at this very moment to 33 foreign countries.

To sum it all up in a few words, it might be well to quote what a soldier said as he emerged from the Higgins plant, "It is so gigantic and remarkable that it takes your breath away. It is almost too fantastic and too great to be true. But that is why we have the equipment to win this war."

G. I. Joe Wants A Break

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, in order to meet the many requests that I have received from all over the world from G. I. Joe, I am introducing a bill today to grant preferences in the disposal of surplus war property to veterans.

One G. I. Joe—Sgt. Harold Ungar—awaiting D-day in England had this to say:

While on tour of duty here in England, we have noticed the staggering amount of equipment of every description, and with the islands throughout the Pacific theater similarly equipped, we began to wonder what will happen to much of it when this war is over—which we are determined to end soon.

Discussion during rest period is somewhat as follows:

Jack Trumbal of Boston, Mass.: "My brother is in Italy and when this war is over we hope to buy a launch from the Army or Navy and convert it into a fishing boat and then we can make a living all right. That's all we want."

Willard Wozniak from Ohio: "If I could get two good tractors and a six-by-six off the Army at a cheap price I could farm my brothers land much better and the whole family would be better off."

A Pennsylvania trucker said: "Before I got into the war I was saving to buy a good Mack tractor and trailer, but along came the war and all my savings are gone. But if the Army will sell me this job here I'm driving, it certainly would go a long way toward helping me get set after the war."

The same stories are told in the professional bracket and by the small businessman who is now in uniform.

The general idea is that there must be some feasible plan whereby this equipment and merchandise can be made available to the veterans at the most reasonable consideration through an agency established by the Government and which would not involve any middleman.

I agree with Sgt. Harold Ungar's plan. It is sound, sensible, and feasible, and I hope the House committee will give it prompt and favorable consideration. This is only a small consideration to grant our gallant boys who are giving so much for all of us.

The bill I have introduced is as follows:

A bill to grant preferences in the disposal of surplus war property to veterans, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established the Office of Surplus War Property, at the head of which shall be a Director appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. The Director may employ and fix the compensation, within the provisions of the civil-service laws and regulations and the Classification Act of 1923 as amended, of such officers and employees as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. It shall be the function of the Office of Surplus War Property:

(1) to centralize, so far as is practicable, in one disposal agency responsibility for the disposal of all property of the same type or class;

(2) to exercise general supervision and direction of the transfer of any surplus war property in the possession of any Government agency to any Government agency;

(3) to supervise disposal of surplus war property so as: (a) to insure the most advantageous deal to the Government; (b) to discourage and, if possible, to prevent disposals to speculators; and (c) to encourage sales to ex-servicemen and ex-servicewomen in acquisitions of such property for the establishment and maintenance of their own small businesses or farms.

Off My Chest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to include in my remarks a splendid statement by Mr. Philip Wylie entitled "Off My Chest" which was reprinted through the courtesy of the Miami Daily News, Miami, Fla.

Westbrook Pegler, America's stuck whistle, stopped his Johnny-one-note campaign against crooks in labor long enough the other day to mutter that there wasn't any anti-Semitism in America—just people worrying about it—and what was all the fuss? Well, some of my best friends are anti-Semites. I know that the very great majority of Americans do not take part in this sinister fad, polls have made that clear, but there is too much of it here in Miami, and in New York, Boston, and Chicago for the comfort of common citizens like me. To say it doesn't exist is like putting a brick on the safety valve. That's what a column is, isn't it, Peg? People like you and me ought to use a pound of steam and the free press to get the record straight. Jews can't. They would be arguing against those who have already condemned them. That leaves us. Wherefore, your analyst is putting out an extra.

I have heard hundreds of malicious charges brought against the Jews by people I know, most of whom should know better. These charges are always of two kinds, either charges that could be made with exactly equal truth against all humanity, or lies. The people who make them are unable or unwilling to check fact and find out truth. So they repeat lies without the slightest realization of their origin of their monstrousness.

They blame Jews in particular for those human failings of which we are all guilty equally, and which have led to the misery of this hour—though it is plain even to them that the Jews have suffered most from it. That lack of logic, of heart, of wisdom, is at once the saddest and the snidest of man's weaknesses. Numberless times in his history he has punished one group or another in spiteful vengeance for some calamity brought about by the greed or the stupidity of all groups together. Hitler did it most recently to Jews, then to Protestants and Catholics. Shall we follow him?

To be an anti-Semite is to repudiate our Constitution and to deny every syllable of meaning in the story of America. People don't think of that, but every law we have made is based upon the principle of the individual and his rights. Talk does not often lead to chaos. But there has never been a chaos that was not preceded by talk, much talk, all prejudiced, ignorant, underground, dishonest, and evil. My mean-talking friends are not planning action. The very thought would make them shudder. But the tone their muttering takes is the sort that can stampede idiots—and has done so a thousand times. They are people who should not stand as poor examples to the less intelligent, the less decent, the vicious, and morally deficient.

They just don't reason. They tell me—all of them—that some of their best friends are Jews and that there are "fine" Jews. Five minutes later they belittle and demean Jews—thus thrusting knives in the backs of those "best friends." They are too empty-headed to perceive that, by everybody else, their Jewish friends are automatically included in their generality. That is one measure of their stupidity. They ought to know, if they are over 10 years old, that the proportion of fine people among Gentiles runs just the same, to the last decimal point. And they should remember that whenever a group is disenfranchised or destroyed, mankind then has the tyrant or executioner to deal with. In such a case it would be—themselves. Finally, they should have been taught this truth: Those who persecute one group inevitably turn upon others. I daresay 50 percent of the anti-Semitic talkers known to me are also anti-Catholic. Suppose their words, which have the same darkling color that made pogroms in Europe, become reality? Against whom would they strike next?

But let us half-suppose it. Like the shrewd hillbilly in the fable, let us turn propaganda into imagined reality. If it happened—what? Suppose all Jews vanished at the stroke of midnight. What evil would be undone? What blessing would result? What's this talk all about?

The next day, there would still be as many crimes committed, per capita. Prisons would remain proportionately as full. The incidence of gangsters and rapists would rise slightly. The number of corrupt political leaders and office holders would hardly diminish by a handful. We'd lose ground in the war, where hundreds of thousands of good Allied soldiers were missing, and because the Axis would lose nobody. No problem of the peace would change a hairbreadth. Even Palestine would then be the Arab problem it always was. The strikers would still strike; John L. Lewis and Petrillo would still haunt us. There would be 4 percent more food—but distribution would buckle, 4 percent more material for clothes—and nobody much left to make clothes, and, of course, taxes would rise 4 percent. The movies and the radio wouldn't miss a beat, in spite of what the anti-Semites have said. Only the quality would suffer. The market would sag, but not collapse, for there are not that many Jews in it and the average Jew is poor, in spite, again, at the illiterate folklore.

No gain. What loss? Well—most of the people who make America laugh would be gone, for one thing, and many of the people who touch our hearts every day; poets, writers, dramatists, journalists, best-loved radio and movie stars and musicians—thousands upon thousands of these. You can write the list yourself. We'd lose hundreds of great philanthropists, myriads of lesser ones, and hundreds of thousands of the kindest people in America besides. Our culture would be knocked out and the throat of our mirth would be cut. Quite a loss. But it's nothing. We'd lose so many scientists that the progress of man would be set back the length of your whole lifetime. We'd lose the millions of babies and adults their research was going to have saved. We'd lose thousands of men now thinking up instruments of victory—and all the uncountable engines they would have invented for the empire we call the future. If we had caused this, we'd lose the American Constitution and its Bill of Rights, our security, everybody's liberty, our self-respect, and the immortal souls of those who had contributed to the measureless catastrophe even by talk. "Information, please," would be wiped out. We'd lose Barney Baruch and Hedy LaMarr and Albert Einstein, and—hell!

Think. Think honestly. That's all it takes.

P. S.—In the brief moment it took to set down the above facts, Mr. Pegler has changed his mind. He now sees that there is anti-Semitism. But, he says, it is the doing of Marshall Field and PM. They are responsible (in Pegler's nervous, fast-shifting brain) for every bit of the bigotry of unassimilated Americans and for the thoughtless cruelty of those other Americans who haven't a right to the dignity of that name. Marshall Field and PM, eh? If that's true, then Pegler is responsible for all the strikes, and by his own definition. Come, come, pal. Get that whistle jammed on the old tune again. The new note's sour and screechy.

Hebrew Committee of National Liberation Launched in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW L. SOMERS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit an article appearing in the current issue of the Answer:

HEBREW COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL LIBERATION LAUNCHED IN WASHINGTON

For the first time in 1809 years (the last Hebrew revolt under Bar Kochba was crushed in 135 C. E.) a unified group of Hebrews have joined together to redeem the Hebrew national sovereignty and establish, in exile, the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation. The new committee, as the temporary trustee of Hebrew national interests, will apply to the Allied powers for the same degree of recognition now accorded other committees of liberation in exile, it was announced by Peter H. Bergson, head of the Committee of National Liberation, at a press conference May 18. The press conference took place in the newly-established Embassy at Massachusetts Avenue in Washington. This building formerly housed the Iranian Embassy.

Though the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation is being only now officially organized, the activities of its members on behalf of the Hebrew people of Europe and Palestine are well known the world over. It was this group who initiated, prior to the outbreak of the war, the gradual evacuation of tens of thousands of Hebrews from the menaced zones in eastern and middle Europe, to Palestine. In the United States, some of its members initiated, as spearheads in the fight for the survival of the Hebrew people, the following organizations in this country: The American Friends of a Jewish Palestine, the Committee for a Jewish Army of Stateless and Palestine Jews, the Emergency Conference and the Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Europe, as well as the organization of the great documentary pageant. We Will Never Die, and the Nation-wide Proclamation on the Moral Rights of the Stateless and Palestine Jews.

Members of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation are now on missions in Europe, in the Middle East, in Palestine, and in England.

In announcing the formation of the committee, Peter H. Bergson declared: "What is happening to the Hebrews of Europe is not sudden. It is the culmination of centuries of oppression and persecution, of ghettos, pogroms, economic strangulation, and endless humiliation and insult. The Hebrew Nation can no longer endure the status quo. It has been swept away by an intolerable whirlpool of death and disaster. There is a limit to the blood and suffering any people can endure."

The Hebrew committee of national liberation has been organized to obtain recognition of the Hebrew people of Europe and Palestine as a sovereign nation with the right of self-determination. It will seek representation in the councils of the United Nations. It will demand the right for its Hebrew army to fight on an equal footing with other United Nations armies against the Axis.

While the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation will not press the settlement of political and boundary problems of Palestine until the end of hostilities, it will insist, however, on the immediate opening of Palestine to all Hebrews who can manage to escape from Europe today.

The ultimate goal of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation is the establishment of a free Palestine with the Arab population as partners in a democratic and civilized Palestine, and with a legally constituted international authority in control of the holy places of all faiths.

A CALL BY THE HEBREW NATION IN ITS STRUGGLE FOR LIFE AND FREEDOM

We Hebrews, descendants of the ancient Hebrew Nation, surviving today on God's earth in spite of the dreadful catastrophe of torture and death which has befallen our people, have joined together in the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation to dedicate ourselves and our lives to secure the deliverance and independence of the remaining millions of our desperate people struggling for life itself in the vast hell of German-occupied Europe.

What has happened to the Jews of Europe was not sudden. It is the culmination of centuries of oppression and persecution; of ghettos, pogroms, economic strangulation, and endless humiliation and insult.

In the present war, this cumulative attack has resulted in the staggering climax of 3,000,000 men, women, and children deliberately massacred.

In the face of such disaster, the bitter status quo of the Jew in Europe must give way to a new, bold, and total attempt at salvation.

These Jews, today, have no effective protection of citizenship from any nation. They can no longer be considered Rumanians, Hungarians, Poles, Germans.

Certainly, they are not Axis nationals. They have been, and are the first and bitterest enemies of the Axis.

They belong to no nation, and have no nation of their own.

That is why the murder of 3,000,000 Jews—a number as large as the total population of many a European nation—has been possible.

Common disaster brings them together, even as death has hunted them together.

We therefore proclaim to the people of this land, and through them to all civilized men the world over, that the dry and tormented bones of the Jews in European lands have now been united; that the blood of our 3,000,000 dead has done more than fertilize the earth of the people who have murdered them. It has molded the survivors into a single living entity. It has brought forth a renascent Hebrew Nation.

The Jews who live today in the hell of Europe together with the Jews of Palestine constitute the Hebrew Nation.

There is no other nation to whom they owe allegiance but the Hebrew Nation.

It is as a part of these millions that we exercise the right of self-determination; that we proclaim the existence of the Hebrew Nation, and its determination to speak for itself and its elementary right to be represented by its own sons.

We confidently believe that the present-day heirs of the American Revolution will understand, recognize, and support us in this mortal struggle for our life and liberation.

It was, therefore, proper for us to choose Washington as the site for this historic rededication of the Hebrew Nation as a democracy. For Washington is the eternal symbol of democracy and of the greatness of the human spirit and if its revolutionary demand for justice, decency, and freedom.

Let it be clearly stated that the Jews of the United States do not belong to the Hebrew Nation. They are an integral part of the American Nation; an integral part of a Nation made up of people of every descent.

These Jews are Americans of Hebrew descent. They do not belong to the renascent Hebrew Nation any more than the Honorable Justice Frank Murphy belongs to the Irish Nation or Gen. William Knudsen belongs to the Danish Nation; though both certainly are proud of their ancestry.

And let there be no confusion because the vast majority of Americans of Hebrew descent are faithful adherents of the Jewish religion.

Hebrews and Jews are not synonymous terms. Religion and state are separate. The common adherence of members of the American Nation and of the Hebrew Nation to the Jewish religion is no different than the common adherence of Americans and Germans to the Protestant religion; or the common adherence of Americans and Italians to the Catholic religion. Everywhere in the world people share religions without sharing nationhood. The people of the Hebrew Nation, and Americans of Hebrew descent whose religion is the same, are no different. But, they still are members of different nations.

We proclaim that Palestine, in its historic boundaries, is the territory of the Hebrew Nation by the will of God as was set forth in the Bible. In our own time, this was politically ratified by 52 nations who, in 1922, "recognized the historic connection between the Hebrew people and Palestine."

Although it is the national territory of the Hebrews, Palestine is to be a free State in which the present Arabs and other non-Hebrew residents of the land will share full equality and privileges of citizenship and government, thus being full partners in the upbuilding of a free country in a democratic civilization.

In the present condition of our Nation, we are dedicated to only one task—the rescue of our people. We, therefore, proclaim that the Hebrew Nation postpones the settlement of the political and boundary problems of Palestine until after victory when, as one of the United Nations, we hope to partake in the post-war settlement of political territorial problems. Until that time we shall cooperate with and assist Great Britain as the Mandatory for Palestine.

We do however insist, in the name of humanity, that the right and the ability of all Hebrews in Europe to find shelter in Palestine be facilitated by the Mandatory Power, lest it be guilty of sacrificing them to their ruthless German murderers.

We proclaim the Hebrew Nation a co-belligerent in the United Nations' war against Axis tyranny.

Our dead, who have bloodied the steps of civilization, can no longer be considered useless victims of insane massacres. They are honored casualties in the United Nations' common war for freedom.

Our surviving 4,000,000 people in Europe are prisoners of war, and the International Red Cross should do everything it can to succor them even as it deals with all other prisoners of war.

But not all our people have been victims. We have contributed more fighters to the common struggle than most of the United Nations. Thousands of our men have fought and are daily fighting the enemy—whether as Hebrew guerilla units harassing the enemy's lines in Poland and Yugoslavia; whether in the numerous underground sabotage groups, or as regular fighters and commandos as part of the 30,000 Hebrews who are serving in the Palestinian regiments, and in other units of the British Middle Eastern Army. They have fought and died all the way from El Alamein to Cassino and from Syria to Addis Ababa.

Because we are, in fact, a cobelligerent against the Axis, we consider ourselves one of the United Nations and shall seek recognition as such.

And as the nation against whom more atrocities have been committed than against all the other United Nations combined, we surely should be represented on the United Nations Commission for the Investigation of War Crimes.

We also seek a seat on the board of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration and on all other United Nations councils in which the interests of our nationals are involved.

The tens of thousands of Hebrew fighting men should now be given the elementary right to fight the Nazis under their own banner and in their own name—as the Hebrew army—with a status comparable to that of the armies of the other nations overrun by the Nazis.

These are the minimum needs of our nation at a time when the very existence of the people is at stake. Their denial by the United Nations would be contradictory to the very aims for which the war is being fought; would be a defeat of justice now and in the future; would be an endless threat to peace in the world of tomorrow. For in ignoring the principles for which the war is being fought, we can cheat no one but ourselves and our children.

The Hebrew Nation can no longer endure the status quo. An intolerable whirlpool of death and disaster has severed this status quo. There is a limit to the blood and suffering any people can endure.

In this spirit of desperation, and with humility and reverence, we of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation have undertaken to be the servants and spokesmen for the Hebrew Nation, until such time as our nation shall be free to elect its own spokesmen and representatives in a democratic form.

We solemnly swear to serve our Nation with all our energies and might and not to falter if we should need to sacrifice life itself. So help us God.

WASHINGTON, May 18, 1944.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES OF THE AMERICAN LEAGUE FOR A FREE PALESTINE

The Hebrew people of Europe and Palestine, acknowledged by no Nation, spurned and oppressed by many, seeking to make itself heard above the tumult of war and massacre whose chief victims they are, at last have found a voice to articulate their need. The Hebrew Committee of National Liberation has brought to America the urgent petition of a once-great nation for the right to sit in the councils of the United Nations, for the right to defend itself and to fight the common foe on the common battlefield, and for the right to preserve the lives of its people and secure their destinies in their own homeland.

Recognizing the validity of this demand for minimum human rights, the American League for a Free Palestine has dedicated itself to the full support of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation in its endeavor to gain for its people the rights of man while some still survive to enjoy them.

The American League for a Free Palestine is a nonsectarian organization established in the American tradition which, mindful of the genetic struggle of the American people, has always rendered aid and comfort to tyrannized or harrassed peoples seeking freedom through reconstitution of their own nationhoods.

Mineral Resources and Industrialization of the West

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD J. WELCH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of the House committee to investigate the steel shortage from its inception. The committee's investigations early brought out the fact that the critical steel shortage we have experienced during this war is due almost entirely to the concentration of the steel industry in the hands of a few steel masters within a very limited area in the eastern part of the United States. As a result, members of this committee have urged appropriations be made to the Bureau of Mines to conduct explorations of our mineral resources over the entire country, and particularly in the West, with a view to bringing about a decentralization of the steel industry.

The Bureau of Mines made such excellent progress under the initial appropriation for this work last year that Congress has appropriated another $3,000,000 to carry on this work so essential to our national defense in time of emergency and the development of our peacetime economy.

The work of members of this House committee has been the only effective means of bringing to light what the mineral resources of our Nation actually are. The splendid results obtained by the Bureau of Mines as a result of its investigations is well recognized by the increase in this appropriation for the coming year as indicated by the following colloquy which took place on the floor of the House of Representatives when this appropriation was under consideration:

Mr. COOLEY. In other words, the Senate authorized $6,000,000, and the House is insisting on cutting it down to $3,000,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. COOLEY. Does the gentleman feel that $3,000,000 is all that can well be spent at this time on this particular work?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman, more than that might efficiently be spent. On the other hand, the committee is recommending the full amount of the Budget estimate, which is 50 percent more than was used for this purpose last year. Again I might say to the gentleman that before the committee acted we called into consultation Dr. Sayers, who was very complimentary as to what the committee had done last year. There is no disposition on the part of this committee to unduly curtail the splendid activities of the Bureau of Mines in this connection. It is a great work. It has done a good job.

Mr. COOLEY. And if further funds are needed in the future, I understand the gentleman is in sympathy with the idea of providing those funds?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Absolutely, if the need is demonstrated.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Steel Shortage, of which I am a member, is appreciative of the splendid cooperation on the part of the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Interior Appropriations, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I will say that the members of my committee feel very kindly and very appreciative for what the distinguished gentleman has done in this connection. He has made a valuable contribution to the war effort. It has been more than many of us realize.

Mr. WELCH. It will be recalled a deposit of tungsten was discovered in North Carolina as a result of the $2,000,000 made available last year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. WELCH. The estimated value of this deposit is over $15,000,000. Mr. Speaker, can we anticipate the committee will make further appropriations for pilot borings and explorations until the quantity and quality of iron ore and other critical mineral deposits in this country have been fully determined?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I think I can say to the gentleman without committing other members of the committee, that as long as the Bureau of Mines continues to use funds for this purpose to such good advantage, as it has in the past, there is no question but what the attitude of this committee will be extremely sympathetic and that funds will be available, just so long as the present splendid showing is continued.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of free talk going on with reference to the industrialization of the West. The work of members of this House Committee on Steel Shortage is the first and only constructive action thus far taken to bring about such industrialization. The foundation of a strong western industrial economy is the development of our western heavy industry. This in turn is dependent almost entirely upon the development and utilization of our western mineral resources. A healthy steel industry, decentralized to use the native ores found in the various communities, is absolutely necessary.

Under the appropriations already made, the Bureau of Mines has already discovered a visible supply of high-grade iron ore in the Shasta Range, of over 60 percent purity, which can readily be processed by electricity available in almost unlimited quantities on the spot at the great hydroelectric power plant at Shasta Dam. Dr. Sayers, Director of the Bureau of Mines, advises us that large quantities of other ores have already been discovered in at least four California counties alone, and that continued pilot borings will be made with a view to uncovering the full potential mineral-ore availability. By such steps in California and other Western States, our western heavy industry can be developed.

While They Are Dying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE WORLEY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Ochiltree County (Tex.) Herald:

WHILE THEY ARE DYING

Including the task of shampooing an elephant, there are at least a thousand jobs we'd rather not have. Top of the list would be that of trying to explain some of today's domestic headlines to a frontline fighter or a wounded boy in a foxhole.

"Sixty thousand workers out; 1944 strikes up 42 percent; Labor chiefs defied; Plane production crippled;" ("While we out here are dying, or preparing to die?").

We wonder if it isn't those who are labor's staunchest friends who find these things hardest to grasp, Labor's leaders who assume their responsibility as soberly as they assume their power and whose thoughts envisage the future—in short, those worthy of being leaders at all—cannot condone such short-sighted selfishness at America's expense.

It is they who, on several occasions have sat down voluntarily with the heads of business and management, solemnly and with anxious hearts, to find ways and means of keeping our country at fullest production of the weapons of war. They have found, as have business and management, that cooperation may be had without compromise of principles, when the very fate of our democracy is at stake.

That discovery can and should influence industrial relations for the better, now and in the peace to be won. As for those horribly inexplicable headlines—may their type decrease.

This Should Be Conclusive Evidence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the C. C. C. Act guarantees the producer 90 percent of parity where the Secretary of Agriculture asked or asks for increased production.

The O. P. A. and W. F. A. have set up price schedules that allow the processors to obtain subsidies even though they buy the farmers' hogs at 50 percent or less of parity. The O. P. A. and W. F. A. combination then has not lived up to the 90-percent parity guaranteed by law, and they have not protected the producer in seeing that the producer receiving this 90-percent parity even when the processor was obtaining a subsidy based on a parity or above-parity price.

The following sales receipt obtained from the packer shows that three light hogs weighing 250 pounds sold for 3 cents per pound and for which the producer received a total of $6.60 or $2.20 apiece:

OSCAR MAYER & Co.

(The Wisconsin producer's most profitable market)

MADISON, November 23, 1944.

MARTIN RICE,
Plain:

Hogs	3
Weight, pounds	250
Price per hundred pounds	$3.00
Amount	$7.50
Deductions: Yard charges	.90
Net	6.60

Thank you.

Though the parity price of hogs was $12.10 per hundredweight the time these hogs were sold, the price received by Mr. Martin Rice, of Bancroft, was only 3 cents a pound at the stockyards and only $2.64 per hundredweight on the farm where the parity price really applies. This may be an extreme case but it is an example of the wide variation between promises and performances. These governmental agencies should follow the commitments very much more fully than they have in the past few years. It is not right nor is it in keeping with common justice when these agencies do not religiously fulfill their every commitment.

When the W. F. A. claim they have the legal authority to tell the country butchers that they must have a new slaughterhouse within 10 days or they will take their permits to butcher from them, it seems very apparent that the W. F. A. with the O. P. A. could see that the producer received a legal price for his hogs, and that the packer could be required to pay a parity price for the hogs if they are to be provided subsidies based on parity or above parity prices.

Vote—It Is Your Patriotic Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, we should make a start in taking an earnest interest in self-rule, and thereby insure for the future generations the implanting of a mighty good habit—that of being a real good citizen. It is a serious responsibility to be a citizen. Your first ethical duty in the field of public service is your duty as a voter. Use, protect, and cherish this right.

If we are to maintain a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, we must vote. Democracy depends upon it. A democracy is a group of people who get together in a common enterprise for the purpose of governing themselves.

Registered adult citizens, regardless of property or poverty, may vote. Our wishes can be best expressed through the ballot. You do not have to be a king or of nobility to have a part in our Government.

We as American voters should not be derelict in our duty, and we must not be negligent about taking part in our elections. Under a democratic system of government like ours, the character of the government is largely what the voters make it. Every voter is a part of the government. As such he has a distinct moral duty to exercise his franchise in such a manner as to bring about the best welfare of the Nation as a whole.

As a result of 50 years of agitation by those who felt that the discrimination against women was unjust and unreasonable, the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted, giving women equal suffrage with men. Since then women have taken a deep interest in elections.

You mothers, fathers, wives, sweethearts, and relatives of men in service should remember that the ballot is just as essential to the maintenance of good government in time of war and peace as arms and a willing soldier in time of war, especially when our servicemen are sacrificing their lives for the freedoms we enjoy.

There should be no indifference on our part. If popular government is to be a success, we must have an electorate not only intelligent and honest, but also wide awake and vigilant at all times.

Among the greatest dangers of popular government are indifference and neglect on the part of voters. We should be greatly concerned about the failure of our friends to vote. You should contribute your share by going to the polls and voting and urging your neighbors to do likewise.

We have no right to criticize unless we do take part in elections. To fully participate in the official activities of our Government is a patriotic duty, privilege, and opportunity no citizen can afford to shirk because the majority rule is determined by the will of the people.

Russell O. Wirtz

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK L. SUNDSTROM
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, I deem it a privilege today to pay my respects to and to commend Mr. Russell Wirtz for heroic services performed in line of duty. I am sure that not only his friends and neighbors of the Eleventh Congressional District of New Jersey, but the entire country, are proud of his deeds. The following is a résumé of his heroic work, submitted to me by a friend of his:

Russell O. Wirtz, of Orange, N. J., was serving as galley man aboard the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey tanker Esso Baton Rouge when that vessel was torpedoed and sunk by an enemy submarine in mid-Atlantic. The vessel was attacked at dusk, the torpedo striking on the starboard side where it entered the fuel bunker and engine space. The vessel listed rapidly and seeing that the ship was sinking the master ordered the crew to abandon ship.

Wirtz, who had been taking a bath when the torpedo struck, dressed hurriedly and made his way to the boat deck where he found that No. 3 lifeboat had been demolished by the explosion of the torpedo. Several members of the crew had been injured and Wirtz assisted these into the port lifeboat together with a severely burned member of the armed guard.

With the crew safely in the lifeboats the vessel settled beneath the sea almost immediately. The crew were picked up by a British corvette that had already rescued over 300 survivors from other torpedoed vessels of the same convoy. Many of these survivors were injured and over 16 of them in the sick bay were suffering from severe burns.

Russell Wirtz, who in his earlier years had studied medicine and had a good practical knowledge of first aid, volunteered to care for the burned seamen as there was no medical officer aboard. He volunteered his services to Capt. James S. Poche, of the Esso Baton Rouge, to help the burned and injured men. Captain Poche secured the approval of the corvette's commanding officer and Russell Wirtz went to work immediately treating and caring for the men in the sick bay. He stayed below decks administering to these men for 13 days. Having lost his eyeglasses in the torpedoing, Wirtz was handicapped in his work and was forced to use a small magnifying glass borrowed from a member of the ship's crew when treating his patients.

Shortly after being rescued by the corvette, the crew of the Esso Baton Rouge were transferred to a Dutch passenger vessel and Wirtz remained behind to care for the injured. The corvette finally reached the West Indies port where the injured and burned seamen were hospitalized. Wirtz himself, at the point of exhaustion after 13 sleepless days and nights, was hospitalized and finally repatriated to the United States.

The commanding officer of the corvette in his report stated that had it not been for the work performed by Russell Wirtz in caring for the burned survivors, many of them would not have lived.

Wirtz is 52, makes his home in Orange, N. J., is married and has two sons in the Navy.

The Public Debt Picture Is Not Funny

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, one of the gravest problems confronting this country at the moment is our public debt. I am a firm believer in the principle that what we owe we must pay and I am not one of those who feel that because we owe this debt to ourselves that we need not worry about it. Our country has achieved its present great position, in part, because of the soundness of its currency. To keep that standing we must face our financial present and future with honesty and realize that we cannot go on making appropriations without any consideration of the dangers we will surely face. My imagination finds it hard to envisage billions, let alone trillions, as some of our so-called advanced thinkers have, but we must look more closely into our financial picture and try to understand all its details.

We began the Second World War with a public debt of $65,000,000,000 and, in addition to this, we have already appropriated three hundred and forty-five billion of which two hundred and seventy-five billion has been obligated. Last fiscal year our national income was around $135,000,000,000 and this calendar year it is estimated our income will be between $155,000,000,000 and $160,000,000,000. Incidentally, for this year we face a $58,000,000,000 deficit according to figures recently issued by the Treasury Department and confirmed by me in conversations with Mr. Daniel Bell, Under Secretary of the Treasury.

These figures present, in brief, a picture that calls for our most serious and careful study. While we cannot, under any circumstances, hold back necessary war appropriations we should, I believe, take stock of our resources, scrutinize all appropriation items more closely, do away with the wasteful and expensive cost-plus system of contracts, and impose a tax system limited only by our national need and our ability to pay.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD, editorials from the Helena Independent-Record, of Helena, Mont., dated March 5, 1944, and the Daily Missoulan, of Missoula, Mont., dated March 10, 1944. These editorials merit the attention of every Member of Congress because of their honesty and because, as is so aptly stated, "the public-debt picture is not funny."

[From the Helena Independent-Record of March 5, 1944]

THE PUBLIC DEBT PICTURE IS NOT FUNNY

Men who profess to know taxes best, are concerned over two increasingly popular methods of approach to the mountain of money we owe somebody or other. First, a certain school of economists put out the theory that as the Government makes the money there is no sense in paying it back. Just skip it, and go along as though nothing had occurred. Now come the cartoonists and some writers to poke fun at the fat Federal debt. A favorite line is, "We owe it to ourselves, so we don't owe it to anybody." That leads to the speculation, "If we don't owe it to anybody, it's funny we have to pay interest on it." But, say the more serious gentlemen, Americans are so hungry for humor they take the funnymen seriously to, in effect, support the balmy economists. How to kill this silly notion is really worrying some of our better minds.

[From the Daily Missoulan, Missoula, Mont., of March 10, 1944]

WE OWE IT TO OURSELVES

In a booklet composed recently by Don Herold, the Hoosier cartoonist, was a drawing of a little man with wild hair who was talking to himself about the national debt, which is now in the neighborhood of two hundred billion. "We owe it to ourselves," the zany was saying, "so we don't owe it to anybody." When somebody told him that the interest charge on the public debt was over three billion a year, he was very confused. "If we don't owe it to anybody, it's funny we have to pay interest on it," he mused.

The little fellow's bewilderment is, unfortunately, typical of that of many Americans who would like to dismiss the Federal debt with a shrug. The magnitude of our war expenses is so huge that the average person can't grasp it. He thinks of the interest alone on our debt as being over three billion; then he remembers that all of the income taxes collected from individuals in 1942 totaled only that amount, and he gives up. He says, "So what. We owe it to ourselves, don't we?"

We can't repudiate the national debt. The alternative then, is to knuckle down, pay currently as much of the war expense as we can and to look forward to a great many years of penny-pinching so that the interest and a small part of the principal remaining will be paid annually.

We can help ourselves greatly by being pennywise right now. Every needless public expenditure delays the day when the war debt will finally be paid. Governmental inefficiency wastes manpower as well as money and these extravagances are not to be countenanced. Taxpayer associations and citizen groups maintaining a watchful eye on public expenditures should be fully and universally supported and their worthwhile aims expanded.

It is only by a stern attitude toward our overwhelming future obligations that we can preserve the things we are fighting for—the free enterprise system which allows us to choose our own job and to advance in it as rapidly as our talents and ambitions permit; the eventual repayment of the money we are new investing in War bonds; the perpetuation of the rights of property; the self-respect of the other nations of the world, whose destiny is inextricably interwoven with our own, and the myriad things that make life in these United States a certain, fruitful existence.

To John Boyle O'Reilly, Great Irish-American—A Tribute on the Hundredth Anniversary of His Birth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak at this time in tribute to the memory of a great Irish-American, John Boyle O'Reilly. This House will not be in session next Wednesday, June 28, but we may take this opportunity to pay a fitting and reverent tribute to this great patriot and poet on the occasion of the hundredth anniversary of his birth at Dowth Castle, near the town of Drogheda in Ireland.

At the age of 19 O'Reilly became a member of the Tenth Hussars in Ireland. Not long after, burning with the desire for a free Ireland, he joined the Fenian Order and became one of its active members. As a result of his patriotic activities, at 22 he stood, convicted by an English court martial, under sentence of death. His sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. His jailers sought to break the spirit of this young and brilliant Irish patriot. They kept him in solitary confinement at Millbank Prison. They sought to crush his love of liberty by sending him to perform hard labor in the brickyards at Chatham Prison. They sent him to dank and lonely Dartmoor Prison. They could not break his spirit. Because of this he was sent aboard an English vessel to be transported in exile to Australia for the rest of his life. In exile he never gave up hope of escape, hope of striking a blow with all his power for the freedom of his beloved Erin. Aided by a friendly priest, Father Patrick McCabe, his chance to escape came in 1869; and, aboard a whaling schooner, he made his way over perilous seas to a haven of freedom, America. He arrived in Philadelphia November 23, 1869, and on the very day of his arrival took out naturalization papers to become an American citizen.

For more than 20 years O'Reilly lived and worked in Boston, a poet, a champion of the liberties of every people and every creed, a fearless editor of the Irish-American journal, the Boston Pilot, but, more than all this, a lover of American democracy, a tireless fighter for a free Ireland.

Through his poetry, which was read by millions in America, Ireland, and throughout the world, O'Reilly spread the rich gospel of freedom for all men. He was truly a poet of the people. His great poem, America, brought tears to the eyes of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant. When Grant heard O'Reilly deliver it with matchless eloquence at Detroit in 1882 he said, "That is the grandest poem I ever heard."

In America, O'Reilly speaks of his adopted country as a land where:

* * * here alone
Nor caste, nor kings, nor privilege are known.

And again:

Where every hand subscribes to every rule
And free as air are voice and vote and school.

Proud of his Irish birthright and of the unsurpassed patriotism of the tens of thousands of his fellow Irish patriots who came to America, he wrote in the Exile of Gael:

No treason we bring from Erin—nor bring we shame nor guilt!
The sword we hold may be broken, but we have not dropped the hilt!
The wreath we bear to Columbia is twisted of thorns, not bays,
And the songs we sing are saddened by thoughts of desolate days
But the hearts we bring for freedom are washed in the surge of tears,
And we claim our right by a people's fight outliving a thousand years!

O'Reilly wrote of the struggles for liberty of every people and of every creed. He was the poet of the O'Connell centenary, at the dedication of the monument on Boston Common to Crispus Attucks, at the dedication of the monument to the Pilgrims' landing at Plymouth. His was a sublime tolerance of all peoples and all creeds, a deep understanding of the need for real human brotherhood. He wrote:

Then drink, all her sons—be we Keltic or Danish
Or Norman or Saxon—one mantle was o'er us;
Let race lines, and creed lines, and every line vanish,
We drink as the Gael: "To the Mother that bore us."

As a fighter for a free Ireland, as a loyal American constantly urging highest devotion to the duties of American citizenship, as a devout Catholic, O'Reilly stands today a living inspiration to Irish-Americans and to all Americans.

As Irish-American boys march in the front ranks of our gallant armies on the beachheads of Anzio, of Normandy and in the Pacific, they must feel marching with them the deathless spirit of John Boyle O'Reilly, who when he was as young as they, like them, marched through the Valley of the Shadow of Death, fearless and unafraid in defense of democracy and human freedom.

Mr. Speaker, today 100 years later the Ireland which O'Reilly loved so well and for which he fought so bravely is still torn and divided. The northern counties are split off from the southern area of the beautiful Emerald Isle. Ireland is today still the symbol of the unfinished world symphony of free peoples and free nations. In this just people's war which all of us fight today, the way can and must be found to create a free and united Ireland, uniting the northern counties to the Republic of Eire, free to work out her own rich destiny of progress and liberty, choosing by the free will of her people to cast her lot as she has done for more than a thousand years on the side of human liberty; fighting with the United Nations against the Hitler world slavery—an Ireland where Irishmen of the North and South, without yielding any of their highest ideals and principles, serve their common country and work for a bright new world of freedom.

It is to the realization of this high purpose that the inspiration of John Boyle O'Reilly makes such a rich contribution.

John Boyle O'Reilly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute I dedicate to the late John Boyle O'Reilly:

JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY, 1844–1944

June 28 of this year marks the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Boyle O'Reilly, great Irish-American poet, patriot, and leader of social reform. Whether we think of him as poet of the people, journalist whose eager pen inveighed against tyranny, or hardy idealist who pitted himself against almost unsurmountable odds, we find, in these days of wrath and bloodshed, much that is as modern in his works as though he had written it for tomorrow's headlines.

For 20 years O'Reilly swayed thought and sentiment, not only in Boston, where he functioned as one of the great journalists of his century, but nationally and internationally as a force for reform, for the brotherhood of man and for the rights of the underprivileged. His early life was as swashbuckling and romantic as any adventuresome tale to come out in Hollywood's best technicolor, but in some measure it explains the all-embracing love for humanity that dominated his writings.

John Boyle O'Reilly was born in Castle Dowth, on the banks of the beautiful and historic River Boyne, in Ireland. His father and mother were teachers in the local school, which still stands next door to the crumbling, picturesque old castle. When young Boyle was just 4 years old, the terrible riots of '48 occurred, and his early life was filled with tales of the Irish patriots, of the persecutions of 1798, of the cruel regime of Cromwell, of the heroism of Robert Emmett, O'Connell, and Wolfe Tone. He listened by the hour to these stories, told him by his father and by the villagers, and his constant question was always "When will the Irish rise again?"

Physically, he was a strong, handsome lad, small of stature, with flashing black eyes and even white teeth. He was extremely active, for all his long hours of listening to the tales of the older people; he could climb like an expert, and was never happier than when swinging from tree trunk to tree trunk through the birch forests, or plunging deep into the brisk currents of the Boyne. It was said of him that he could recite poems endlessly, and if he did not happen to know one suitable for an occasion he would make one up on the spot, with such persuasive eloquence that his audience was constantly in laughter or in tears.

After a few years under his father's tutelage he was apprenticed to a newspaper, the Drogheda Argus, and remained there 4 years. On the death of the proprietor of the paper he was released from his apprenticeship and went to Preston, England, where his aunt lived, and where he worked for 3 years on another newspaper. By now he was a young, ambitious man, and he returned to Ireland full of his ardent desire to take up a career of journalism. Instead of that he found himself enlisted in the Tenth Hussars.

Young O'Reilly made a good soldier, intelligent, obedient, and courageous. His superior officers liked him and urged him to take up a military career in earnest. But this was the early 1860 decade, and by 1865 every young Irishman, whether he lived in his homeland or in America, was caught up to some measure in the Fenian movement. The purpose of the Fenians was to obtain Irish independence by dividing the British Army against itself, thus obtaining about a hundred thousand picked troops for a free Ireland. O'Reilly plunged into this cause without reserve, and, when Fenianism came to an end he accepted his punishment. He realized that he would be caught and scorned the generous bribes offered him if he would reveal his fellow plotters. Along with other political prisoners he was sentenced to death; the sentence was commuted to 20 years at hard labor.

The unhappy story of O'Reilly's imprisonment and eventual escape is too long to do more than touch upon lightly. He was first placed in solitary confinement at Millbank, where he began to ponder the story which later appeared as Moondyne. After being moved about from one prison to another, and after attempting three escapes, he was sent to Dartmoor, in England, where he survived a year or more of the most unsavory prison conditions. Finally, he, along with 62 other political prisoners, was deported to a camp in Australia.

Here the treatment was somewhat better, and he was even allowed to print a newspaper for his fellow convicts. However, he was determined to escape and finally did so, through the help of a friendly priest, Father Patrick McCabe, who became interested in the young man's poetry and in his devout Catholicism, which never faltered, even during the arduous days of Dartmoor. He put out to sea in a small rowboat and was picked up by an American whaling vessel which eventually landed him at Liverpool. He escaped detection, and shipped for America, where his first act was to apply for citizenship.

American ideals and American democracy excited him; he soon made a name for himself in the world of journalism. His arrival in this country, in 1869, found the United States in the confused conditions that arose out of the Civil War, but O'Reilly was used to fighting, and he immediately took up the cause of the Negro and the American Indian. Now he was free to carry on his crusade for the under dog. He was particularly forceful, both in his prose writings and his poetry, in the cause of the soldier-convict.

He made connections with the Pilot, an influential paper in Boston, and in a short while he became the acknowledged leader of the Irish-Americans. He married and the marriage was blessed with four daughters. His home was soon a gathering place for the literary and political groups in Boston, and while he often declared, in public, that he would never tread the soil of Ireland again until the Irish were a free people, he managed to draw something of the atmosphere of the old country around him and many of the plans for Irish home rule were made in his drawing room.

He never stopped working in the interests of his friends who were political prisoners with him, and he actually succeeded in arranging the escape of a number of them. From first to last, in all that he did and said, he was altruistic and humanitarian to an extreme.

O'Reilly was only 56 when he died suddenly and unexpectedly. He was mourned both here and abroad; even in the House of Commons by a group of Parnellites. Eulogistic messages were sent to Mrs. O'Reilly by such personages as President Cleveland, Cardinal Gibbons, and Oliver Wendell Holmes. In 1897 the city of Boston unveiled a magnificent memorial to his memory, but somehow one likes to think that some of his heart, at least, lies in the memorial at Dowth Castle on the Boyne in his beloved Ireland.

O'Reilly's political and social speeches and journalism may become little known as time goes on, but some of his poetry, like his ideals, will live forever in the hearts of free men. His verse is roughly constructed, but always sure and strong, fanciful, tender, and majestic. One stanza can give its flavor as well as its ideas:

O blood of the people! Changeless tide, through century, creed, and race,
Still one as the salt sea is one, though tempered by sun and place;
The same in the ocean currents and the same in the sheltered seas;
Forever the fountain of common hopes and kindly sympathies.
Indian and Negro, Saxon and Celt, Teuton and Latin and Gaul—
Mere surface shadow and sunshine, while the sounding unifies all!
One love, one hope, one duty theirs, no matter the time or ken,
There never was separate heart beat in all the races of men!

There is an ancient Gaelic tradition that the Milesians in their wanderings from eastern Europe through Africa and Spain to Ireland were inspired by a prophecy that they would eventually reach a land, a beautiful and glorious land beneath the setting sun, in which fortune and liberty would be forever theirs. Irish bards have envisioned Erin as this isle of dreams, but sometimes I like to think that the prophecy pointed not so much to Ireland as to the United States, the adopted home of John Boyle O'Reilly.

There is an affinity, a deep and abiding affinity between Ireland and America, for their ultimate ideals are the same. We are accustomed to hearing our people referred to as the "Fighting Irish," sometimes as though they fought solely for the pleasure of the row. I will gladly acknowledge that the Irishman enjoys physical contest, but you will search the records of mortal combat in vain for any instance in which a true Irishman was found enlisted in any cause except the cause of freedom. All their long story is the story of a fight for liberty.

Like John Boyle O'Reilly, the American citizen of Irish ancestry could do himself, his people and their principles most justice by putting himself most in harmony with their historic past and let his race find expression in him. When he does that he may be excelled in ability, he may be excelled in strength, he may be excelled in all the qualities of mind and body, but he will never be excelled in liberality, in virtue, or in loyalty; he will never be excelled in the qualities of soul which alone make and preserve freedom.

On the anniversary of the birth of that great poet-statesman, let each of us, as a tribute of respect and honor to John Boyle O'Reilly, dedicate ourselves anew to the defense of democracy.

I know of no epitaph, Mr. Speaker, to be applied to Mr. O'Reilly more appropriate than the words of Mark Antony as he looked down upon another who lay still in death—

His life was gentle and the elements
So mixed in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world
"This was a man!"

Attitude of Department of Justice Toward Insurance Companies—Statement by the Attorney General

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, pursuant to the permission given me during the course of the debate this afternoon I present for publication in the RECORD the statement submitted by the Attorney General of the United States to the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary this afternoon dealing with the attitude of the Department of Justice toward insurance companies in the light of the recent decision by the Supreme Court in the Southeastern Underwriters case.

There being no objection, the statement by the Attorney General was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[United States Senate, subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D. C., Friday, June 23, 1944]

The subcommittee met at 4:30 o'clock p. m., pursuant to notice, Hon. Carl A. Hatch presiding.

Present: Senators HATCH (presiding), O'MAHONEY, MURDOCK, and FERGUSON.

Senator HATCH. We discussed this morning in our subcommittee this insurance bill. There was not much difference as a matter of fact between Senator O'MAHONEY and Senator FERGUSON, but we thought this, with all the talk that is going on that perhaps the Department of Justice should not now institute a lot of prosecutions, and Senator O'MAHONEY reminded us of the public statements you had made. That is what Senator FERGUSON wants to know.

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANCIS BIDDLE, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Attorney General BIDDLE. I guess he is entitled to it.

Senator O'MAHONEY. I felt surely you would want to put that statement in evidence.

Attorney General BIDDLE. I will offer the statement in evidence, so you may copy it. I made it partly because Senator RADCLIFFE was always concerned with this.

Senator HATCH. He is president of the Maryland Casualty Co.

Attorney General BIDDLE. After talking to Senator O'MAHONEY I said, "Senator, I think it is very appropriate I should make a statement when the Court hands down a decision," so I made this statement and the substance of it is——

Senator HATCH (interposing). The statement may be included in the record in full at this point.

(The paper referred to is as follows:)

"Since the decision of the Supreme Court on Monday some fears have been expressed that the decision will have the effect of invalidating State regulatory statutes. Similar fears were expressed at the argument of the case, but the majority opinion expressed the belief that these fears are exaggerated. The Department of Justice has no desire or purpose to break down State regulation. Its chief purpose has been to proceed against practices in interstate commerce which are clearly monopolistic or in restraint of such commerce. There need be no conflict between State regulation and the Federal prohibition against such monopolistic practices. As the Supreme Court said: 'Few States go so far as to permit private insurance companies, without State supervision, to agree upon and fix uniform insurance rates. Cf. Parker v. Brown (317 U. S., 341, 350, 352). No States authorize combinations of insurance companies to coerce, intimidate, and boycott competitors and consumers in the manner here alleged, and it cannot be that any companies have acquired a vested right to engage in such destructive business practices. Indeed the practices which are condemned by the Sherman Act have been imposed on the States by interstate private combinations.

"Some insurance groups have assumed because of former decisions of the Supreme Court that they were free to enter into combinations in restraint of trade or agreements tending to monopolize the insurance business, even though their activities were carried on in interstate commerce, or substantially affected such commerce. But, as the Supreme Court pointed out, the present case was the first in which the Court had been called upon to deal with the application of the Federal antitrust laws to the insurance business. It should be emphasized that the Supreme Court has never in its history said that the prohibitions of the Sherman Act do not apply to the insurance business. Earlier decisions of the Supreme Court relating to insurance involved State regulatory laws; none of them ever involved Federal statutes such as the antitrust laws. The decision Monday, involving a question never before decided, brought a needed clarification as to the application of the Sherman Act to this great and important business.

"Surely this most important business can be conducted in accordance with effective State regulatory laws without resort to private monopolistic and coercive practices which violate the Federal antitrust laws. The insurance companies now have the opportunity to change those rate-fixing and other practices which, under this decision, may be in conflict with the Sherman Act. The Department of Justice realizes that the insurance companies will need to adjust their practices so as to accommodate themselves to the Supreme Court's decision and will be guided by this consideration."

Senator HATCH. You may make your own comment.

Attorney General BIDDLE. What I said in this statement, and what I would like to repeat, is that the Department of Justice does not propose to make any campaign against insurance companies at this time. In fact, I can assure this subcommittee I have not been asked, nor has anybody in the Department of Justice considered taking any action against any insurance company or group of insurance companies until the States have had an opportunity to consider to what extent they may wish to amend their laws or until the Congress of the United States has had a full opportunity of considering whether Congress wishes to amend a Federal statute.

The particular pending case will not be tried this summer. I think it is not unfair for me to point out, as I have already, that that case was not merely a price-fixing case, but included very serious boycotting. It involved boycotting insurance companies, an agent who would not belong to an association, and therefore under the State laws of the State involved in which the association operated many of the acts alleged in the indictment would have been illegal.

I think it is pretty hard on insurance companies that after 75 years of not taking any action, they should now suddenly be declared criminal and therefore the Department has not only determined to give every reasonable time for the States and companies and the Federal Government to take such action as they might deem appropriate, but after consideration, after that period lapsed, we would consider bringing in bills in equity rather than criminal procedures, so the companies would have an opportunity of amending their practices, because it would be unfair to send a man to jail for something he considered legal.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you consider that same thing to be true from the date of the decision until Congress could act?

Attorney General BIDDLE. Certainly.

Senator FERGUSON. Because a man could not say from that day on that was the law.

Attorney General BIDDLE. That is right.

Senator HATCH. I think that just about clarifies it.

Senator FERGUSON. It would not be your intent while this committee was holding hearings to use evidence that we may obtain that there was monopoly and violation? I only say that because some people hesitate coming in because they say this could be a violation of the antitrust laws. Therefore they do not want to come before the Senate committee.

Senator O'MAHONEY. What you seek is a constructive solution of a very obvious problem?

Attorney General BIDDLE. Yes.

Now before I leave that, let me say this, Mr. Cahill has asked us to extend the time within which he can file a petition for reargument. Mr. Cahill being attorney for the insurance companies in the Southeastern case before the Supreme Court. I granted that time. That time has been extended and when we have also told him we would not try the case until August and perhaps not even then, but as I say, that is a very special case, so I do not want anything I have said to indicate I was not going to try that case.

Senator HATCH. For your benefit, I want to say also for Senator FERGUSON, there has been no attitude on the part of this committee to interfere in any way with your trials.

Attorney General BIDDLE. I know, but I think it ought to be put in the record.

May I say a word about our view of this conflict, because I do believe the problem is grossly misunderstood by the public generally and even by the insurance companies.

Senator HATCH. I do not think there is any question about that. It is certainly misunderstood. That is what Senator O'MAHONEY, Senator FERGUSON, and I were talking about on the floor of the Senate today. They just do not know what it is about. They say we are trying to destroy the insurance companies. I know you have no such idea about it, nor does anyone on this committee.

Attorney General BIDDLE. Just in connection with what you say, I have never heard anybody in the Department of Justice or the administration anywhere suggest Federal control of insurance companies.

Senator FERGUSON. Nor have you.

Attorney General BIDDLE. Nor have I. I do not at this time under present facts favor Federal control of insurance companies. I think State control is far more appropriate. Let me say this is——

Senator FERGUSON (interposing). Do you think rate bureaus are an evil that should be curbed? Is it your version at this time that is a violation of the antitrust law?

Attorney General BIDDLE. I think I can answer that better if I may state my theory and come to that later. I am not putting that off for a moment.

My theory is this, that our whole economic theory in America is prices and rates can be controlled in two ways. First, by the law of supply and demand, partly all prices are controlled by supply and demand. Therefore we have made it illegal for prices to be fixed on the interstate level because we think that free competition better serves the people in controlling prices. However, in a field where monopoly seems to be desirable, in a certain limited field, or where limited competition seems to be desirable in certain limited fields, in the fields of railroads and other public utilities, the public is protected by either Federal or State government fixing the rates, so that wherever rates are fixed by the appropriate body, the question of control then by ordinary means of competition is not involved.

I believe, therefore, that wherever the State fixes rates, and I say this from an economic and legal point of view also, wherever the State fixes or approves rates in the insurance field that those rates do not come in conflict when so fixed with the antitrust law, and we are then excluded.

Senator FERGUSON. And if the State permits them to be fixed?

Attorney General BIDDLE. No, I do not think that is true.

Senator FERGUSON. There are only a few States.

Attorney General BIDDLE. I was going to say that it seems that where the States permit rates to be fixed without exercising control the public remains unprotected.

Senator FERGUSON. I wanted to get that.

Attorney General BIDDLE. Therefore the large number of State acts which simply permit rate bureaus to fix rates do very definitely come in conflict with the Federal law. They are only very few States, Texas notably, which their rates, and it seems to me that if the States wish to be free of the compulsion of the antitrust law that they must take a responsibility of actually fixing the rates or proving the rates filed with them, because I cannot see otherwise how the public is protected.

Now there are 17 States, I think, which do not deal in their laws in any way with rates. So in a very large segment of this whole problem there is absolutely no regulation of any kind either by competition or by State control.

I would be very glad to find if this subcommittee felt it would be advisable to examine the whole structure of rate control, of insurance rates, in order to determine what Federal legislation might best conserve the State powers, and at the same time protect the general public because in certain sections of this country I do not feel the public is protected in the insurance field. That is my view.

There has been a great deal of discussion, State rates being set aside and the States being incapable of regulating State rates. Without reading it, I would like the reporter to quote on the record that portion of the Supreme Court's decision in the Southeastern case. I have marked it on pages 11 and 12 and 21 and 22, in which Mr. Justice Black pointed out that this decision does not interfere with appropriate State regulations, nor has the subjecting of industry in many other fields of public utility interfered with the right and duty of the States to fix rates.

(The excerpts from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States referred to are as follows:)

"Another reason advanced to support the result of the cases which follow Paul v. Virginia has been that, if any aspects of the business of insurance be treated as interstate commerce, 'then all control over it is taken from the States and the legislative regulations which this Court has heretofore sustained must be declared invalid.' Accepted without qualification, that broad statement is inconsistent with many decisions of this Court. It is settled that, for constitutional purposes, certain activities of a business may be intrastate and therefore subject to State control, while other activities of the same business may be interstate and therefore subject to Federal regulation. And there is a wide range of business and other activities which, though subject to Federal regulation, are so intimately related to local welfare that, in the absence of congressional action, they may be regulated or taxed by the States. In marking out these activities the primary test applied by the courts is not the mechanical one of whether the particular activity affected by the State regulation is part of interstate commerce, but rather whether, in each case, the competing demands of the State and national interests involved can be accommodated. And the fact that particular phases of an interstate business or activity have long been regulated or taxed by States has been recognized as a strong reason why, in the continued absence of conflicting congressional action, the State regulatory and tax laws should be declared valid."

Senator O'MAHONEY. I am advised, Mr. Attorney General, that this afternoon a meeting in New York of attorneys representing large insurance companies, particularly life-insurance companies, and they came to the conclusion that nothing in the decision interfered with State regulations. Of course, that has been my contention all along, that there has been no need of interfering, but there is a definite need in some fields supplementing State legislation in order to protect the public interest.

Senator FERGUSON. Senator, do you think that is true where a State law permits a rating bureau, or rather demands a rating bureau, and then after having rating bureau is a violation of the antitrust law?

Senator O'MAHONEY. No; where the State has taken positive action, I think it removes the rating bureau from the field of antitrust violation.

Attorney General BIDDLE. Senator FERGUSON, in your understanding of a rating bureau, the State bears before fixing any rate you——

Senator FERGUSON. Take Texas.

Attorney General BIDDLE. Texas is fine.

Senator FERGUSON. I think where the rating bureau fixes the rate, I think you violate the antitrust law; you can violate a Federal law and be in compliance with State law.

Senator O'MAHONEY. It is not the policy——

Attorney General BIDDLE. I want to assure the committee that if they did wish to go into the field a little further that I will hold hands off while you are investigating the whole subject.

Senator HATCH. I think that assurance from the Attorney General is very important. As a matter of fact, these companies have gone ahead and operated under what they thought was the law. I do not think they should be prosecuted, myself, criminally.

Senator FERGUSON. I do not mean that they have any criminal intent.

Senator HATCH. I do not think so either. I would be very happy if the Department of Justice would hold hands off until Congress can explore the whole field and enact what we think is proper legislation.

Attorney General BIDDLE. It is proper coordination between branches of the Government.

Senator FERGUSON. We do not have any right as Congress to ask that.

Senator O'MAHONEY. I want to call the attention of the committee to the concluding paragraph of the comment on the decision, and outlining the policy of the Department, the Attorney General says:

"Surely this most important business can be conducted in accordance with effective State regulatory laws without resort to private monopolistic and coercive practices which violate the Federal antitrust laws. The insurance companies now have the opportunity to change those rate-fixing and other practices which, under this decision, may be in conflict with the Sherman Act. The Department of Justice realizes that the insurance companies will need to adjust their practices so as to accommodate themselves to the Supreme Court's decision and will be guided by this consideration."

Senator FERGUSON. As I understand it, Mr. Attorney General, it is not asked that the insurance companies immediately change their practice?

Attorney General BIDDLE. No.

Senator FERGUSON. Until after we can investigate it.

Attorney General BIDDLE. I think both things will probably be going on at the same time.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not consider if they do not immediately change while we are conducting hearings that therefore we would have criminal prosecutions?

Attorney General BIDDLE. No. There is no thought of that.

Senator HATCH. I want to say this for the record: I have listened to the Attorney General and I have never found anything which he said that sustained the thought that the Federal Government was going out and institute a whole lot of unnecessary prosecutions of people who thought they were complying with the law. I think the attitude of the Department of Justice has been very fine in this whole matter.

Attorney General BIDDLE. I appreciate that.

Senator O'MAHONEY. I think I can say on the record that 4 years ago I was invited to Philadelphia to speak to the American Bar Association on this problem of this insurance. There was a difference of time between Washington and Philadelphia. Philadelphia had daylight saving time; Washington did not. I did not know Philadelphia was——

Attorney General BIDDLE. A little behind.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In any event I arrived there after I was scheduled to appear, so I was late for my appointment and another gentleman was talking. The burden of his speech to the Bar Association was that the Government at Washington intended to lay its heavy hand upon the treasuries of the insurance companies.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, we have some history.

Senator O'MAHONEY. The unfounded charge was being made that there was a definite purpose of the Federal Government to seize these funds. Well, fortunately, I came in after the meeting had begun, and not before, so that I was able to reply to that charge and to show that there was no basis for the charge. Fortunately, as chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee which had studied the life-insurance field, I was able to say the Securities and Exchange Commission, which had participated in the study and which was represented on the Committee itself, had not ever suggested any such thing, that nobody had made such a suggestion to the Committee. It was never considered before the Committee that there should be Federal supervision or any attempt to take over the funds of life-insurance companies.

Therefore, I am very happy, Mr. Attorney General, you made the statement today that nobody in the Department of Justice ever suggested that.

Senator HATCH. Mr. Reporter, everything here you have taken down this afternoon may be given to the reporters.

(At 5 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned.)

Veterans' Rights Under the G. I. Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, this war will not go on forever. One of these days it will be over; I pray soon.

We will then face a tremendous problem. It will be a problem of returning all these fighting men and women, too, back into normal channels of civilian life. This is a most important problem because it affects 10 percent of our entire population. It is the most vigorous 10 percent of the Nation—the young men and women upon whom the future welfare of this country will depend. Every effort must be made that nothing will interfere with the physical and economic development of this segment of our people.

They will be coming back at a time when the country's national economy may be under terrific strain, when millions now employed in war production may be laid off, plants may shut down; no one can accurately predict the shape of those things to come.

But one prediction can be made with certainty. The millions of men and women returning from the war fronts and camps will need jobs, money, training, hospitalization, and other assistance. They will expect stability and security, so that they can start rebuilding their private lives.

We must give them all that. It is the least we can do for them because they will have given us continued freedom and liberty.

The G. I. bill of rights will provide a sound, modest, constructive plan for dealing with the entire veteran problem of this war. It will substitute order and system for the chaos and confusion now existing as a dozen different Government agencies are quarreling over control of certain functions for veterans. It will centralize responsibility, reduce red tape, eliminate overlapping services, reduce costs, and, most of all, assure the new veterans of a decent break.

Under the G. I. bill which was passed by Congress, the veterans have the following rights:

TITLE I. HOSPITALIZATION, CLAIMS, AND PROCEDURES

First. Adequate organization of the Veterans' Administration to administer all veterans' benefits except employment.

Second. Adequate hospital facilities for the care and treatment of veterans for nonservice disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

Third. The right to have explained to him before discharge or release from active service all rights and benefits to which he may be entitled as a veteran, and an opportunity, if he so desires, to file a claim therefor.

Fourth. The right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefit in the use of such appliances.

Fifth. Adequate safeguards as against forced statements against interest.

Sixth. Adequate contact facilities in Army and Navy discharge centers, including those furnished by the services, by the American Red Cross, by national veterans' organizations, and by the Veterans' Administration.

Seventh. Prompt transfer of the essential records of service departments to the Veteran's Administration and prompt adjudication of claims for benefits.

Eighth. The right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service, (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (b) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (c) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (a) and (b) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

TITLE II. EDUCATION OF VETERANS

First. One year, or the equivalent thereof in continuous part-time study of education or training (a) at any school or institution of his own choice; (b) in any subject or subjects desired for which he is fitted.

Second. Not to exceed 3 additional years of education and training, dependent upon (a) length of service; (b) satisfactory progress in studies or training; (c) the condition that the person was not over 25 years of age at the time of entrance into service, or if over such age, that his education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of entrance into service.

Third. Payment of all tuition and other fees, the cost of books, supplies, equipment, and other necessary expenses not to exceed a maximum of $500 per school year.

Fourth. Subsistence allowance while pursuing education or training in the amount of $50 per month if without dependents, or $75 per month with a dependent or dependents.

Fifth. Part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance, but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

Sixth. The right to have released to him books and equipment furnished if he satisfactorily completes his course of education or training.

NOTE.—The right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

TITLE III. LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOMES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

First. Loans for the purposes stated or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000; (a) loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions; (b) interest rate must not exceed 4 percent per annum; (c) the loan must be practicable and suitable to the veteran's circumstances; (d) the loan must be repaid within 20 years; (e) the Government must have the right of subrogation to the extent of any guaranty paid; (f) the liability under the guaranty must decrease or increase with the decrease or increase of the amount of unpaid obligation; (g) the agreement must permit the Government to protect itself in case of default through the right to bid on foreclosure proceedings or to refinance; (h) the proceeds of the proposed loan must be used for one or more of the purposes specified and the circumstances must meet the specifications of the title.

Second. In the event a principal loan is made—or committed to be made—by a Federal lending agency, or to be guaranteed or insured by such agency, a loan for all or part of the balance of the purchase price may be guaranteed; (a) if it does not exceed $2,000; (b) if it does not exceed 20 percent of the cost or purchase price; (c) if the interest rate does not exceed by more than 1 percent the interest rate on the principal loan; (d) if the conditions otherwise meet those prescribed under (1) above.

Third. Any veteran eligible under title III shall also be eligible for the benefits of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended, to the same extent as if he were a farm tenant. Eligibility must be determined (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, (b) by the Secretary of Agriculture.

TITLE IV. EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS

First. The right to registration for employment and for placement in employment by the Veterans' Employment Service through (a) the United States Employment Service, (b) any State employment agency cooperating with the United States Employment Service.

Note: First. This right applies to any veteran of any war discharged or released from active service under conditions other than dishonorable.

Note: Second. While the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is responsible for veterans' employment, this is not a function of the Veterans' Administration, but is retained in the United States Employment Service.

TITLE V. READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES FOR FORMER MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES WHO ARE UNEMPLOYED

Unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed, subject to the following conditions:

First. The week of unemployment must have begun (a) after the first Sunday of the third calendar month after the effective date of the act; (b) not later than 2 years after discharge or release from active service or the termination of the war, whichever be the later date.

Second. The person is not receiving subsistence allowance for education or training under title XI of the act, or increased pension for vocational training under Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress.

Third. To be eligible, the person must (a) reside in the United States; (b) be completely unemployed, or if partially employed, at wages less than $23 per week; (c) be registered with and report to a public employment office; (d) be able to work and available for suitable work.

Fourth. Any person will be disqualified from receiving an allowance if (a) he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause, or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; (b) he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work or to accept suitable work offered; (c) he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; (d) he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage.

Fifth. Within the 52 weeks limit the total eligibility is determined by allowing 8 weeks of allowances for each of the first 3 months of service, and 4 weeks of allowances for each month or major fraction thereof of service beyond 3 months.

Sixth. No allowance may be paid for any period more than 5 years after the end of the war.

Seventh. The allowance of $20 per week will be reduced by any Federal or State unemployment or disability compensation—other than pension, compensation, or retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration—received by the veteran for the same period of time.

Eighth. Any person self-employed for profit in an independent establishment, trade, business, profession, or other vocation is eligible for readjustment allowances (a) if net earnings are less than $100 for the previous calendar month; (b) the amount of allowance to be the difference between the net earnings and $100 per month; (c) the conditions as to eligibility otherwise as provided in title V.

Ninth. Severe penalties are provided for fraud and misrepresentation in connection with claims for readjustment allowances.

Tenth. Readjustment allowance claims are to be serviced by State agencies or as to railway employees, by the Railroad Retirement Board.

Eleventh. Right of appeal from any such agency to the Administration of Veterans' Affairs is preserved.

Title VI. General administrative and penal provisions:

First. By definition "veterans" are included those who reside within the continental United States, several States, Territories, and possessions, and the District of Columbia.

Second. A discharge or release from active service under conditions other than dishonorable is made a prerequisite to entitlement to benefits under Public Law No. 2, as amended, as well as this act. This will apply to (a) pensions, (b) compensation, (c) hospitalization, (d) domiciliary care, (e) vocational training, (f) benefits provided by this act.

The bill will prevent a repetition of the tragic mistakes under which World War No. 1 veterans suffered and will guarantee just treatment to our veterans.

Post-War Problems of the Building Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following address of Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming, Administrator of the Federal Works Agency, before the annual meeting of the Building Officials Conference of America, Inc., at Boston, Mass., June 14, 1944:

I am very happy to be with you today, because you, as public buildings officials, and we in the Federal Works Agency, which is a construction arm of the United States Government, will have increasingly many problems in common.

For a long time I have felt that in the transition period immediately after the war we should be able to look to construction work of all kinds to make an important contribution to national economic stability; and it seemed to me that those of us who are directly interested in such activities should be preparing ourselves now to handle increased responsibilities.

The interest of the Federal Works Agency in the subject may be appreciated when the scope of our operations is borne in mind. F. W. A. has come to be identified with the administration of the Lanham Act, under which we are assisting communities in war-impacted areas to acquire and operate public facilities essential in the war effort, but actually the Lanham Act operations are a minor part of our responsibilities. The Agency includes the Public Roads Administration, which supervises all highway activities of the Federal Government in aid to States; the Public Buildings Administration, which is responsible for the erection, maintenance, and operation of federally owned buildings; and formerly included the United States Housing Authority, which was transferred to the new National Housing Agency for the duration under the President's War Powers Act. Other constituent units were the Public Works Administration and W. P. A., now in liquidation. Not only are our operations far-flung, but they go down to the grass roots of the Nation and involve the closest sort of cooperation between the States and local communities and the Federal Government.

In normal times construction accounts for from 10 to 12 percent of the national income. It is obvious, therefore, that a high level of construction after the war could make a most important contribution to general well-being. In a national annual income of $140,000,000,000, which is the figure generally mentioned as essential if we are to have something like full employment, the construction industry's contribution ought to be somewhere between 14 billion and 17 billion dollars.

But construction must be planned in all its details in advance of contract letting, and it is obvious that, unless the planning is completed before the close of hostilities, construction will not be able to play an important part immediately afterwards, and there may be no jobs in construction for war veterans or displaced war workers at a time when jobs may be desperately needed.

It is important, therefore, that the planning should be under way now, and it is equally important that we should know how much is under way. This we do not know. We do not yet know how much purely private construction to expect. We do not know how many businessmen already have draftsmen at work producing blueprints for new office buildings, stores, factories or apartment houses. My impression is that very little has yet been done by private business, for it seems logical to think that business men generally will be disposed to wait and see what the post-war situation is going to be before making capital commitments.

About a third of all construction in normal times is public construction. Here, at least, we have a pretty good idea what the need will be. During the war, public building, except for such as is directly essential to the war effort, is being postponed, so that the Nation is accumulating a large backlog of potential public work represented by the new schools, hospitals, highways, bridges, sewer and water systems, and so on, which would have been built over the last 3 or 4 years if there had been no war. In addition to this potential backlog is deferred maintenance work—the normal day-to-day minor improvements and repairs that would have been made had labor and materials been available.

This public portion of our desired post-war construction volume can be planned now—planned in all of its details, complete with engineering surveys, working drawings, site acquisition, specifications, and contract documents, all ready to go at the first indication there are not enough jobs in private business to go around.

I have tried very hard to find out just how much of this public work has been planned against demobilization day. The task has not been an easy one, because I have been given no authority to collect information on the matter, nor is there anywhere else in the Government any agency authorized to collect, classify, or tabulate such information. So far as I can find out, the amount of State and municipal planning under way is far too little to make any appreciable contribution to economic stability immediately after the war, and I have urged a modest amount of Federal assistance to the communities in order to stimulate the preparation of a really adequate program.

I thought my quest for definite information as to the amount of public planning now going forward would be in vain until, recently, I read the testimony given by Mr. Eric Johnston, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, before the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. Johnston, as well as the Chamber, is opposed to Federal aid to States and communities for public works. His position is that the States and local communities are in a far better financial position than the Federal Government, and that they are not only capable of doing their own planning without outside assistance but are actually doing it. To quote his words, "The depression role of the States and communities as pauper and the Federal Government as prince has changed. It should remain changed."

Mr. Johnson told the committee that "recent surveys indicate that municipalities alone have ready for contract, or on the drafting board, or under survey, capital improvements valued at some $3,700,000,000. This," he added, "is not a mere listing of more or less desirable projects. It is needed work which is being put into blueprints * * * It means that we are assured that useful public works will provide their share of employment after the war."

I read that and exclaimed, "Eureka! In the words of the old hymn, 'This is the day I long have sought, and mourned because I found it not.' This is something definite to tie to."

But, being somewhat cautious by nature, I thought I had better get the actual figures on which Mr. Johnston's statement was based. So we asked the Chamber of Commerce and were told that, "No, the Chamber itself had no figures and that Mr. Johnston's statement was based upon material that had been collected by the American Public Works Association."

Now, it happens that Herbert D. Fritz, executive director of the American Public Works Association, also testified before the House committee. He said that the association had sent out questionnaires to a number of cities and had received replies from 68, ranging in size from Greendale, Wis. (population 2,700), to San Francisco. These replies indicated that one-twelfth of the cities in this group could have let contracts on January 1, 1944, for something like $50,000,000 worth of work. On the same day, the survey disclosed, surveys and plans had been instituted for capital improvements valued at around $140,000,000, and it was interesting to note that preliminary surveys of a general nature have been started on projects aggregating about $440,000,000 worth of construction.

Mr. Fritz then went on to explain that the data, secured from "a fairly representative sample of the municipalities of the Nation, might be projected to provide a rough estimate of advance plan preparation of all cities under a million population. On this basis," he said, "it can be estimated that capital improvements valued at $550,000,000 were ready for contract on January 1, 1944, in the cities under a million population. By the same token, $1,600,000,000 worth of work was under survey or on the drafting board, and, if our studies are not too far out of line, a total of $3,780,000,000 worth of public improvements were being given preliminary study."

Mr. Fritz then threw in this caution: "Do not think that the last-named improvements (the $3,780,000,000 worth) are ready for contract. In many instances, 1-year, 2-year, 5-year, or 10-year programs are being listed and studied at this moment."

This, then, is where Mr. Johnston gets his figure of $3,700,000,000. As Mr. Fritz presented it, it did not pretend to be an actual tabulation. It was merely a projection on the basis of a very small sample. But when Mr. Johnston got around to using it, it was no longer a mere projection—a mere guess; it had become a recent survey that indicated that "municipalities alone have ready for contract or on the drafting board or under survey, capital improvements valued at some $3,700,000,000." Moreover, he said, "This is not a mere listing of more or less desirable projects. It is needed work which is being put into blueprints. * * * It means that we are assured that useful public works will provide their share of employment after the war." With due deference to Mr. Johnston, it very obviously doesn't mean anything of the kind.

Now, observe that Mr. Fritz didn't say that $3,700,000,000 worth of public improvements were on the drafting board or under survey. He simply said that they were being given preliminary study, which is something entirely different. That might mean actual work with rod and transit, but it also might mean no more than that some desirable projects had been mentioned by the mayor in an after-dinner speech.

Yet this is the data which, it appears, Mr. Johnston uses, without Mr. Fritz's cautious qualifications, to substantiate his position that an adequate job of public-works planning is being done and that no Federal assistance is necessary. He also fails to mention the fact that of the cities responding to the questionnaire of the American Public Works Association, 68 percent answered the question, "Do you feel that local advance plan preparation could be furthered by Federal assistance?" with an unequivocal "Yes." Mr. Fritz pointed out that his association is urging Federal participation to the extent of 50 percent of the cost of surveys and the preparation of detailed construction plans and specifications for needed and useful public works in the transition period.

But let's be generous. Let's assume that $3,700,000,000 worth of public work has been not merely talked about, that it is not merely in process of survey, but that it is actually planned in all its details with working drawings and specifications and contract documents, so that it could be let to contract within 24 hours after peace comes. The figure is impressive, but how does it stack up with past experience? We have some information on that. In 1939 regular expenditures for public works in this country, plus work relief, came to a little more than $4,000,000,000, so that the best we can hope for by Mr. Johnston's calculation in the first post-war year, when unemployment may reach maximum proportions, is a quarter of a billion dollars less than in the last full year before the war.

There are some other estimates of the volume of public work now in process of planning. The International City Managers' Association has made a survey, based on a larger sampling of municipalities, and estimates that American cities of more than 25,000 population are planning capital improvements to cost more than $4,500,000,000 during the first 5 years after the war. That gives us an average of $900,000,000 a year for 5 years, or about half the regular Government expenditures for public improvements in the tough depression year 1932. Moreover, from half to two-thirds of this sum will be spent on maintenance and not new construction, according to the City Managers' Association, whereas the figure cited for 1932 was all new construction in addition to maintenance.

The American Society of Planning Officials, commenting on the city managers' survey, observes that, "in spite of debt reductions and money saved, it seems fair to say that only a very limited amount of public works can be undertaken with presently foreseeable municipal funds."

If, after 2½ years of war, the best that American cities can do is adequately reflected by even the most optimistic of the estimates now available, it isn't good enough. Something must be done to stimulate planning, and that stimulus, in my judgment, will have to be some sort of Federal financial aid for plan preparation, either on a loan or grant basis. As Mr. Fritz remarks, "If you want the dough to rise, you have to put some yeast in it."

In advocating Federal assistance for planning I am not thinking or talking in terms of billions. I am thinking in terms of a few millions, perhaps about what the war is costing us every 12 hours, expenditure of which may mean the difference between success and failure. The Nation has a responsibility here, for it is a war-connected problem. The Federal Government cannot, through its war policies, disorganize the normal course of American life, draft the young manhood of the Nation, spend billions of dollars to stimulate munitions production with all that has meant in the way of reshuffling the lives of millions of men and women, and then, once the war is won, wash its hands of the consequences of its own policies and throw back upon the local communities or upon private business the problem of unscrambling the mess on the job front. I don't think we are going to accept Mr. Johnston's advice, fold our hands and wait for "George" to do it. If we do not mean to have a job program that will mean something in terms of bread and butter to our discharged servicemen and to our demobilized war workers, we might as well confess our moral and intellectual bankruptcy now.

Yet, more than jobs are at stake. Additional public facilities are needed on their own account and as an adjunct to that expansion of private business which we must have in the post-war period.

A well-planned program of public work, ready for use when and where needed, is one essential, but it would be a mistake to suppose that it alone will solve all of our post-war problems or that, alone, it will stabilize the construction industry. I am in agreement with Mr. Johnston on that.

In addition to public building, we should do everything possible to stimulate private building. Of course, the decision as to whether private capital will build in the immediate post-war period will be made by private capital itself. You and I cannot directly influence the judgment of the market, but we can, at least, do everything possible to remove unnecessary obstacles in the way of private building.

This would be a good time to reexamine our State and local building codes to see whether they still rest upon a logical basis or merely reflect accretions of rules and regulations imposed at the instance of various pressure groups.

Our experience has been that existing codes range all the way from the unbelievably lax to the almost prohibitively rigid. I know of one State with a plumbing code that, I was told by a local board of education member, needlessly added $70,000 to the cost of every $400,000 schoolhouse by its requirements as to the large number of toilets that must be provided. Repeated surveys had shown that all those toilets could not possibly be in use at one time, but there they stand in rows of glistening white.

We need also to be especially receptive to the new materials which no doubt will emerge from this war.

Sometime you ought to invite Mr. W. E. Reynolds, Commissioner of the Public Buildings Administration of the Federal Works Agency, to tell your conference about the research work he is constantly carrying on in the fields of building design, building materials, and construction techniques. The ordinary architect designs a building and is then through with it. He may never see it again. The same is true of the ordinary building contractor. The Public Buildings Administration, on the contrary, not only designs and constructs buildings, but it has to live with them ever after. Consequently it has an enormous interest in the cost of their operation and maintenance.

In Washington alone, the Government owns or rents space in 383 buildings, so you can see the tremendous importance to the taxpayers of improving the quality of construction and reducing operating costs. Those 383 buildings represent 47,000,000 gross square feet of floor space. Imagine the economies that would result if you could reduce the cost of cleaning those buildings by as little as 1 cent a square foot. It would amount to nearly $500,000 annually, or about 5 percent of the total cleaning bill. Such economies are not to be achieved alone by time-motion studies of the techniques of pushing a mop around; they can be achieved also, and to an even greater extent, by eliminating crooks and crannies that require extra cleaning. Why, for instance, should baseboards be set out an inch or so from the wall, leaving a ledge for the charwoman to have to clean? Why not make them flush with the wall and bring relief to the poor woman's aching back?

Mr. Reynolds tells me that if he finds P. B. A. doing a certain thing in the same way for as much as 2 years in succession he knows it is being done wrong and that it is time to change. I suspect that is a humorous exaggeration, but it does emphasize a very proper concern about the danger of falling into ruts. There is no question that much of our architecture is purely traditional, loaded with "carry-overs" from grandfather's day.

To quote Mr. Reynolds, again, the time has come when design must be based upon a rational concept of use, with emphasis upon adaptability of space and minimum operating costs.

Take the matter of windows. A window exists for one purpose, and only one: To let light into the room. It isn't set into the wall just to look pretty, although, of course, it may have some decorative value. Its proper function is to let in maximum light, and anything that detracts from that function is worse than waste. This brings up the whole problem of window spacing, in which much research is being done. And it leads naturally into a study of the artificial lighting of interiors, with proper intensities for the work to be done. Colors of walls and floor coverings and reflecting surfaces of desks and equipment are also relevant. The National Electric Light Association has done a great deal of research into this subject, and shown that for office work the intensity of the lighting can be stepped down if the paper and ink used are only of the right colors. It is safe to say that millions of dollars in light bills now wasted annually could be saved by a more intelligent use of lighting. In Government buildings hereafter we mean to save them.

Greater attention hereafter will be given to other mechanical features—such as plumbing, heating, and air conditioning. The double glazing of windows, to keep out summer heat and winter cold, unquestionably will come more and more into use. P. B. A. is running a number of studies on the insulation of outside walls, and also on solar heating. The one greatest source of heat in our solar system is the sun itself. Why not find a way to use it, and so cut down our fuel bills?

You will hear more hereafter of radiant heating, by which I mean the heating of large surfaces, such as walls, floors, and ceilings, rather than the often futile attempt to heat the atmosphere. I am told that in Des Moines, Iowa, there is an office building under construction, the walls of which are insulated with cork. Also in the walls heating pipes are imbedded. With radiant heating you will be as comfortable with a temperature of 65 degrees as you are at 70 with traditional heating appliance. Given a combination of radiant and solar heating, and next time we won't have to worry so much about our fuel oil coupons and labor troubles in the coal mines.

The problem of vertical transportation—which is to say, elevator service—is entitled to more study than has yet been given it. Mr. Reynolds tells me that in one of our Federal buildings the design called for 17 elevators. "But why 17?" he asked. "Why not 16 or 19?" He was assured that the matter had had most careful consideration, and that 17, no more and no less, was the correct answer. But using just about the same methods that a traffic engineer would apply to the development of a street layout, it was discovered that a high percentage of the traffic would be between the basement, with its cafeteria, and the third floor. What was done was to install 2 escalators—which can be operated at a power cost of less than 75 cents a day each per floor—and 7 larger elevators instead of 17. The savings included space that otherwise would have been wasted, plus the services of 10 elevator operators.

You are familiar with the traditional American post office. You enter the lobby and are confronted by a high partition, back of which the clerks work, with here and there a barred window labeled, respectively, "Stamps—retail," "Registered mail," "Parcel post"—and so on down the line.

What is the logic of this arrangement? There isn't any. I presume it was copied from bank architecture. It is interesting to note, however, that many of the banks themselves are getting away from barred windows. The post office in the future will have a simple counter on which the customer can rest his elbows and transact his business with a feeling that he is dealing with a human being and not a bureaucratic robot. We will give the clerk, and the customer too, plenty of elbow room instead of confining their transaction to a two-by-four slit in a grilled window. And you'll find that each clerk can wait on two or three times as many people in an hour as he can now in his little barred cage.

Returning to the subject of toilets—and you understand, of course, that my interest in them is wholly scientific—Mr. Reynolds predicts that in the future all fixtures, including wash stands and toilet seats, will be suspended from the walls and the partitions from the ceiling. The janitor will not then have to spend 2 hours a night on his knees scrubbing around the fixtures; he will clean the whole room in 5 minutes simply by turning a hose on it.

The work of the P. B. A. research laboratories is of significance, not merely to the Government and the taxpayers, but to all builders everywhere. Some building material manufacturers are engaged in research, usually limited to developing new uses for their own product, but the P. B. A., so far as I know, is the only agency in the country today that is conducting objective studies on a regular, continuing basis into the whole range of building materials, design, and construction. Perhaps it is the only one whose construction and managerial operations are on a large enough scale to justify the cost.

There is nothing secret about this work. The public pays for it and the results are public property. They are available to every architect, contractor, or building commissioner who cares to ask for them. They will more and more find wide application in the work of all builders and owners of buildings.

It is especially toward the newer ideas and the newer materials that I hope we will keep our minds receptive. They point the way to better conditions of living and working in the post-war world. And especially in the transition period they can perform an important service from which our whole economy can, and will, benefit.

Sermon by Rev. Joseph S. O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. FAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. FAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include therein a sermon preached by the Reverend Joseph S. O'Connell, pastor of the Roman Catholic Church of the Epiphany.

This sermon was delivered at a solemn high mass arranged by the Anawanda Club of New York City for all its members and the community to pray for the success of the invasion. The services were held on Monday morning, June 12, at 8 o'clock mass.

Father O'Connell is a distinguished prelate of the Catholic Church of New York City, having served for many years as the director of all the Catholic hospitals in the archdiocese of New York.

We gather this morning in these sacred precincts to acknowledge our dependence on God, our Father. In this hour of trial and anxiety we turn to Him who has given us so many and so great gifts and ask His further blessing on our country and particularly on our armed forces. Our purpose here this morning is fourfold. First, we place ourselves humbly at the feet of our Father, acknowledging our own short-comings and the favors we have abused, and we pledge ourselves so to live our daily lives that we might deserve His blessings on our efforts. Secondly, realizing the brotherhood in Christ that binds us together we join our efforts in prayer with the valiant deeds of our brothers in arms that success may crown our undertakings. Thirdly, conscious that this is not a 1-day affair we pledge to God our untiring efforts to please Him and to our fighting men our continued prayers to keep them. Finally, for those who shall never return we pray the mercy of God. We pray that those about to make the supreme sacrifice of life itself may die in His friendship and that all the war dead may enjoy that real peace, eternal peace, greater by far than the peace they are fighting for and which we hope soon to enjoy.

The Pittsburgh Courier Denounces Failure to Enact Anti-Poll-Tax Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I include herewith an editorial entitled "What Price Trickery," published in the Pittsburgh Courier, largest and most influential Negro newspaper. With a highly serious concern, not only for the Negro people, but for the future of democratic America this great journal, with over 1,000,000 readers, points with deep regret to the failure of this session of the Congress to enact H. R. 7, my anti-poll-tax bill. It indicates that Negro Americans, who are serving so gallantly in our armed forces in every theater of war and who are contributing their full share to our home-front war effort, have reached a political maturity. This is a welcome sign for all America. I invite the careful reading and consideration of my colleagues to this editorial:

WHAT PRICE TRICKERY?

Negro Americans have important lessons to learn from the gesture of the Republican majority in the United States Senate to sponsor a resolution calling for an amendment to the Constitution abolishing poll tax as a prerequisite for voting. No fair-minded person wishes to impugn the motives of the Republicans for this gesture. We will assume that it is genuine and honest. We cannot get away from the belief, however, that the same initiative and the same action should have been taken years and years ago; especially, when the Republicans had great majorities in both Houses of Congress.

Negro Americans have important lessons to learn from the recent failure of the Senate of the United States to enact a Federal anti-poll-tax law. We need to examine with thoughtful care all of the circumstances which led to the defeat of this vital measure.

Federal anti-poll-tax bills have been before the Congress for 6 years. Exhaustive congressional hearings on the bills have been held, with hundreds of witnesses. On two occasions 218 Members of the House of Representatives have signed a discharge petition to force consideration of the legislation because the Judiciary Committee of the House, with HATTON SUMNERS, of Texas, as chairman, undemocratically pigeonholed the bills. Twice the House of Representatives by a vote of approximately two to one adopted the legislation. Twice the Senate Judiciary Committee by a substantial majority reported favorably on the bill and placed it on the Senate calendar. Each time it has come to the floor of the Senate a majority of the Senators have publicly expressed themselves as favoring passage of the bill.

In the 6 years the bill has been pending in Congress it has amassed tremendous popular support. All sections of organized labor: The A. F. of L., the C. I. O., the railroad brotherhoods have worked actively for passage of the measure. Great numbers of church, women's, Negro, and civic groups have supported it. From the southern poll-tax States have come the support of thousands of white southerners urging its passage. Few measures have demonstrated such overwhelming popular support from all sections of America.

Not even the bitterest opponent of the Federal antipoll tax legislation denies the evils of the poll-tax system. Poll-tax requirements now inextricably imbedded in the State constitutions of eight Southern States were adopted between 1890 and 1908 for the express purpose of depriving Negro citizens of the right to vote. The men who wrote these provisions said this explicitly in the constitutional conventions of these States. The effect over the years of poll-tax restrictions, coupled with fraudulent practices in registering Negro voters, and, until recently, the white Democratic primary, has been to eliminate fully 95 percent of the Negro citizens of the South from any participation in the elections. These restrictions have barred 4,000,000 Negroes from voting. The cancer spread. Now 6,000,000 poor white citizens are also voteless. Corruption has crept into the system. Political machines, built upon the manipulation of large blocs of poll-tax receipts never seen by the voters in whose names they are issued, now dominate scores of large southern cities. From the poll tax States come Representatives to Congress, elected by less than 10 percent of the adult citizens, who year after year throttle the entire Nation with their reactionary control of the national machinery of legislation.

Nor should it be supposed that the fight to abolish the poll tax is a tempest in a teapot simply because of the seeming smallness of the poll tax levy. The poll-tax system is not as simple as that. One or two dollars is a sum of great proportion to a Negro sharecropper's family, whose total annual income may be less than $200. In Mississippi one has to pay his poll tax each year for 2 years prior to February 1 before he is eligible to register as a voter. In many of the States poll taxes are cumulative and payable far in advance of elections. These are real and not imaginary hardships, especially for people deprived of the opportunity to earn a decent living or secure an adequate public school education.

For 50 years these restrictions have robbed the Negro in the South of the right to vote. The price of his votelessness has been poor schools, urban and rural slums, miserable health facilities, indescribable poverty, lynchings, and mob violence—a total pattern of discrimination which has made him a second-class citizen.

With America engaged in a crucial war struggle for the very survival of her democratic institutions, the abolition of barriers which disfranchise 10,000,000 Americans becomes a vital necessity for victory. Such action would release tremendous pent-up energies of millions of voteless Americans, Negro and white, for the American war effort. It would give sorely needed assurance to Negro Americans, and to millions of colonial peoples of the darker races, without whose enthusiastic aid the day of our victory over Japan is long postponed, that the declarations of the Atlantic Charter are meant to bring freedom and democracy to all peoples. Thus the passage of the anti-poll-tax bill means the saving of the lives of tens of thousands of young Americans now dying for the democratic cause.

It is against this background of undisputed fact that Negro Americans and all Americans must judge the shameful hypocrisy which characterized the action of the Senate of the United States in killing the anti-poll-tax bill.

The leadership of both the Democratic and Republican Parties in the Senate engaged in tricky parliamentary maneuvers designed to confuse the American people, and to shift the blame for the shameful defeat of the bill to the other side.

In the interests of democracy it is necessary to cut through this camouflage and lay bare the facts.

Take first the role played by Senator ALBEN BARKLEY, majority leader of the Senate. He voted for cloture. He was on record to vote for the bill if it could be brought to vote. When his cloture motion failed, he told the Senate that he would vote to take the bill from the Senate floor, since he believed that without cloture the bill could not be passed and since continued filibuster would result only in preventing passage of urgent legislation vital to the prosecution of the war. On the surface, no one could ask for more than this.

But let us look beneath the surface. The anti-poll-tax bill was passed in the House on May 25, 1943. It did not reach the floor of the Senate for nearly 1 year. From May until November 1943 the delaying tactics of Senator TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, were successful in keeping the bill bottled up in the Senate Judiciary Committee. Then, on November 12, 1943, the bill was reported out of the committee and placed on the Senate Calendar.

For 150 legislative days the bill stayed on the calendar without action. Senator BARKLEY says this was because the Senate could not interrupt its business of passing vital war measures. Yet for 71 of those days the Senate did not meet because it had no business of any kind to transact.

It lay within the power of Senator BARKLEY to force consideration of the bill as early as November 12, 1943, if not sooner. It lay within his power, and was his patriotic duty, to keep the Senate in session for as many days and as many hours each day as was necessary to defeat the treasonable filibuster of the poll-tax bloc. Moreover he knew that if the bill were on the floor of the Senate, no Senator on either side would dare refuse his request for unanimous consent to suspend, temporarily, debate on the measure to take up and dispose of any important war measure requiring immediate action.

But instead of pursuing this course—a course urged publicly in the Senate by his colleagues, Senators WAGNER and MEAD of New York—Senator BARKLEY prematurely introduced a cloture motion he knew would fail; and, then, after but 5 days of debate supported the motion of Senator CLARK of Missouri which killed the bill. Negroes in Kentucky should remember Senator BARKLEY this fall.

The conclusion seems inescapable that BARKLEY no more wanted to see the anti-poll tax bill passed than did EILEO of Mississippi. Both BARKLEY and BILBO seemed to fear the ground swell of public resentment which would have been certain to have arisen if the filibuster had continued several weeks; a public opinion that would have engulfed the filibuster and developed enough pressure to make certain a successful cloture vote. BARKLEY played ball with the poll-tax bloc. All his fine words cannot hide his ugly deeds.

But the duplicity of Republican leadership in the Senate is equally intolerable. During the present Congress on every issue in which the Republican Party had a vital stake, Republican Senators voted as a solid bloc. They could have done so on the anti-poll-tax bill had they not been so intent in making cheap political capital out of embarrassing the Democratic Party before the Negro voter. Instead, the Republican Senators adopted the two-faced policy of coming out for passage of the bill, but of having just enough of their number vote against cloture to defeat the cloture motion. Thirteen Republican Senators joined hands with the Negro-hating poll-tax Democrats to defeat cloture, knowing full well that without cloture all their fine talk about favoring anti-poll-tax legislation was sounding brass and tinkling cymbals.

Nor was the Republican leadership any more active than BARKLEY in forcing the measure to the floor of the Senate and keeping it there. It was Senate Republican Minority Leader WALLACE WHITE, of Maine, safe in the knowledge that he has few Negro voters in his State, who jumped to the support of CLARK of Missouri, BARKLEY of Kentucky, and CONNALLY of Texas in their successful effort to take the anti-poll-tax bill off the Senate floor. This was an act of deceit for which the Republican Senators cannot evade responsibility.

Negro Americans—nearly a million of us in the armed service of our country and millions more giving their best effort to the cause of a democratic victory—had a right to expect better treatment on this burning moral issue. We had a right to expect honest dealings from both Democratic and Republican Senate leadership, not double-talk.

We had a right to expect President Franklin D. Roosevelt to use his fullest energies publicly and privately for the passage of this bill. It was not enough for him to express disapproval of the poll-tax system. The abolition of the poll tax was a war measure of signal importance to America's war effort. Certainly the President missed his golden opportunity when he failed to call for the passage of this bill. He has called for must legislation before.

We had a right to expect that Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, the leading aspirant for the Republican nomination, would do more than deliver himself of pious expression against the poll tax.

This is the way the matter stands today. There should not be a Negro American today who does not pledge himself to register now in order to cast his vote in the November elections.

The Negro vote is already of first-rate importance in the coming elections. But it can become much more powerful if the hundreds of thousands of women, of war workers and their families who have moved to different war centers, take steps now to register. In most States this is not too late. In most States tens of thousands of unregistered Negro citizens can make themselves eligible to vote by acting now.

To be eligible to vote is one thing. To have the will and the intelligence to cast a vote and to realize that wrongs may be righted only at the ballot box is a duty and a privilege.

Outstanding County Farm Family Forged Ahead During Last 3 Years

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, do you remember the Oklahoma dust storms and the "Okies"? Here is a story of an Oklahoma farm family who stayed in Oklahoma, and last year won recognition as winners in a Farmers' Union State contest for showing the most progress of

F. S. A. families in five counties—and it is a story of a piece of Oklahoma land which never again will blow away. The story was published last year in the Progressive Farmer.

OUTSTANDING COUNTY FARM FAMILY FORGED AHEAD DURING LAST 3 YEARS

The Blanchard Osborn family on last Thursday received their recognition as winners in the Farmers' Union State contest for the best farm family showing the most progress in Farm Security Administration, district No. 5, consisting of five counties.

The Osborn family consists of father, mother, a son, Floyd 16, and a son, James 13. Before going into the accomplishments of the Osborn family for 1942 we will give you a little of their family history and background.

Mr. and Mrs. Osborn were both reared on farms and after their marriage, 18 years ago, started to farm for themselves as tenants. During the latter part of the twenties they were fairly successful, but due to drought, sickness, and depression in the thirties they lost all they had and during 1939, Mr. Osborn worked as a farm laborer. In November 1939 they applied for a loan from Farm Security Administration; with this loan of $590 they bought 3 cows, 5 work horses, 20 chickens, and farm machinery to start farming again on a rented farm. They made plans, kept records, and worked hard and were reasonably successful that year and increased their net worth from $465 to $640.

In 1941 Osborn was able to rent additional land and he and the rural supervisor thought that it would be to his advantage to change from horse power to tractor farming, so an additional loan was made to them for $795 to buy this equipment. At the end of 1941 their net worth was $2,446. When we visited in their home recently to obtain information for this story, Mrs. Osborn showed us the three record books which she has kept during the 3 years they have been financed by Farm Security Administration. The books show clearly the progress which this family has made on the road from farm laborers to farm owners.

MADE PLANS

On January 17, 1942, Mr. and Mrs. Blanchard Osborn, in conference with R. R. and H. M. supervisors, made written farm and home plans for the coming year. Through the year they consistently followed these plans as closely as possible. The record book which was kept up to date by Mrs. Osborn shows that these plans were well made since the actual operation in most cases ran close to the planned estimates.

For example, food planned to buy $140, actual $133; planned egg sales $375, actual $344; planned feed purchases $50, actual $60. The actual income from crops, however, far exceeded planned income as they had a bumper yield and higher prices than estimated. This increased income together with rise in prices caused the total amount actually spent for family living to be a little higher than planned; $438 actual, $389 planned. Some other things included in these plans and carried out in actual operation were as follows:

HOW IT WORKED

From plan to produce for home use: Fresh vegetables from garden, $58; milk, butter, cheese, $176; meat and lard from hogs and chickens, $122; eggs, $40; 400 quarts canned food, $100; stored food, 14 bushels, $20. Total, $516.

From record book (actually used), vegetables $85; milk, butter, $225; meat and lard, etc., $136; eggs $46; 380 quarts, $95; 18 bushels, $25. Total, $612.

At least part of the increased yields which the Osborns had was due to improved farm methods which they employed this year. On 40 acres of the farm land a heavy volunteer wheat growth was turned under in the spring before planting cotton. The yield on this land was 625 pounds lint per acre. Osborn also built up terraces, plowed during early winter on land that was not so sandy that it would blow, and left high maize stubble on all sandy land to prevent wind erosion. Better seeds and tillage Mrs. Osborn thinks was partly responsible for their increased garden production in 1942. For 1943 they will have irrigation facilities, and James, the younger son, is enrolled in gardening as one of his 4-H projects, so they are planning to produce a still better garden in 1943.

NEW TILE CELLAR

The Osborns have a new tile cellar which makes it possible for them to take better care of their canned and stored food supplies. Their household water supply is now much more convenient than before. A pump for the cistern is now installed in a little room just off the kitchen and they have put in a sink in the kitchen to carry off waste water. A new rug has been purchased for the living room.

They have not only produced more food for home use in 1942 than usual but have produced more eggs, pork, beef, and milk for sale than ever before. They have sold 1,376 dozen eggs, 460 pounds cream, 950 pounds beef, 132 pounds broilers and 580 pounds of pork. They also have 5 more beef calves which they are fattening out and 9 more head of hogs that will be ready to market soon, besides 3 bred brood sows that they plan to keep. They also sold 2 bales of long-staple cotton, besides 100 bales of ordinary staple cotton.

Of course, this year of good success has well repaid the Osborn family for their industry, planning and managing, by a large increase in net worth. Their record book showed their net worth at the beginning of 1942 to be $2,426, and at the end, $9,542. A net gain of $7,116. Their increased cash was well managed too. They first paid off $643 of their Farm Security Administration loan which was all of 1942, and almost all of 1943 maturities. Second, they made a $2,500 down payment on a good 160-acre farm which is the first they ever owned.

ENJOY NEW FARM

They moved to their new farm January 1, 1943. Third, they have a cash reserve in the bank with which to meet 1943 operating expenses and pay 1942 income tax. If they have sufficient money after paying their income tax they plan to make an additional payment on the remainder of their Farm Security Administration loan.

The entire Osborn family is active in the civic and social life of their community. They are members of and regularly attend a local church. James is a member of the 4-H Club, Mr. and Mrs. Osborn attend and assist in all group meetings which are held for the betterment of their local community. Floyd was enrolled in tenth grade and James in eighth grade in 1942, in Vinson School.

The financial progress of the Osborns from $465 in November 1939 to $9,542 in 1942, has been due to good planning, good managing, keeping records, lots of hard work, and taking advantage of every opportunity which came their way. The Osborns had never made a written farm or home plan nor ever kept records of their farm-and-home operations until they became Farm Security Administration clients. They are very appreciative of the financial and educational assistance given by the Farm Security Administration and both say that if it had not been for this assistance they would not have been able to go back to farming on a renter basis, much less own a farm.

Safe Investment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Malvina Lindsay, from the Washington Post of June 23, 1944:

SAFE INVESTMENT

It was one of the first invasion pictures. A group of bodies lying limp on a stretch of rocky coast—somewhere in Normandy. She could not get the boy nearest the camera out of her mind. That strange still heaviness about his slim young body. His helmet, his pack, his battle equipment—all ready for the adventure that never came. He had dropped suddenly, face downward.

Who was he? A farm boy from Nebraska? One of the drugstore gang from a small town? A big city lad who used to dress up in his plaid coat and lavender shirt? Who at home was waiting anxiously for his letters, wondering what he was doing at that moment? What hopes and lives were tied up in him? What had been his thoughts, his dreams, his ambitions? What had he planned on doing "after the war?"

How he must have wanted to live. How stupid, how senseless that he had to die.

She felt suddenly a guilty sense of well being. Why should one person live and another die? No, now that was foolish, neurotic. Make the best of one's own life—that was the big obligation. She must go on downtown and do her shopping; stop in at the bank and buy a bond with that birthday money John had given her.

She thought with satisfaction as she made out her bond application how close she was to the $500 mark. That is, it would be $500 when she opened the safe deposit box along about 1954. A little nest egg like that might come in handy then. A trip perhaps, or girls might be having weddings. Anyway, bonds were a good investment. Nothing safer, the banker had said. "When United States bonds aren't any good, nothing is any good" those were his words.

And, as John said, where else could you put your money? Where could you get 2.9 percent and be absolutely safe. Besides, if you got in a pinch you could always cash them in—after 60 days.

She had a lot of things to do. She'd look for a print dress—a good print, restrained and smart. Subtle, with soft colors that would really do something for her. She needed it for those little "don't dress" occasions that were always coming along. She simply couldn't face the girls again in her old things. Then she really ought to pick up a new summer hat that would give her a lift. And maybe a summer handbag.

She happily visioned herself a new woman, smart and attractive, sailing into the next gathering. Eyes of friends and enemies alike lighted as they looked at her. Important persons included her in their bevies. Strangers gazed with approving curiosity.

She walked along in a glow, looking in the shop windows. And then suddenly she saw again the still bodies sprawled on the beachheads. Why did she have to remember that? Why did the papers print such things? Besides, what could she do about it? She was giving all she could; hadn't she bought a bond? Hadn't she bought what would be $500 worth of bonds? Wasn't that being patriotic—even though it was a good investment?

She walked on absently, still seeing a mine-scarred coast strewn with lifeless youth. "A good investment." Ye-es; in all fairness, that was just what her bonds had been. That and nothing else. She might as well be honest. She had never given anything in her bond buying. Why—why she had never yet bought a real bond—a bond paid for with sacrifice. She turned abruptly and headed back toward the bank.

Let's Give the Super-Fortress a Real Name

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the Indianapolis Star has come forward with a suggestion which I think is worthy of the consideration of the highest authorities of our Government.

The Star proposes that the great superfortress which is striking terror to the hearts of the Nipponese shall be given a name more worthy of the dignity of its performance than B–29.

The Star has printed an editorial on this subject which I think will have the approval of the American people 1,000 percent.

It is as follows:

NEW FORTS NEED OWN NAME

The superfortresses have just begun to make history. They deserve more than a carry-over from a previous model for a name. They may have much the same lines as the famed fortresses that turned the tide of air war over Europe. But they are new and distinct unto themselves.

The old forts measure 103 feet 10 inches between wing tips and 74 feet 9 inches from nose to tail tip.

The supers are 141 feet 2 inches between wing tips and 98 feet from nose to tail tip. Huge avengers.

The superfortresses will range the globe under a command all their own. They should carry a name of their own as well—such as the American Eagle or Tornado.

Data Revealed by Dies Committee Shows Effort of Communist-Controlled C. I. O. Political Action Committee to Extend Activities Into Rural Areas Through Use of Government Employees—White House Tie-Up Also Indicated

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, un-American activities in this country are in the news again. This week evidence revealed by the Dies committee of this House has revealed that, flush from its victories in Alabama, California, Texas, and elsewhere, the Communist conceived and dominated C. I. O. Political Action Committee has reached its tenacles out into the rural areas and is trying to utilize intimidated and coerced Government employees to organize and deliver the farm vote to friends of the fourth-term candidate. A Federal statute known as the Hatch Act makes political activities on the part of Federal employees a direct violation of law, but in apparent gay disregard of the law of the land the campaign to gather in the votes by all means fair or foul seems to be well under way.

Many papers have carried accounts of the amazing revelation that the long distance telephone records of C. B. Baldwin, top drawer official of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee and former Farm Security Director, show a constant stream of telephone calls between his office and the White House and between his office and the telephones of present Farm Security Administration officials in the several States. The records further show that during primary campaigns in which the C. I. O. Political Action Committee was endeavoring to purge anti-New Deal Democrats the wires were kept especially hot between both the political wigwam of the C. I. O., the White House and the Federal employees who were the former subordinates of Mr. Baldwin and upon whom their erstwhile chief apparently now relies to deliever the votes his organization is seeking in the rural areas.

Members of Congress should not fail to read these disclosures as put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Representative J. PARNELL THOMAS, of New Jersey. They appear on page A3250 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Lest it be erroneously concluded that only Republicans are disturbed by the powerful and potent purge being conducted by this Baldwin-White House-Federal employees axis, Members of Congress and others interested should also look on page A3179 of the Appendix of the RECORD and read the remarks of Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN, a Democrat from Massachusetts. It should be said to the credit of Congress that Members of both major parties are greatly disturbed by the fact that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee has apparently received a green light to go ahead and purge candidates not approved by the White House palace brigade and by the further fact that Mr. Baldwin's long distance telephone records indicate that influence is being used upon public officials of executive department farm agencies in order to enlist their support in the political program of the C. I. O. labor union and its Communist hand maidens.

Westbrook Pegler, famous American newspaperman whose disclosures have so frequently won him the plaudits of patriotic citizens on previous occasions, has recently devoted two entire articles to this phenomenal new development in American political affairs. Under leave granted me by the House, I am including these two articles at this point as a part of these remarks.

Article by Westbrook Pegler under date of June 20, 1944:

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, June 20.—Long distance telephone records subpenaed by the Dies committee have revealed a close relationship between the political action committee of the C. I. O. and the following:

The White House and Mrs. Roosevelt;
Vice President HENRY WALLACE;
The Department of Agriculture;
The Department of Justice; and Various regional directors of the Farm Security Administration having power to exert strong political and economic pressure on farmers.

Numerous calls to regional F. S. A. offices were made in most cases by C. B. Baldwin, assistant director of the Political Action Committee, who resigned his job as Chairman of the F. S. A. in Washington to become actual manager of the P. A. C.'s campaign to elect President Roosevelt for a fourth term and Mr. WALLACE for a second term and to defeat a select list of aspirants for the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Sidney Hillman, P. A. C. chairman, is president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, C. I. O., and recently has been denounced by David Dubinsky and other right-wing union radicals, as leader of the Communist Party in New York, now known as the American Labor Party.

Baldwin has held various key jobs in Washington ever since 1933, when he caught on as Assistant Secretary of Agriculture under WALLACE. He became Director of the Farm Security Administration in October 1940. The phone calls indicate a strong continuing interest and influence in the F. S. A., while he is on leave serving with the political leader of the New York Communist faction of the union movement.

The slips showed 28 calls from the New York headquarters of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee direct to the White House, including one from Hillman to Mrs. Roosevelt and another from Hillman to David Niles, formerly Nyhus, of Boston, one of the President's selfless assistants with a passion for anonymity and for left-wing politics. Hillman also called Vice President WALLACE. Baldwin is recorded as having made three calls to WALLACE'S office.

The Hillman-Baldwin-Communist group of the C. I. O. has defeated for renomination both MARTIN DIES, of Texas, and JOE STARNES, of Alabama. STARNES is a member of the Dies committee.

Records show, according to the Dies committee, "hundreds" of calls from the P. A. C.'s New York headquarters to various Government officials, particularly in the Department of Justice and in the Department of Agriculture, which controls the Farm Security Administration and the fortunes of many farmers through its local agents scattered everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, the integrity of American elections is the keystone of freedom in this country. It was for this purpose that Democrats and Republicans joined together a few years ago to pass the so-called Hatch Clean Politics Act. However, no Federal statute can enforce itself. What is needed is a high-minded and right-minded Attorney General and Chief Executive who will enforce the law regardless of whether it is applied against the activities of political freinds or foes.

In the second of his two articles, Mr. Pegler implies that Mr. Baldwin has simply been loaned to the C. I. O. for the duration of the political campaign because of his previous position as chief of the vast army of personnel with whom he is now in such constant touch by long-distance telephone as he performs in his new capacity as political generalissimo of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Here, surely, is a form of lend-lease which must prove revolting to all freedom-loving Americans.

Let me now call your attention to Mr. Pegler's second article on this highly significant situation.

Article by Westbrook Pegler under date of June 21, 1944.

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, June 21.—Yesterday I reported that the Dies committee had subpenaed long-distance slips of the telephone company which showed that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee had been carrying on conversations with Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and two of the President's anonymous political secretaries at the White House, with Vice President HENRY WALLACE and his secretaries, with Attorney General Biddle, and with Farm Security Administration regional directors. These telephone slips showed further that C. B. Baldwin, a New Deal farm bureaucrat from the beginning of the administration in 1933, and now political-action committee assistant director, had telephoned several of his old subordinates in the F. S. A. in regions where the P. A. C. was opposing the renomination of Congressmen and Senators whom it had marked for defeat. Until recently Baldwin was F. S. A. chief.

The factual report was long and left no room for interpretation. Today we may study the meaning.

Chairman of the P. A. C. is Sidney Hillman, president of the C. I. O. Amalgamated Clothing Workers. Hillman came to the United States in 1907 as a Russian refugee from the Czars, and if he ever worked at all at any laborious trade, his experience was brief, for he acquired the sedentary, political job of union president in 1914 and has held it since. He had preoccupations which made it inconvenient for him to take part in World War No. 1. In May 1940 President Roosevelt appointed him to be the "labor" member of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense. Later he was appointed to a position in the Office of Production Management.

A few months ago Hillman allied himself openly with the Communists of the C. I. O. in New York in a fight for control of the synthetic, left-wing political organizations known as the American Labor Party. The right-wingers fought him, but Hillman and the Communists won. The A. L. P. thereupon became the successor to the Communist Party, which announced its own dissolution. Meanwhile, Hillman, proceeding with the organization of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, had proposed that in New York State all workers be compelled to join unions and pay a political income tax to the committee for use in the fourth-term campaign.

In his years in the Farm Security Administration, Baldwin built an organization within the Government which reaches into every farm county. It is organized and equipped for political espionage propaganda and coercion. Its regional directors were Baldwin's subordinates and would be his subordinates again should Mr. Roosevelt be reelected and should Baldwin care to resume the job from which he has technically resigned. Practically, he is merely on leave and on loan to the C. I. O. for the duration of the campaign.

The long-distance calls discovered by the Dies committee were not personal calls. They were official calls made from the headquarters of the P. A. C. and charged to the committee. Hillman, Baldwin, and others made 28 such calls to the White House alone, and many other calls to F. S. A. regional offices. Yet the Roosevelt party and the P. A. C. would maintain that there is no connection between the White House, or the F. S. A., and the committee. The C. I. O., for its own part, insists that the P. A. C. is a gratuitous and independent organization, unconnected with the Roosevelt party.

Mr. Biddle, one of those who was called by long distance from the P. A. C.'s headquarters, has given an opinion that its "educational activities" are legitimate and contrary to no law, although thus far it has raised $700,000 for the fourth-term campaign, has access to millions more, and is campaigning for him and his chief throughout the country.

The seizure of the telephone records was a high-handed operation. In total effect, the information thus obtained, however questionable the method, plainly shows that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, heavily infested with Communists, is an auxiliary of the Roosevelt fourth-term party on terms of intimate consultation with Mrs. Roosevelt, David K. Niles born Nyhus, and Jonathan Daniels, the President's confidential political agents in the White House, with Vice President WALLACE and with the Departments of Justice and Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, members of labor unions and labor unions themselves have a right to endorse political candidates and to support or oppose candidates of their own choosing. If they wish to function as political parties, that is a matter for them to decide. Be it said to the credit of the American Federation of Labor, however, that, like the Railroad Brotherhoods and other substantial labor unions, it has consistently refused to become the cat's-paw or the spearhead for any political potentate or party. The American Federation of Labor is in nowise involved in the nefarious activities of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. It is only this committee, operating through such C. I. O. local unions as it is able to dominate, which applies a check-off from the worker's pay check, compelling him, frequently against his personal choice and convictions, to help finance candidates selected and approved by a small group of king makers who hope to secure dividends in legislation and in governmental favors for their political activities.

When the C. I. O. Political Action Committee uses its vast campaign war chest, however, to contact and coerce Federal employees on political matters, that is a matter of vital concern to every American as such political activities are in direct violation of Federal law and their unrestricted performance tends to destroy the very basis of Government by free elections.

Candidates endorsed by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee should be called upon to show their colors and either disavow their endorsement or admit in public that they are in league with a movement which, if successful in gaining control of the next Congress, may well have some fateful consequences for the future of this Republic.

Letter of Weber Show Case & Fixture Co., Inc.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WEBER SHOWCASE & FIXTURE CO., INC.,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1944.

Hon. HARRY R. SHEPPARD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

My Dear Congressman SHEPPARD: After reading the Hon. FOREST A. HARNESS' speech which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 20, 1944, I am demanding that certain statements made by the gentleman from Indiana be corrected.

With reference to Congressman HARNESS' statement "that the Globe organization has willingly cooperated in making its design and engineering facilities and its production methods available to the Maritime Commission and to private companies desiring to enter the field of all-steel life-raft production"—nothing could be further from the truth.

It was a generally recognized fact that because of our excellent equipment and personnel we were the logical company to manufacture life rafts on the west coast.

We repeatedly asked the Globe American Co. for prices on their stampings, the thought being that, in the interest of the war effort, it would alleviate the necessity of making a duplicate die for the stamping of the steel corrugates. However, it was not until we had received an actual order from the Maritime Commission that the Globe American Co. expressed a willingness to quote these prices. They then insisted that we send a man to their plant at Kokomo, Ind., before they would give us this quotation. We proceeded to do this at our own expense, and at no expense to the Globe American Co. When our engineer looked over the facilities at the Globe American plant, together with a sample life raft which they were testing, he came to the conclusion that because the Globe American Co. was many months behind in their delivery schedules and, in his opinion, would still not be on production for several months, that they were in no position to furnish the side corrugates for a raft. It was also our engineer's opinion that the way they were attempting to build a life raft was impractical, which has been proven by the fact that, after they were on production for some time, they stopped production and proceeded to revise their methods of welding to conform with our methods.

The statement made by the Honorable Mr. HARNESS that some $300,000 of the people's money went into the Weber buildings and machinery is completely erroneous. The only Government money invested in Weber's life-raft program was in connection with a rust-proofing process, which is a Coast Guard requirement, and the money involved was less than $120,000. The $300,000 referred to was money expended by the Weber Showcase & Fixture Co., Inc., of its own funds.

I would also like to call attention to the statement made by the Honorable Mr. HARNESS that its engineers visited the Globe plant to study and copy production methods worked out at no small private expense by the Globe organization—is erroneous—as Weber's production methods are entirely different, and the purpose and outcome of our engineer's visit to Globe's plant was as outlined previously.

In referring to the prices which the Honorable Mr. LARNESS refers to, namely, a unit price of $1,449, one must take into consideration the quantities of the rafts involved; also, the added freight costs to the west coast. If we had been given a contract of the same magnitude as Globe American's, these prices naturally would have been substantially reduced as is evidenced by recent quotations we have made to the United State Maritime Commission for life rafts, which will be made available by us on request of the proper parties. Could it be possible in order to establish themselves in this field, the Globe American Co. took this contract below cost. This could be easily verified by whether or not they increased their unit price on the recent inquiry sent out by the Maritime Commission for 7,500 rafts which, from a successful and efficient manufacturer's standpoint, should have been lower than the original quotation because of the quantities involved and the fact that their inexperience and initial cost should have been overcome.

The inference made by the Honorable Mr. HARNESS that there could be collusion between the Peterson Manufacturing Co. of Portland, Oreg., and the Weber Showcase & Fixture Co., Inc., because their prices were identical on an inquiry for a small number of rafts, is purely coincidental.

For the Honorable Mr. HARNESS' information the Weber Showcase & Fixture Co., Inc., was the first in their industry to receive the Army and Navy E award for excellent production and is one of the few firms in the United States to have three stars on their pennant. Every product, including the liferaft which they are now building, has been outstanding in its field, and our company never at any time has had to stoop to collusion or any other unethical business practice in connection with any contract.

Our firm has enjoyed an enviable reputation for nearly 50 years prior to the war and has made an outstanding contribution to the war effort in war production, and we, therefore, feel that these facts should be brought to your attention so that they can be presented to the proper parties, as well as establishing them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Very truly yours,

WEBER SHOWCASE & FIXTURE CO., INC.,
PERCY C. HOUSE, Vice President.

Report From the Second District of California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, the Second Congressional District of California is one of the largest districts in point of area in the United States. It covers approximately one-third of the total area of the State of California. It is over 600 miles long, air line, extending from Death Valley in southern California to the Oregon boundary line along the mountains of eastern California. It is a district of small communities and small business; its principal industries are mining, lumber, livestock, and agriculture.

The people of the Second District work in those industries and in its small cities and towns. They are the sturdy independent American type which has contributed so much to the advancement of our country. They are also friendly and generous and like to feel they have a personal friend in their representative in Washington. They have not hesitated to write me about their troubles during these hectic times. In the 10 months I have been their Representative I have worked toward the solution of their problems and a brief summary of some of them will, I believe, provide an interesting index to the thinking, work, and struggle of the people of one of the greatest and undoubtedly the most picturesque part of California.

THE EFFECT OF CLOSING THE GOLD MINES

California has always been famous as the land of gold. Most of that gold was discovered and produced in the second district. My distinguished predecessor, the late Harry L. Englebright, lived in Nevada City, which was the very heart of the gold industry of California. But when war came it was decided that gold production was nonessential, and the gold mines were closed down. I have always doubted the wisdom of that order. It salvaged a little manpower and machinery for the war effort and brought irreparable damage to the gold mines.

GOLD-MINE CLOSING ORDER LIBERALIZED

The impact of the closing order on the cities and towns built around the gold-mining industry can well be imagined. But they have continued to exist, somehow, and have not complained too much—they are willing to make any sacrifice necessary to the winning of the war. I have introduced a bill calling for the repeal of the order closing the gold mines, and although Congress has taken no action on that bill, my people are looking forward to the opening of the mines at the earliest possible date. The Mining Division of the W. P. B., under constant pressure from California Congressmen, like myself, has liberalized the gold-closing order to permit some of the mines to operate on a maintenance basis in order to keep them unwatered and their shafts in repair. Some mines are already a total loss. The cost of unwatering and retimbering will not be justified.

FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY TO GOLD MINING INDUSTRY

Some of the operators of the gold mines may need Government assistance in reopening their mines in the form of loans—we think they are entitled to such help. No industry has been so completely stopped in this war. An automobile factory can make tanks; a sewing machine company, machine guns—but when the gold mines were closed they deteriorated. The Government should help that industry—a casualty of war—get back on its feet. I have introduced a bill authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to gold-mine operators as soon as the order closing the gold mines is withdrawn, and authorizing the R. F. C. to accept applications now so that these applications can be processed and ready for immediate action at that time.

STRATEGIC MINING BLOWS HOT AND COLD

Some of the gold miners turned to other types of mining of which we have an abundance—chrome, copper, manganese, tungsten, and others. These minerals were greatly needed in the early stages of the war. Our Government encouraged production and offered premiums for it. Our Government encouraged mining men to spend large sums in developing properties. Recently cut-backs have been ordered in many lines of these ores. In some instances this has left our mine operators holding the proverbial bag. Legislation must be enacted to bail out the war-induced—or rather I should say the Government-induced—investment of those operators who have not been permitted to produce sufficiently to liquidate their investments with a fair profit. Legislation of that type is pending now before this Congress and I hope will receive speedy and favorable consideration.

STOCK-PILING OF STRATEGIC MINERALS

As a further point in connection with the production of these strategic ores which we found ourselves so short of at the beginning of this war; a sound national policy is to encourage the continuance of domestic production of these ores. It is a matter of national safety. If the market will not carry the production then these ores should be stockpiled as a national asset for future emergency by our Government. The Government can lose no money in these indestructible stock piles of strategic ores; they will be a sound insurance policy for a future national emergency, and they will help to continue a domestic industry into the post-war period when every effort must be made to provide employment and maintain our national income at a high figure.

MINES AND MINING COMMITTEE STREAMLINED FOR ACTION

The Mines and Mining Committee of the House is preparing to handle the many and difficult problems facing the mining industry. Recently the committee was broken up into permanent subcommittees in order to facilitate the work on separate and distinct fields of mining. Those subcommittees are: (1) coal, (2) precious minerals and metals, (3) phosphate, potash, and other nonmetallics, (4) nonferrous minerals and metals. I have been made chairman of the Subcommittee on Precious Minerals and Metals; the people of my district appreciate that honor as a recognition of the importance of the district as a major gold-producing area. I have also been made a member of the subcommittee, headed by Congressman MURDOCK, of Arizona, on nonferrous minerals and metals. We are looking forward to a period of very great activity of these subcommittees in meeting the problems of the domestic miner.

PROBLEMS OF THE LIVESTOCK INDUSTRY

The Second Congressional District is the largest grazing area in California.

From reports I have received, our stockmen have done fairly well financially—a deserved reward for a production beyond all previous records. They have had difficulty with their marketing. Both Loren Bamert, president, and Dan McKinney, secretary, of the California Cattlemen's Association, have made trips to Washington in connection with the rationing program. The recent reduction of points on some cuts of meat has helped some. The difficulty has been with the medium grades of beef. Feed conditions have made it difficult to bring animals to a good finish. There has been a backlog of medium grade animals which threatened to be disastrous in view of feed conditions. Some stockmen have unloaded at a sacrifice. Keeping the channels of trade open and flowing freely will be a continuing problem and one which those interested in livestock will continuously have to watch.

GRAZING IN THE NATIONAL PARKS

In connection with the feed shortage we tried to get the National Park Service to open the parks to grazing of livestock. An order was made allowing such grazing for purebred breeding stock, provided the application was approved by the Secretary of the Interior. This order was meaningless to my people because they have range cattle, and would not risk their purebred breeding stock to the hazards of a mountain range in any event. I tried in vain to get the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the National Park Service to modify this order to permit range cattle in the parks under conditions which would provide the livestock men some real help.

This week I introduced a bill to open the parks to grazing for the duration of the war and 6 months thereafter, and to require the Secretary of the Interior to issue permits for such grazing. We believe that such grazing can be permitted without permanent harm to the parks, and that it is more important to produce food for our people, our allies, and our soldiers than it is to save the grass at this time in the parks.

SHEEPMEN FACE DANGEROUS STOCK PILE

For the sheepmen, the most serious problem is the wool stock piles in this country, consisting of some one and one-half billion pounds of wool. This wool stock pile was started when the submarine menace caused a fear that imports might become difficult, and we could not risk a shortage. Since the submarine menace has abated we find our domestic producers faced with a stock pile which would break them if the war ended and the stock-piled wool was dumped on the market. Our proposed solution has been to end the imports, force the stock-piled wool into the market as fast as possible, and use as much of it as possible in the United Nations Relief Administration. The other day we wrote a provision into the U. N. R. R. A. appropriation bill requiring the use of wool stock piled in this country. This is a good provision, and we hope will remain in the bill. It seems foolish even to think of the U. N. R. R. A., a Government agency, going out and buying wool—particularly cheap foreign wool—when our Government has wool which it has bought and paid for in a stock pile which may break the American producer unless it is disposed of.

CONGRESSIONAL LIVESTOCK COMMITTEE

A development of interest to the livestock industry generally is the fact that the fight for the domestic wool producer brought together a committee of Congressmen from the 17 Western States which are primarily interested in livestock. This committee is headed by Congressman FRANK BARRETT, of Wyoming. I am the member from California. The committee is continuing to work for a solution of the domestic wool stock pile.

PREDATORY ANIMALS

Predatory animals have always been a headache to the livestock operator. There has not been the proper coordination between the various agencies—Federal, State, and county—trying to control the predatory animals. Next on the agenda of the livestock committee of the 17 Western States is a program to set up an over-all plan for predatory animal control in those States. Since the war the problem of predators has become worse and is taking a terrific toll on the livestock production of this country. Trained trappers and hunters are hard to get and generally are underpaid. We think the situation is deserving of Federal attention on a regional basis.

MEASURES VITAL TO LUMBER INDUSTRY PASSED

The timber resources of the Second District are huge—enough to furnish the entire demands of the United States for 7 years under ordinary peacetime consumption. Legislation of vital importance to the timber industry has recently passed the Congress. One is a measure providing for a sustained-yield program; thus, the communities depending on timber operations can plan for a stable future. Second, a measure providing for a survey of our national timber resources; this will enable us to plan our use of timber in order not to deplete this valuable resource. Third, a measure to increase the Federal contribution for fire protection from two and one-half million to nine million; every tree burned is an economic loss to the community where the fire occurred, and we cannot afford those losses.

RESEARCH IN FORESTRY

Of special interest to my district were the appropriations to continue the work of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine and the Institute of Forest Genetics at Placerville. The Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine has done some very fine work on insect control with stations located at Hat Creek, near Burney, and at Blacks Mountain, near Susanville, in my district. The Institute of Forest Genetics at Placerville is one of the only two experimental stations of its kind in the country and is engaged in experiments in tree breeding which may prove of vast value to the timber industry.

LUMBERMEN'S MANPOWER PROBLEM

Lumber is a number one critical material in the war production. Manpower has been the lumber operator's biggest headache. It is hard to reconcile the place lumber has as a critical material with the fact that it has been hard to defer superessential men in the industry.

I have been told by some lumber operators that the loss of as much as 1 or 2 men in a vital spot on their production line can shut down an entire shift. Sometimes these men are under 26. Recognizing the necessity of having young men in the armed forces it would nevertheless seem sound to defer the superessentials such as I have referred to. We are continuing at this time to try to convince Selective Service and War Manpower Commission of the wisdom of this course.

DEMAND FOR FARM MACHINERY

In the field of agriculture the chief calls on my office have been for farm machinery. The greatest demand has been for tractors, trucks, and side delivery rakes. Production of these items has been notably short and should be increased at the earliest possible time. A new directive by W. P. B. revokes quota restrictions for anyone who can make farm machinery equipment or repair parts in a small plant from surplus materials or other materials and parts which can be obtained with a AA-4 rating. This is a step in the right direction.

AMMUNITION FOR FARMERS

The farmers have been asking for ammunition to protect their crops. This is more important than the average person would suppose. The farmer uses his gun more than the city dweller thinks—in keeping the birds out of his almond and cherry orchards and other crops, and in shooting coyotes and other predators which, unmolested, take a terrific toll on his animals. Western Congressmen have particularly worked hard on this problem and the ammunition of the more generally used rifle and shotgun calibers has started to roll. Unless the war develops a need beyond expectation for small arms ammunition, it is reasonable to suppose that this problem will be met.

PRICE CEILINGS ON FARM PRODUCTS

The milk producers of my district have had a particularly bad time with O. P. A. At one time I had four different complaints pending in regard to the price ceiling on milk. One of them, Siskiyou County, is still unsettled. Slowness in getting farm production programs set up has been the cause of a great deal of criticism. Farmers have had to plant before they knew whether they were going to get a price they could work under. Some of them just did not plant, and in some instances those who did got caught under an unfavorable price ceiling, lost money, or barely broke even. Meanwhile the farmer producing the nonessential crops made a barrel of money. The recent amendment to the Price Control Act requiring ceilings to be set at least 15 days before planting time will, we hope, eliminate some of this difficulty and hard feeling.

TOO MUCH SPREAD BETWEEN FARM AND RETAIL PRICES

The farmers feel—and I think they are right—that there is too great a spread between what the producer gets and the retail price. The false impression gets abroad that the farmer is getting a larger percentage of this price than he really is. The spread must be adjusted and the public fully informed as to what the producer is actually getting. I saw cherries here in Washington selling for $1 a pound; little apricots, three for 10 cents, and other comparable prices on other fruits. The farmer does not get that kind of a price, or anywhere near it, and the public should be so informed.

KLAMATH WEED CONTROL

The Agriculture appropriation bill which recently passed the House had a little item of $10,000 of great importance to my district. Portions of it are infested with what is commonly known as Klamath weed—a weed which can ruin vast areas of productive land. In Australia they have a bug which eats Klamath weed, will eat nothing else, and when the weed is all gone will starve to death. The $10,000 is to bring some of those bugs to this country to see if they will thrive here and eliminate our Klamath weed. If the experiment works, it will save thousands upon thousands of dollars and thousands of acres of good land in California.

FEDERAL OWNERSHIP THREATENS EXISTENCE OF COUNTY GOVERNMENT

The most serious single problem faced by county governments in my district is the ever-increasing ownership of lands by the Federal Government. Ten of the eighteen counties I represent are over 50 percent owned by the Federal Government. I will not give figures for all the counties, but as an illustration, Alpine County, 90.67 percent; federally owned; Inyo County, 86.37 percent; Trinity County, 75.53 percent; and Tuolumne 72.53 percent. This does not count State-owned property in these counties or in the case of Inyo large areas held by the city of Los Angeles. Much of this is land held by the Forest Service and in the national parks. Needless to say, these counties cannot long exist if this continues. The tax bases of these counties are already seriously affected.

POSITION ON FEDERAL LANDS STATED

We take the position that these county governments are entitled to a payment in lieu of the taxes of which they are deprived. These county governments render service to the areas in Federal ownership for which they receive no tax support. In addition, if the western counties are to be the storehouse of the national resources and recreational areas for the benefit of the whole Nation, the whole Nation should be willing to contribute to the cost of local Government in those areas.

The problem is twofold: We must pass a law providing for tax equivalent payments, and we must stop further inroads of Federal ownership. The Public Lands Committee of the House, of which I am a member, is working on both these problems.

POST-WAR PLANNING

Notwithstanding the preoccupation of the people of the Second Congressional District of California with all of the foregoing problems which deal largely with the war effort and problems arising out of wartime regulation, they are looking forward to and planning for the peace. Communities are thinking and right down to the hard work of planning how much employment they can give to the returning servicemen in their own cities and towns and in local industry. I have been amazed at the detail and effort made in this direction and it is a true indication of the feeling of the people of their responsibility in making our democracy function in peace as well as in war.

ROADS AND AIRFIELDS VITAL

We have been doing some post-war planning here. My people are interested in the post-war plans for roads and airports. For the most part we live in a vast and mountainous area. We want better, swifter, and cheaper ways in and out of that area for our own people, the people who visit our great recreational places in peacetime, and for the products of our timber, mining, livestock, and agricultural operations. Better roads and more airports will give us better, swifter, and cheaper ways in and out; that is the key to our economic development.

The Roads Committee, of which I am a member, recently reported out the post-war road bill which we hope will be be passed. A national airport survey has been authorized in this House. I hope they will both be pressed swiftly and successfully through the Congress.

CONCLUSION

I have briefly mentioned over 20 separate items affecting the second congressional district. Necessarily this discussion of each item has been meager, nor have I mentioned a great many other matters which could properly be discussed. It is only a partial inventory of our problems, and I am sure has many points in common with a great many areas throughout this country. I invite the attention and interest of my colleagues in the House to the end that we may better understand our respective problems, that we may find a community of interest where we face the same conditions, and that we may more completely join together in the one objective we all must have of making the home front function smoothly and without friction in support of our fighting fellow Americans who are winning at such a price on the war fronts throughout the world.

National Tax Equality Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I inserted in the RECORD on June 3, 1944, the text of a letter written by myself to Mr. Ben C. McCabe, the president of the National Tax Equality Association, regarding the activities of that association in attacking farm cooperatives.

I now insert a copy of Mr. McCabe's reply to that letter, together with my answer to his letter to me:

NATIONAL TAX EQUALITY ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., June 6, 1944.

Hon. JERRY VOORHIS,
Representative from California,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN VOORHIS: In replying to your letter of May 29, let me first of all set down the basic philosophy of the National Tax Equality Association, in an effort to dispel from your mind at once any idea that we have an ulterior purpose or that we are trying to destroy cooperative organizations.

The National Tax Equality Association has a number of broad general objectives. It believes in the profit system under which this country has developed the highest living standards in the world. Its function is to bring to public and governmental attention, through research and the dissemination of information, the need for the elimination of all types of tax discrimination, and of other kinds of preferential treatment by Government that threaten the future of the profit system or result in unfair disparities among taxpayers or groups of taxpayers.

We believe that all forms of privately or publicly-owned businesses in any competitive field should be taxed on an equal basis. We believe that there should be no discrimination in the extension of governmental credit facilities for private and cooperative businesses, and that Government-owned businesses should be denied the use of free public funds and other privileges which give to them unfair advantages over businesses with which they compete.

In short, we believe that there should be equality of governmental treatment in all respects of private, cooperative, and governmental businesses.

The National Tax Equality Association recognizes fully the right of cooperative businesses to exist and to prosper as a part of free enterprise wherever and to whatever extent they prove their ability in doing business. Our only quarrel, insofar as cooperatives are concerned, is with preferential treatment accorded to them by Government in respect to taxation, credit facilities, and certain other factors having a direct bearing on competitive positions.

That such advantages do now exist is well recognized by many leaders of cooperation One quotation, from a statement made by Mr. A. G. Black, until recently Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, will suffice to prove that point: "Farmer cooperatives, as such, have been given by the people through their Congress, some very important advantages—advantages not accorded to privately or corporately owned business. If no changes are made in laws relating to these advantages, they are going to bulk larger and larger. For example, tax exemption under certain conditions, if there is no change, will result in a tremendous advantage to the cooperative form of organization. As taxes on private and corporate business increase, that advantage to cooperation becomes greater. Under conditions of low taxes, of course, it is of some advantage, but when taxes are absorbing a large part of the earnings of private business, the cooperative form of business really provides an enormous advantage."

You have called attention in your letter to various other problems of taxation which you believe are more important for our scrutiny than the exemption of the producer cooperatives from Federal income and excess-profits taxation. Our own list, for the eventual study of our research department, is far longer than yours. It includes not only the subjects that you have mentioned, but also such matters as the tax exemption of Government-owned businesses, whose competition with banks, utilities, fertilizer manufacturers, and many other private enterprises is therefore placed on a wholly unequal and inequitable basis; the tax exemption of Government-purchased land, about which your own State of California is now trying to do something because whole counties have been driven to the door of poverty; the tax exemption of income-paying property owned by labor unions and other nonprofit organizations; social security taxes for revenue and not for security; inheritance taxes whose sole purpose is to consume wealth which would otherwise be employed in the building and development of new industry; punitive taxes of various sorts; sales taxes; and many others including a long list of inequities that are to be found in the laws of the various States.

Obviously, an association of limited resources cannot undertake to study all of these problems in the space of a few months, though I assure you that we shall get to them as quickly as possible. Obviously, too, the great majority of these problems must be classed as inequities and not as inequalities. The percentage depletion allowances which you say result in a tax subsidy of half a billion a year may be inequitable, but they are available to all the natural resource industries, regardless of form of organization—to the petroleum cooperative, for instance, as well as to the petroleum corporation.

The same is true of the tax-exempt securities, of the relief section of the excess-profits-tax laws, of the inequities inherent in inheritance taxes, personal-income taxes, social-security taxes, etc. Many of them must be considered as damaging to our total tax structure, but they are not offering advantages to some one form of business to the detriment and actual danger of a direct competitor.

On the other hand, however, the exemption from high Federal income and excess-profits taxes which is enjoyed by the cooperatives and the Government-owned businesses is an actual inequality in taxation because these businesses are in direct competition with independent, private enterprises which must pay what the Government demands or suffer dire consequences. Therefore, under the policy of protecting the American system which I have already stated to you, we have first undertaken the study of these definite and true inequalities.

It is, as I have said, the chief purpose of the National Tax Equality Association to equalize taxes among competitors.

Recently, some of the cooperative leaders have approached us with the suggestion that they would be happy to join with our association in a national movement looking to the substantial reduction of corporate taxes and the elimination of the double taxation on corporate income that now exists. Or, they have said, they would be willing to work with us for the imposition of a national sales tax to raise the necessary revenue to support the inevitable post-war national Budget of twenty to twenty-five billions a year.

In theory, such an elimination of the corporate income and excess profits taxes would bring about equality as between cooperatives and private enterprise, and if private business groups were given their choice they would choose this method. But we must be realistic. The present Federal income and excess-profits taxes on corporations are expected to yield in 1944 approximately $15,000,000,000—36 percent of the total estimated $42,000,000,000 revenue of the Federal Government for this wartime year.

When the war ends and the Federal Budget is balanced—as it must be if we are to escape ruin—the Government must for a considerable number of years levy the maximum taxes that the Nation's economy can support. The mass demand will be for a reduction in individual income taxes, and it would be political suicide for any administration to attempt to shift the 36 percent share now paid by corporations to individuals. As a practical matter, no substantial reduction in corporation income tax rates, except perhaps some reduction in excess profits rates may be expected for at least a generation following the war.

As for a Federal retail sales tax to supplement the tax on corporations, which some of our cooperative friends have suggested, the rate, to raise $15,000,000,000, would have to be 23.9 percent if the tax were levied on all retail sales of tangible commodities, with no exemptions; 32.9 percent if food sales were exempted, and 16.9 percent if the tax were levied on all consumer expenditures, including rents, services, etc. As a practical man, you can easily see how utterly impracticable such a procedure would be.

We have given these facts to the cooperative leaders who made the suggestion, and we have invited them to join with us by first accepting full equality of taxation, and by then making common cause among all businesses to seek such reduction in taxes as may be possible and as rapidly as possible.

Whether they will do or not remains for later determination. As you well know, the cooperative point of view is that their profits are in some way different from the profits of private enterprise, even though they are made by identical processes of buying and selling goods and services.

It is, however, our contention, supported by economic and legal opinion, that the earnings of a business, whatever its make-up, constitute profits which go to the owners of the business, and that the existence of profits is not dependent upon whether the owners are a corporation's investors or a cooperative's patrons.

Under this interpretation, if any business profits are to be taxed, then all business profits should be taxed, including those of the cooperatives and of the Government-owned businesses.

I have gone into this lengthy explanation because I want you to understand and to agree that the National Tax Equality Association has no animus toward the cooperative form of business and that such a statement as the one recently made by a cooperative leader—that the National Tax Equality Association is trying to strangle the cooperatives "by fixing it so they wouldn't have enough money for expansion"—is ridiculous on the face of it. Private business has survived and expanded in spite of high taxes, and will continue to survive unless unequal competition forces it to the wall. The cooperatives, under able management, can certainly do as well.

That the cooperatives will one day have to pay their share of taxes is admitted by some leaders. I commend to your consideration a paragraph from the book Cooperative Plenty, by the Reverend J. Elliot Ross, which is on the list of publications approved by the Cooperative League:

"But the present policy of the state in regard to the taxation of cooperatives would make little difference once we had a dominantly cooperative economy. For if cooperatives replaced most of what is today private-profit business, the taxes now paid by the latter would have to be paid by cooperatives or be obtained from some other source. This would hold true unless the Government could reduce its expenses and so needed less revenue from taxes."

If the cooperative leaders accept the fact that they must pay taxes on all their earnings, including patronage refunds, when they take over the Nation's Government and economy, it is entirely inconsistent to refuse to pay taxes in a day when the Nation's life is at stake.

I shall be very glad to hear from you again.

Yours truly,
NATIONAL TAX EQUALITY ASSOCIATION,
BEN C. MCCABE, President.

JUNE 21, 1944.

Mr. BEN C. MCCABE,
President, National Tax Equality Association,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. MCCABE: I am grateful for your kindness in answering my letter of May 29 as you do in your letter of June 6.

I am happy that you deny the charges made that your organization is in fact an anti-cooperative organization and that your principal purpose is to destroy cooperatives. I must admit to opinions and convictions that cooperative enterprise is one of the greatest agencies to further the public interest that our people have developed. And when we realize that all of our great religious organizations, all of our great national educational organizations, all of our farm organizations and all of our labor organizations, and in fact all of our national political organizations have endorsed and approved cooperative enterprise, it would seem that my conviction was not entirely a personal, or a prejudiced conviction. It would be difficult to understand how anyone interested in the public welfare could hesitate to support and further the development of cooperative enterprise.

It seems unfortunate that your organizations should, at this particular time, begin its operations by focusing all of its attack on cooperative enterprise. Naturally, I think that those interested in the public welfare and who were not entirely familiar with your organization would assume that you were intent upon preventing the development of cooperative enterprise and thus in effect were intent upon destroying cooperatives. I say that would seem to be unfortunate for your organization if its real purpose is not to destroy cooperatives. I use the phrase this particular time because I think that every informed person must know that we are in a period of tremendous change in this country and throughout the world. Powerful forces which had attained to great power in the pre-war world are struggling fiercely to retain that power and groups which believe there must be a better way, and an order which would express better the doctrine of the Golden Rule and the Sermon on the Mount are laboring to accomplish their purpose. It is obvious that many organizations are being developed and are apparently designed to federate in a struggle to retain the old order regardless of consequences. Significantly many of these organizations are developed around the issues of taxation. Unfortunately there is quite a common opinion that your sector of the battle line was selected for the purpose of attacking and destroying cooperatives.

Unfortunately, also, much of your literature would seem to be designed to inspire fear on the part of "small businessmen." The small businessmen, in whom we must all be interested, is a victim of economic conditions long established and long prevailing. He is entitled to any help we can give him so that he may understand and know the facts. He should be helped to know that his greatest enemy and the force which has destroyed him is one force and only one force and that force is the force which has created monopoly in this country. He should be helped to know that everyone must concede, that cooperative enterprise is the only natural economic organization which can relieve us of the menace to our national welfare, the monopoly. He should be helped therefore to study and to understand cooperative enterprise and to recognize that he has an ally and a friend in cooperative enterprise and that by associating his welfare with cooperatives, he can have his greatest hope for successful defense against the common enemy of democracy and of the public welfare, monopoly. I think it is fair to say that your organization has not yet made a contribution to the small businessmen and the public welfare in this respect but that on the contrary, through "fear" campaigns it may be doing tremendous injury to small business.

You advise me that your organization "believes in the profit system under which this country has developed the highest standards of living in the world." There are those, of course, who would point to "increasing tenancy and loss of ownership on the part of the masses of our people," to the experiences of 1929 and 1936 when complete economic bankruptcy was on our threshold and when only the power of government and the subsidizing hand of government sustained "business," when bread lines were the rule and not the exception; they would point to a nation then "underfed and underclothed and underhoused" and some of them would even point to this war and insist that it must also be considered to be in part at least a result of an economic system which failed to provide distribution commensurate with its power to produce. And there are many who will insist also that the bountiful blessings of God to our people in the establishment of a democratic form of government in our country, in the gift of tremendous natural resources, in the comparative isolation from the fierce competitive struggles in Europe and the fierce conflict of nationalities imposed immediately upon nationalities, in the gift of isolation from the centuries old and etablished nationalistic hatreds—that these gifts and many more of them were responsible, at least in part, for giving us a "high standard of living."

And I might add that there are very high authorities who will contend, and with facts, that in those countries where cooperatives have been well developed and where there has not been the benefit of the tremendous blessing God has showered on us, a standard of living as high and even higher than we have has resulted. I refer to the studies of Denmark and Sweden for example. I think we might refer to any one of a hundred communities in this country where cooperative enterprise has become very successful and demonstrate how the masses of our people are acquiring "ownership" through cooperative enterprise and how their "standard of living" has been improved vastly because of cooperative enterprise. The inevitable question would be whether other groups of people might not employ cooperation to improve their standard of living above that which they have had theretofore.

Your purpose of developing "information" and "disseminating" it to accomplish "the elimination of all types of tax discrimination" is a fine purpose if it is fulfilled. And it is a tremendous undertaking, which is pursued in the "public interest" should gain for you public commendation. Of course, and obviously, you would begin with study of the worst and most injurious examples of discrimination, which are most injurious to the public interest. That would be a test, I think. In my previous letter, I was raising that precise question and pointing out to you the discriminations which benefit the great owners of wealth and the monopolies and which cost the Government or the public tremendous sums of revenue, I think any reasonable and fair man would be justified in questioning then why you should turn all of your first effort and your first attack on "cooperatives", which may have (and I emphasize "may have" because there are many questions involved and which any fair man must consider before he would say "do have") very minor tax exemption.

We have on the one hand tremendous subsidies which are recognized as subsidies and which benefit powerful and wealthy persons and groups, subsidies which involve as much as a billion dollars.

You prefer to ignore these subsidies and set them aside for some future consideration.

We have, on the other hand, something described as subsidies for the farmers, the less wealthy, the class which has been driven down until more than 42 percent of farmers are now tenants and not owners. This thing which you believe to be tax exemption or a subsidy to groups of farmers constitutes at most a few million dollars.

Your organization develops its entire campaign of attack on these groups of farmers.

I ask you, in all fairness and candor, if there is not reason for question about the real motives of your organization?

And in this connection would it not be well to present all the facts before you boldly assert that cooperatives have had preferential treatment? Since you use the word "preferential," would you not be compelled, naturally, and if your interest was not to attack cooperatives only, to first examine into the establishment of many agencies of government throughout the years, the agencies which have made tremendous contributions to the oil industry and the coal industry and the lumber industry and to the banks, the agencies such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the agencies which through such work as was done by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation protected our insurance companies and our banks, in short the many agencies which were active throughout the period when tremendous wealth was concentrated in a few hands. If your appeal is to be an appeal to accomplish something in the public interest and not an appeal to arouse hate and fear, I ask you again why not deal with those instances of great preferential treatment.

Your purpose to inquire into all kinds of tax exemption or tax evasion is excellent, but I ask you again why you have not begun with the evasions which involve hundreds of millions, as much as a billion of dollars, and evasions which benefit the powerful corporations and monopolies and deal with them at the outset of your inquiry?

Certainly, I shall agree with you that you cannot deal with all of these in "the space of a few moments." But if a hospital is on fire and if a fire department ignores that fire but rushes off to devote all of its efforts to a fire in a small haystack, we question the intelligence and the competency of the fire department. Unless there is some motive, and usually a concealed and hidden motive, behind the actions of such a fire department, we would only declare that its managers were insane and dismiss them.

Yes, the "percentage depletion allowances" may be made to all producing oil companies. And I emphasize that depletion allawances are entirely justifiable and the oil producers are entitled to them. I am only referring to the subsidy which is in "percentage depletion allowances." There may not be preference between oil companies as a result of these allowances (although I believe there is) but there is preference as against other tax payers and therefore as against the public interest. Yes, these allowances may be available to a cooperative which is producing oil, but that does not justify the subsidy. If a cooperative is taking any such subsidy, and if it is apprised of it and of the facts, I would warrant the cooperative would be happy to have the law amended and if it would not, I would condemn it just as I would any other beneficiary of the subsidy.

Do you really contend that the tax exemption now given through ownership of what are known as "tax exempt securities," the tremendous advantages that result therefrom to the owners of great wealth are not of advantage to one form and many forms or institutions of business and to the detriment of others? I notice you refer to direct competitors and I wonder how you propose to define that term. For example, is a grocer in one part of a city a direct competitor with a grocer in another part of the city? Can we, if we are interested in the public interest, endeavor to restrict and refine our activities in that way. Is a cooperative in Kansas City a direct competitor with another business in Chicago? Or is an oil company which sells oil for heating purposes a direct competitor with a coal company which sells coal for heating purposes?

Frankly, Mr. McCabe, if we are really interested in such work as you are doing because of a desire to serve the public interest, do we not have to begin with the discrimination and the preference against the public interest and deal with the most flagrant cases at the outset?

Then I ask again, why your organization began with an attack on cooperatives and confined all of its activities to attacks on cooperatives?

In your letter you refer to your "policy of protecting the American system" but again we accomplish nothing in the public interest when we merely indulge in fact avoiding est when we merely indulge in fact avoiding, phrase making, and phrase parroting. Would you say, for example, what you must imply, that the cooperative system is not an American system and that the millions of our fine citizens who are engaged in cooperative enterprise are not Americans and are not devoted to the finest principles upon which our Government was founded? I am confident you would not and I shall grant and without hesitation that you would not. I am confident that you will agree that all of our religious organizations, our educational organizations, our farm organizations, our labor organizations, and our political organizations would not commend and approve and encourage something which was not expressive of the finest ideals of our system of government.

I am sorry to hear that any cooperative leader would even tolerate a suggestion that we should adopt a national sales tax. If anyone has, I wish he would first present to his organization his proposal and follow cooperative practice by asking the members of his cooperative to approve of his proposal. I am constrained to believe he would not remain long in authority in the cooperative. That belief is predicated on the conviction that cooperatives, through their constant educational programs, are developing understanding in these fields and no citizen, with any interest in the welfare of his fellow man, or with any interest in a fair system of taxation, can approve of a national sales tax. You know every authority in this field will agree on one general rule, that "a sales tax can only be defended on the ground of expediency, that it will produce revenue and that it cannot be defended on the ground of justice or equity."

I am ready and I am sure every cooperative leader is ready to consider the problem of taxation of corporations, and consider it on a factual basis. I am sure that committees of Congress will welcome all the help you can give them on that score.

You may know that many sound students of taxation contend that we should eliminate all corporate taxation but tax the entire net income of the corporations to the individual stockholders, and tax it to them regardless of whether the corporate income is distributed to them or held in reserves of the corporation. In other words, they contend that we might wipe out the tax on the United States Steel Corporation, for example, but compel the corporation to notify its stockholders that the total net income of the corporation was $100,000,000 and that the stockholders' proportion of that income was $100,000 or $1,000, and the stockholder would then have to include that amount in his report of individual income. There is no doubt that would be a more equitable arrangement for the small stockholders and for the consumers who buy the products of corporations which in large measure pass on their corporate taxation to consumers and sometimes pass it on, pyramided. That proposal has been made before, and usually the large investors in corporations, and the few who through the system of absentee control of corporate reserves and control exercised despite the will of the small minority stockholders have opposed the plan. It seemed to provide just a bit too much of equity and equality, but if your association is striving for tax equality, this might be a cause to which you could give support.

COOPERATIVES SHOULD PAY THEIR SHARE OF TAXES

I repeat that there are general estimates that if every legal doubt is resolved as your association wishes to have it resolved, the total revenue to the Government from cooperatives through income taxation would be increased by some $200,000. I was willing to magnify that by 10 times and make it $2,000,000, or even if you will, $10,000,000. In any case the amount is so small that I personally hope the day may come when the cooperatives will themselves renounce even this small tax exemption in order to deprive their enemies of this handle on which to seize for the purpose of attacking their very existence.

If there is any income of cooperatives which is escaping taxation, the issue before Congress then is whether Congress desires to tax that income. As I recall, the exemption written into the law was written because of the desire of Congress to encourage and help agriculture. Perhaps your association can prove to Congress that the farmer is as fairly treated in our economy today as are the members of your association and the men who are contributing the money to your association. I say perhaps you can prove that, but from all the facts I have at my command I doubt it very much.

If a father and his 5 sons should pool their purchasing power to buy 6 suits of clothes and succeed thereby in saving $5 on each suit of clothes, does any one of the 6 have income of $5? If the 6 should decide to permit the total $30 they have saved to remain in the hands of the father for future joint purchasing, does the father have $30 of income?

If a father and his 5 sons, each operating separate farms, should agree to hire someone, call him a cooperative if you wish, to market their grain and the hired man does so and returns the proceeds of the sale to them, does the hired man have any income other than his wage or salary? That wage or salary income is not exempt from taxation now.

Does a commission firm or a brokerage firm which sells grain under an agency contract agreement have an income of all the money received for the grain and does he pay tax on it? You know he does not or the firm does not because it is not their income. The clients of the brokerage firm pays taxes on the money or income they receive through the brokerage firm and as a result of the sale of their grain, of course, as they do when a cooperative is the brokerage firm or commission agent.

The Constitution provides for taxation of income but patronage refunds when made by a cooperative or made by any other business cannot be classed as income to the cooperative or the business.

Any and everyone of your association members can enter into an agreement with their customers to return to them all of their "profits" and the corporations will not be taxed on that money returned. Certainly the customers will welcome such an agreement. And the corporations, like the cooperatives, will thus make a tremendous contribution to the public interest because they will increase the buying power of the consumers and thus help to solve the problem of unemployment, as cooperatives are now helping to solve it.

Everyone will agree with you, of course, that it is entirely inconsistent to refuse to pay taxes in a day when the Nation's life is at stake.

But surely you will agree that everyone pays taxes today and that unfortunately and because largely of our inability or incompetency to develop a perfect tax system, a disproportionate share of the burden of taxation falls on our less fortunate class, including the farmers whom your association is now attacking through attacks on the cooperatives they own.

If your association dedicates itself to a campaign to impose the burden of taxation according to the ability to bear the tax, everyone will commend its work as it demonstartes through its conduct that that is its purpose.

I am confident the farmers and the workers in cities and the cooperatives which they own will join with you and give you complete support in any such effort.

I shall be glad to hear from you again.

Sincerely yours,

JERRY VOORHIS.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. THOMAS H. CULLEN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my remarks upon the life, character, and public services of the Honorable THOMAS H. CULLEN, Congressman from the State of New York, by inserting in the RECORD an extension of remarks by the Honorable HARRY FLOOD BYRD, of Virginia:

As chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, I speak for all the members of that committee who were deeply saddened by the death of one of its most valued and conscientious members, THOMAS HENRY CULLEN, of the Fourth Congressional District of New York.

Mr. CULLEN was a long a Member of the House of Representatives and at the time of his death he was the ranking Democratic member of the House Ways and Means Committee.

It is apparent by the tribute paid to him by his colleagues that they recognized him as a man of insight and wit. All those who know him well were comforted in times of trial by his ever radiant and generally sympathetic nature. This man's abilities were particularly helpful to me as chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures. Mr. CULLEN was an excellent, industrious, and loyal committee member. He took the work of this committee seriously for he knew that its aim, like his aim, was to see that the best interests of the people of the United States were served always. Mr. CULLEN's keen mind brought to light many things that the committee might otherwise have missed. He demonstrated his remarkable ability and fund of knowledge during the hearings of the committee and exhibited a wide knowledge of the operation of the intricate Federal structure by the questions he asked. His remarks frequently brightened up long sessions dealing with involved matters. I feel sure that the people in his district will miss THOMAS HENRY CULLEN as their representative. I know that the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures will miss Mr. CULLEN as a member and I will miss TOM CULLEN as a friend.

Committee on Fair Employment Practice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, it is to me a matter of great satisfaction that the appropriation for the Committee on Fair Employment Practice has weathered the storm. The adoption last evening of the conference report on the war agencies appropriation bill has put this appropriation in the clear after a stormy passage through Congress, where it encountered violent and unpredictable opposition at every turn.

To those who are unfamiliar with the governmental alphabetical agencies I will state that this is the appropriation to carry on the activities of the committee originally created by Executive order to detect and if possible prevent or eliminate discrimination in Government employment based on racial or religious grounds. The committee has done excellent work and has contributed materially to the national effort by tapping reservoirs of manpower that would not have been brought into the employment picture without its efforts. The director of the activity, Malcom Ross, has demonstrated ability and resourcefulness of the highest order in meeting and solving the delicate and difficult problems of racial discrimination in respect to employment.

While the committee might have been continued under Executive order without a direct appropriation, Mr. Ross very manfully and properly insisted that he desired to justify the existence of his agency to Congress, so as to secure congressional authorization, and an estimate was set up for it by the Budget Bureau in the amount of $525,000. In running the gauntlet through Congress that amount was scaled only slightly and the bill as it goes to the President carries an appropriation of $500,000 for the Committee on Fair Employment Practice.

While the amount allowed is fairly satisfactory, the branch of Congress which we in the House call the other body tacked on to the appropriation some provisions which, to my way of thinking, are ridiculous and which as a conferee I vigorously opposed. One of these provisions, as adopted by "the other body," read as follows:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the compensation of any person to initiate, investigate, or prosecute any proceeding against any person, firm, or corporation which may result in the seizure or operation of any plant or other property of such person, firm, or corporation by Federal authority for failure to abide by any rule or regulation of the Committee on Fair Employment Practice or for failure to abide by any order passed by the Committee on Fair Employment Practice.

How any employee of the Committee who initiates an investigation would know in advance that it "may result in the seizure or operation" of a plant was beyond my limited comprehension. It seemed to me that if this remained in the bill it would hamstring the Committee on Fair Employment Practice. The conferees representing "the other body" finally agreed to substitute the words "seeks to effect" for "may result in," which was quite an improvement in language.

If I could have had my way all of the provisos would have been stricken out in toto, but the situation finally resolved itself down to "no provisos, no appropriation", and the friends of the Committee on Fair Employment Practice finally had to yield, which they did rather than see the entire appropriation go by the board.

I voted for the adoption of the conference report with much reluctance and for the reason so well expressed by Representative MARCANTONIO yesterday afternoon. It was that or nothing. I will hope that the provisos will not prove a real detriment to the continued successful operation of the agency and that next year we may be able to eliminate them entirely.

Pleadings in the Matter of Constitutional Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Rollo Ellis, a citizen of California, has requested that I place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following appeal bearing upon what he terms to be a denial of his rights under the Constitution. In accordance with his request I am asking to include this material herewith:

PLEADINGS IN THE MATTER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS BEFORE THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS

MOST HONORABLE GENTLEMEN: As a native-born citizen of these United States, I come before thee, through your most honorable Member, Congressman JERRY VOORHIS of the State of California, pleading constitutional rights, which rights have been denied me and others by the courts of the State of California, in the matter of Dos Pueblos Ranch & Improvement Co. against myself, Rollo Ellis, et al.; and also myself, Rollo Ellis against Martin, Texas Co., et al.

Having exhausted all my capital funds, and having incurred considerable indebtedness in striving to safeguard my civil rights, and those of others, and being without funds, or resources, or other recourse to proceed further in the courts of this Nation, I come before thee, most honorable gentleman of the United States Congress, to plead that thy most honorable and just body, sitting in convention, do take such steps and initiate such action as is vested in thee by reason of said articles of constitution, which shall cause the inequities and injustices that have been done unto me and to many others, to be repaired and restored.

As authority for the correctness of procedure in laying this matter before your most honorable body, and your duty to perform in connection therewith, I beg to recite the following articles of the Constitution:

I. PREAMBLE

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

II. ARTICLE VI, PARAGRAPH II

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

III. ARTICLE VII OF BILL OF RIGHTS

Right of trial by jury

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

IV. ARTICLE XIV, PARAGRAPH I

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

V. ARTICLE XIV, PARAGRAPH V

The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

VI. ARTICLE VI, PARAGRAPH III

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executives and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution, but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

At the time the aforementioned action was commenced in the matter, Dos Pueblos Ranch & Improvement Co. against myself, Rollo Ellis et al., to nullify and quit all our right, title, and interest in and to said leaseholds, which are more particularly described in the body of the pleadings herewith, and on map thereof, said leaseholds were of a market value in excess of $500,000, and have an estimated potential value in recoverable petroleum of approximately $100,000,000. We were denied trial.

At the time my titles were clouded, in the matter of myself, Rollo Ellis v. Martin, the Texas Co. et al., which clouding forced me to pray before the court for a good and sufficient title, said properties involved were of a marketable lease value in excess of $40,000, and said lands have an estimated potential value in recoverable petroleum of approximately $25,000,000. I have been denied trial.

The more complete details are set forth in the writings herewith, which were presented before the State bar of California and dismissed by them, as per letters attached hereto and made a part hereof.

Therefore, I now come before your most honorable body and pray for relief in equity and justice, in behalf of myself and all that inure through me, and in behalf of all people who likewise suffer.

Witness my hand and seal this 10th day of June 1944.

ROLLO ELLIS.

Born in Franklin County, Nebr., July 7, 1892.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
County of Los Angeles, ss:

Subscribed and sworn to before me by Rollo Ellis this 10th day of June 1944.

GRACE V. SMITH,
Notary Public in and for Said County and State.

Inasmuch as the pleadings we have filed go into minute detail of events and things over a period of years, and are quite lengthy, I shall endeavor to write a more brief recapitulation.

RE DOS PUEBLOS RANCH & IMPROVEMENT CO. v. ROLLO ELLIS ET AL

This matter involves a community oil and gas lease on approximately 325 acres of the town site of Naples, Santa Barbara County, Calif., which is situated immediately west of the Elwood oil field. Said leasehold embracing approximately 80 percent of a community lease in which there were some 25 or more other participant lessors.

The lease was executed in the fall of 1930, and drilling was commenced within 60 days thereafter, and carried to a depth below 5,000 feet. Some good showings were encountered but on account of the depression temporary overproduction of petroleum, and acute shortage of finances, the well was not tested, and operations were suspended indefinitely by general agreement.

Drilling was resumed in the late fall of 1934, and carried to a depth of 6,446 feet, drilling through a considerable thickness of high-pressure gas sand, and coring considerable very rich oil sand. Bottom water, and the presence of vertical beds, indicating an edge condition, resulted in our decision to move inland, upstructure, and drill new wells and not spend any more money trying to complete this well, for the time being. In other words, we did not complete or abandon this well, but merely were suspending operation upon it until we did more drilling in other locations.

Though the Standard Oil Co. of California had previously condemned the potential oil possibilities of the property in no uncertain terms, and continuously voiced their opinion to damaging effect, they became greatly interested in our operation during the last 60 days thereof and purchased approximately 20 acres of our leasehold at a bonus price of $1,500 per acre, and made a tentative offer of a like cash bonus for the entire leasehold of approximately 400 acres, plus an overriding royalty, which was never agreed upon. Other large companies requested permission to be given a chance to deal for our property.

We were engaged considering these offers, reorganizing our affairs, perfecting minute details of titles, repairing equipment and preparing new locations to drill, when within 90 days to the day that we suspended actual drilling, a quit title action was filed against me and my assigns.

The leasehold had previously been idle for more than 3 years and no contest of its validity was made. I had devoted 6 years of concentrated effort in making the geological examination, acquiring the community leases and causing said drilling to be done, and more than $150,000 had been expended by and through me in this work. Prior to the time I commenced leasing the properties, said properties did not have any lease market value, and thereafter only a speculative value until our well cored the very rich oil sand, after which time said leasehold did have a real value of great potentialities.

Said lease specifically provided that should I, Rollo Ellis, the lessee, default in any terms of said lease, in the opinion of said lessor, that notice was to be given, and time was provided for remedy. No notice of default was given.

The case came up before the superior court of Santa Barbara County on points of law and motion. A considerable portion of our answer to the complaint was stricken, and my counsel was denied right to amend. Upon request of counsel for the plaintiff the court then granted judgment against us on the complaint, without evidence, denying us trial.

We appealed to the Supreme Court of California, and when the case was heard the Presiding Justice made the statement from the bench to the general effect that our case was the most flagrant abuse of constitutional rights that had ever come before him. However, when decision was finally rendered six of the supreme court justices concurred with the superior court, that it was within its rights in granting judgment without trial, and the presiding justice did not write any dissenting opinion.

The information has since supplied us, that the Standard Oil Co. of California acquired all the right, title, and interest of the Dos Pueblos Co. to this leasehold and in reality it was they who engineered this method of justice. That the Dos Pueblos Ranch and Improvement Co. was their alter ego in fact.

Since our Constitution is quite clear that no person shall be deprived of life, goods, or property without trial, it is most evident that nine judges abdicated their oath of office to uphold the Constitution of the United States of America.

Therefore, the question before the Nation is, Has our Constitution been junked to permit these powerful financial organizations to reach out and take any property they may so desire, of which the foregoing case is only one example of a practice that has been rampant for many years? Not only here in the United States but a practice which has been employed by members of this same group, the world around, in their conquest of the valuable resources of our earth.

If civilization is to survive then the common law of our Constitution must survive, not only here in the United States of America, but throughout the world.

Therefore, in bringing this matter before the people of our Nation, I do so in the interest of every man, woman, and child who possess any love for home and country, and respect for God.

RE ROLLO ELLIS (MYSELF) v. MARTIN, THE TEXAS COMPANY, ET AL

This is a matter wherein, after extensive geological examinations and months of negotiations, I entered into a contract with a Mrs. Lillian J. Martin and Arthur B. Cameron to purchase all their right, title, and interest in and to approximately 290 acres of land and all their right and title and interest in and to the Estate Development Corporation, which said corporation held fee title to the majority of said lands.

The franchise to said Estate Development Corporation was in default and its name had been taken by others. No shares of stock had ever been issued, but the articles of incorporation declared three shares, one each to H. Ellis Martin, Lillian J. Martin, his wife, and Arthur B. Cameron. H. Ellis Martin had deceased and Mrs. Lillian J. Martin, his wife, was his sole and rightful heir.

I engaged legal counsel of Mrs. Martin's selection, who drew the contracts between us, which after much discussion and deliberation, were duly executed, at which time I paid unto Mrs. Martin and Cameron, one-half of the money agreed upon as the total purchase price. I advanced the lawyer his contracted fee, paid all back franchise taxes, coined and legally substituted the name of Malis Properties, Inc., as the name for said corporation.

The counsel had prepared an application to the Commissioner of Corporation, for permission to issue stock in said corporation, and to transfer same to me, and at the time said stock was actually assigned over and delivered to me, I was to pay the balance of the money.

On the day Mrs. Martin was to call at the attorney's office and sign said application, an attorney by the name of Phillip Richards called upon me and served me with a recention of contract upon the part of Mrs. Martin and proffered me the sum I had paid her, which I refused.

Phillip Richards then goes into court and has Mrs. Martin's brother appointed as executor for her deceased husband's estate, and they elect him to the board of directors of Malis Properties, Inc., which I had reorganized for them, and Mrs. Martin and her brother then execute a lease to the Texas Co., and assign over a considerable share of the company to Phillip Richards.

Upon contacting Cameron, he informed us that the plan was one that had been presented to him and Mrs. Martin some months previous by a land agent of the Texas Co., which included a propcsed scheme for eventually wiping out all interests of Mrs. Maud H. Hunstock, who held the mortgage on said land, and who, in fact, was the real owner of the property.

H. Ellis Martin, some years previous, approached Mrs. Hunstock with a plan that would permit him to take her lands and subdivide them and sell them off to colored people who were building a resort colony in that vicinity, where the County of Los Angeles had developed a small park for them, that embraced a nice clubhouse and an open-air swimming pool with bathhouse.

Martin, not having the funds, induced Mrs. Hunstock to permit him to operate on her capital investment. She assigned the property to the Estate Development Corporation, which Martin incorporated for that purpose, and took a mortgage back for the full sum, entering into a separate agreement to release any portion of said land from said mortgage contract, upon the payment of a sum of approximately $20 per acre.

Martin sold quite a number of parcels, but only a few of them were cleared from under the mortgage at the time of his demise, after which the corporation was permitted to go in default, hence the balance of the purchasers could not obtain title. Martin never paid any interest on the mortgage, nor taxes, and at no time ever had any moneys invested in said property.

When Mrs. Martin jumped her contract with me, Cameron refused to join with her, as at all times he had refused to be a party to their scheme, which he regarded as being unlawful and without equity. At a later date, I am informed, he did sell Attorney Richards all his right, title, and interest, so as to get out from under this uncalled-for litigation.

This group is now carrying forth with their plan to liquidate and void all of Mrs. Hunstock's interest.

In order to help finance this undertaking, I took a silent partner into the transaction, a man of considerable means, who deceased a few months later. When this trouble arose, he refused to accept the counsel I had selected, and at a later date he requested that I accept a counsel that an agent of his had selected, a Mr. Mortimer Kline. Appointments were made and I interviewed this counsel, or rather he cross-questioned me at length and asked to talk with Mr. Cameron. This was arranged, and he also interviewed my former counsel as well as Mrs. Martin's counsel, who had drawn our contracts, and then took the case.

From then on, the litigation progressed very slowly but evidently his work was efficient, as the court held all defendants to trial on all counts. Many months elapsed. I had gone to San Francisco on business and had taken suddenly ill and was confined to bed, where Mr. Kline reached me on the telephone, advising me that Secretary Ickes had offered him a high position as associate chief counsel for the Office of Petroleum Administration for War, which he was most anxious to accept, but could not do so unless I would release him as my counsel in this matter, which I learned for the first time, was set for trial in a couple of weeks.

After several conversations over the telephone, during the following 48 hours, I told him to get the case postponed or taken off the calendar and leave the papers and I would find some way of handling it, and he went off to Washington.

During the period that has since elapsed I made numerous attempts to engage new counsel, but in every instance they wanted money or interests of such proportion that I could not deliver. Finally I made contact with an attorney by chance, who thought he might like to gamble the necessary time and money, who started to check the status of the case and learned that my case had been dismissed from trial, on the grounds that I had not prosecuted the trial thereof, though the legal period as fixed by law had not yet expired.

Upon checking the matter further, I found that the defendants had gone into court unknown to me and filed a request for dismissal; that the records showed that notice had been served upon Mortimer Kline, who was still the attorney of record. Whether Kline received this notice or whether he made any effort to contact me I do not know, but the facts remain that the attorneys for the defense knew very well that Kline had gone into Government war service and that I had released him at great inconvenience and loss to myself, and that all able counsels were extremely busy and difficult to employ. The records also show that 2 days after my case was dismissed Kline filed an application to be released from the case, which was granted.

I submitted the general foregoing information in detail to the State bar of California, who gave me a short hearing before a two-man committee on the 6th of June 1944, and on the 7th of June they wrote me a letter advising me they had dismissed my matter as they had not found anything irregular.

As I prepared my data for the State Bar of California I forwarded copies to Congressman JERRY VOORHIS at Washington to use as he might see fit, then when the State bar rejected my plea for consideration of my constitutional rights I then prepared the foregoing prayer, and duly executed same and forwarded it to Congressman VOORHIS, to be brought before Congress.

All the foregoing is true, to the best of my knowledge and belief, and is being given in behalf of the well-being of all mankind in the service of God.

ROLLO ELLIS.

SUMMARY

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., June 6, 1944.

HONORABLE GENTLEMEN: May I beg your indulgence for a few minutes more while I lay before you the true underlying purpose that has motivated me in laying these foregoing matters before you. As I have previously stated, my individual losses are not very important to the bar association or the Nation, but the continuous indulgence in the practices that circumvent justice, is of great concern to our Nation and the world at large.

There is hardly one among us that would not like to feel that they were leaving this world just a little better place in which to live, by reason of our sojourn on earth. At this very time, a large percentage of our people are giving their every thought and effort, in hopes of devising means that will bring a lasting peace to this earth. My venture is that there is not more than one out of every thousand of our earth's people who secretly believe their best interests are served by war and strife.

As any learned medical man will tell you, or as you well know to be true in your profession, before any ill can be remedied, the cause of the illness must be located and treated. Just to place a bandage over the illness and cover it up, is but a blind-man's folly. Acts of man or men that are blind from within.

The general talk about is to the effect that we must maintain vast armies and enforce a peace upon the earth's people, through a form of subjugation; but I ask you gentlemen, did you ever know anything that was brought about by force that was healthy. Does the placing of a man in a strait jacket cure his ills. No you must first make correct diagnosis and treat accordingly.

Should it be your desire to give aid, even if only slightly, to the bringing about of a lasting world peace, within our hearts, within our homes, within our Nation and that world at large, then we must esek the truth of the cause of all the conflict that exists within our own souls—within our Nation and between nations.

Gentlemen, if you will but follow the trail I have laid before you, at the end thereof you will find this truth.

Slowly, but relentlessly, these powerful corporations are crushing the life out of the people of our Nation, and of all nations of the world. Operating through third parties who gladly serve for pay, now more commonly known as Quislings, they reach out with their all-powerful tentacles, grasp and destroy and take over. The success of their conquest depends upon indifference and disorganization. The history of Hitler's conquest in Europe so well illustrates this point.

The two cases I have laid before you are only two in thousands. If you see fit to follow through on these, and wish more, I will gladly supply you with a goodly number. If this monster has not yet entered your home, you need not have any feeling of neglect—give him time and he will be there.

When I first became active in the petroleum industry, back in 1921, the potential oil lands, and production of the Standard Oil Co. of California was confined almost exclusively, if not exclusively, to California, and their total holdings thereof was something in the neighborhood of 200,000 acres. Their subsidiaries of that time were inconsequential.

Let us take a look at their annual report for 1943. Therein they list 19 subsidiaries that are operating within the United States, and this list only includes a fraction of the corporations they control. So-called independent oil companies, such as Signal, that obtain every drop of gasoline and oil they market direct from the Standard plants, are not listed. Neither are the banking chains they control, either solely by themselves or in association with other corporations of the Standard group, nor do they list a long string of manufacturing concerns.

This report shows 3 Canadian subsidiaries, 6 in Central and South America, and 12 in other parts of the world, a total of 39 subsidiaries.

As we go a little further into this report on page 6, we find that they now own potential and proved oil holdings in 15 States and Alaska, which total 2,567,244 acres.

Over on the bottom of page 14 we find the listing of their foreign holdings, with a total of 284,378,620 acres, with an additional 2,343,360 acres in New Zealand in which their participation is only 50 percent.

Is it not rather strange that a corporation which has been so badly oppressed with overproduction and unbearable taxes over these past years, upon showing a portion of their take, should be found holding such a vast amount of loot?

Yes, gentlemen, it is mostly loot. I have watched them destroy, first one person here, a corporation there, a government here, a government there, in the same manner as Hitler knocked over Poland, then Belgium, France, and so on. All others have stood by, most indifferent at the time, each praying that they were going to be allowed to retain their possessions, believing that they were special favorites, but these monsters of greed, have no favorites, only while they can be useful tools. The men directing them have lost all sense of human decency. They are like Hitler—insane with power. All that matters to them is that every person, being, and thing must bend to their will.

With this picture in mind, if you will then just give consideration to the fact that the Standard of California is not the largest of the Standard family, which includes the Humble Oil Co., of Texas, and that for many years past the Texas Co. has been operating with them as sort of a brother-in-law. The total potential oil holdings of this group must aggregate well over 1,000,000,000 acres, only a small portion of which is developed.

In a booklet written by Mr. Wallace E. Pratt, vice president of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, titled "There Will Be Enough Oil," he closes with this most disarming statement: "If political and social conditions over the earth could be modified to permit everyone to go about the job of oil-finding everywhere in the same way we have followed in the United States, there should be little difficulty in establishing petroleum reserves adequate for man's needs over the long future."

Mr. Pratt could not have spoken truer words, but he neglected to tell that outside of Russia and Mexico, where they were thrown out, that their group already control all the known petroleum resources of the world and that no one else but they are permitted to go about the business of finding oil, except in a small way, here in the United States, and then under handicaps they have imposed through their absolute control of the Department of the Interior of our Government, and the likelihood of being put out of business if successful.

We have been very short of oil to fight this war, for which many excuses carrying very little truth have been made. Many are meeting with great difficulty in carrying on their business for lack of gasoline, and many have already lost their life's savings and business by reason thereof.

Please believe me, gentlemen, it is the absolute truth, that had I been permitted to develop the properties I have acquired and the discoveries I have made during the past 20 years, there would be ample petroleum on the west coast for all purposes. Without taking into consideration all the other developments that have been eliminated in a like manner as have mine, the projects that I have mapped and furthered would be sufficient. Now because the legal profession and the newspapers have seen fit to stand by and watch the professional and economic destruction of scores like me, and say, "It just is part of the game," many must now give of their lives and all people must suffer.

Petroleum has ceased to be just a motive power. It is today the most widely used basic substance for chemicals, and in the manufacture of scores of products, not to mention that from this time on it will most likely control the rubber industry. Therefore in the control of the petroleum supply of the world lies the control of the economic and social well-being of the world. By and through the power of their wealth, Governments become but puppets.

Shall we go on like the drunkard, who hopes to find a cure for drunkenness, that will permit him to continue to drink, or the killer who strives to run away from his remorse and yet continues to kill, or shall we, as intelligent men, take recognition of the true cause of our ills and proceed in a sensible, honorable manner, to remedy them?

Laying this entire matter before the Congress of our United States is not done with any thought of suggesting that the Congress usurp rights to remedy these ills within other jurisdictions, but that the Congress may take recognition of this most destructive of all social evils, in the broader scope, and initiate such remedial steps as they may deem most effectual.

A. Copy of appellant's brief, L. A. No. 16,074, filed in appeal to the Supreme Court of the State of California.

B. Map of Naples-Elwood region, by Rollo Ellis.

C. A copy of a reprint of the general form of community oil and gas lease, that was initially compiled by me in the early spring of 1929. All Naples leases other than that of Wylie's, were executed upon the initial form and are of record in the records of Santa Barbara County.

I was not incorporated at that time, and have since made a few changes in the lease form.

On or about the year of 1933, upon the request of Bud Broomfield, then director of the land department of the Barnsdall Oil Co., I granted permission to the Petroleum World to use this form. Their attorneys made a few changes and the Petroleum World has published it ever since, it being Oil Age Form 87, that is now used almost exclusively for community leasing in California. It is only one of many contributions I have made to the petroleum industry.

D. A photographic copy of certain articles that appeared in the October 22, 1931, issue of the California Oil World, in which comments on the Naples well was made.

You will note that I advanced some new principles as to the source, generation, migration, and accumulation of petroleum, and that the editor commented that he was unable to find any geologists who would admit that they concurred with me, though he felt some of them must agree at least in part. All are accepted principles today.

I do not make this statement with any thought of boastfulness, but I do believe that if an impartial inquiry was made, that it would be determined that I have made some of the most outstanding contributions to the furtherance of the science of petroleum geology, of our age. Not being of the orthodox—nor of their flock—my works have been treated with bitterness, and ruthless destruction.

To aid our Nation in its period of suffering and peril, I offered to write a complete new treatise, embracing a more exact science of petroleum geology, and give it to the world, if the Oil and Gas Journal, a national publication, would publish it, but they refused. This new knowledge, in the hands of the geological profession should expedite petroleum discovery at least 50 percent, if not more. So far, I have been able to utilize it with remarkable exactness.

Republican Reckless Sniping and Ingenuity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, only a few days ago our colleague from Illinois [Mr. MASON] advocated that a Democrat be nominated by the Republicans for Vice President. I do not know whether he had in mind the pseudo apostate Democrats Pettengill and John O'Connor, but I do know that no real, self-respecting Democrat could be induced to even consider such a ridiculous proposal.

This would indicate that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] recognizes, as do all other well-informed gentlemen, that the Republicans, if President Roosevelt will be induced to serve another 4 years, which I maintain he owes to the country and to the world, have absolutely no chance of victory in the forthcoming election, and in their desperation they are seeking to inveigle some apostate Democrat to aid them by giving color of respectability and efficiency to the Republican ticket.

The effusions of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] were followed by the criticism of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] of the President for giving Procope, the Finnish Minister, and 3 of his counsellors their passports, he charging that such was done at the behest of and to please the Russians. Well, Russia does not need our help in dealing with the few misled leaders of Finland who have refused to listen to Russia's modest and fair proposal for an adjustment and settlement of the boundary dispute and other factors created by the impending war. Fact is the Department of State had undeniable proof that the Finnish Minister and his counsellors were engaged in pernicious activities inimical to the welfare of the United States. They were keeping the Nazis and their satellites informed of our operations and trying to effect a cleavage between Russia and the United States.

Mr. O'Donnell in a recent press article in a local newspaper stated that Mr. Procope was a suave and affable gentleman but all his friendships and popularity acquired in Mrs. McLean's Friendship estate, the headquarters for the Fascists and Roosevelt haters, were acquired for a very definite, selfish purpose—for the sole purpose of inveigling unsuspecting but sincere Americans to subject themselves to an inoculation of hatred and distrust of the great Russia.
